THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

IN THE SECOND SESSION OF THE FORTY-NINTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

THIRTY-THIRD YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 71

FIFTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1984-85

House of Commons

Monday 14 January 1985

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

London Transport (Travel Passes)

1. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport if will make a statement on the future of travel passes in London for pensioners, blind and disabled people.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I understand that for 1985-86 the GLC has announced its intention to continue to fund concessionary travel for pensioners in London. Thereafter, the responsibility for pensioners' concessionary travel will rest with the boroughs, which will continue to fund concessions for the blind and disabled.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend accept the congratulations of the blind, disabled and pensioners of London on guaranteeing their passes for the first time, which no Labour or Lib-Lab Government ever did or thought of doing?

Will my right hon. Friend also consider asking London Regional Transport to allow homeless people to go on to underground stations during very cold weather, pending resolution of their tragic homelessness?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is somewhat wide of the original question.

Mr. Ridley: On the first point, I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It would be helpful if the Association of London Authorities joined the current discussions to see how best to get a voluntary scheme among the boroughs for 1986-87.

On the second point, I shall draw my hon. Friend's comments to the attention of London Regional Transport, if that is in order.

Mr. Tony Banks: Can the Secretary of State give an assurance to pensioners that their passes will in no way be put in jeopardy by the mess that he has made over LRT's budget for next year and the excess £50 million that he demanded from the GLC in a manner described by Mr. Justice McNeill as "illegally, irrationally and procedurally improperly"?

Can the right hon. Gentleman also tell us whether fares will have to go up 15 per cent. to cover his incompetence in organising a budget?

Mr. Ridley: On the first point, the hon. Gentleman and the House know that a statutory back-up scheme for concessionary travel for pensioners in London is enshrined in the London Regional Transport Act. A threat to pensioners would arise only if the abolition Bill did not make speedy progress to the statute book.

On the second point, the hon. Gentleman will know that we have appealed against the judgment, and therefore it is sub judice.

Mr. Snape: Does the Secretary of State accept that he has no cause for self-congratulation? He accepted the amendment to include provision for concessionary fares in the LRT Bill most reluctantly. Following the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), does the right hon. Gentleman consider that, as a result of the impact of the court's judgment on pensioners' and other concessionary fares in London, he owes the House an explanation, the GLC an apology and the ratepayers of Greater London £50 million?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman knows that it was to stop the scurrilous groundless rumours that concessionary fares were under threat—which were being peddled by the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends—that we underwrote those fares in the Bill. I do not see why the hon. Gentleman is complaining about that now. That is what he wanted. I repeat that the other matter to which he referred is sub judice.

Heavy Lorries

2. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the progress of the development of the quieter heavy lorry.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): The quiet heavy vehicle project — QHV90 — is making good progress. Most of the contracts have been placed with the industrial partners and I expect the programme to be substantially completed within the next four years.

Mr. Dykes: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. Will she assure the House that the industry is not going slower than necessary on the development of the quieter heavy lorry, because that development was the essential quid pro quo for the approved increase in lorry weights? The development of the quieter heavy lorry is a better way forward than daft administrative bans in some areas, as currently proposed by the Greater London council.

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend is absolutely right; and I can give him the assurance that the project, costing about £10 million in total, is on target and proceeding well.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Minister agree that the possible ban to which the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) referred would not apply to completely quiet lorries? Will she look into the figures quoted by the GLC? Is it not probable that such quietness could be achieved at even lower costs than have been considered so far? Will the Minister look into the matter immediately, notwithstanding the four-year programme that she has mentioned?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman should not take comfort from the discussion that has gone on about hush kits, to which I think he is referring. Although I regret it, there is no range of hush kits ready and waiting to be fitted to the many different types of lorry in use today. The way to achieve the realistic and lasting reductions in lorry noise mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) is by design, as is being done in the QHV90 project. We shall ensure that when the first prototype comes along, in good time, it is followed by others; and we shall start manufacturing at the earliest possible date to the QHV90 specification.

Bus Bill

3. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the Bus Bill will be presented.

Mr. Ridley: Shortly, Sir.

Mr. Marlow: Seeing that the bus's share of personal transport has fallen to a meagre quarter of what it was 30 years ago and yet the revenue subsidy spent on buses is some 50 times as great as it was 10 years ago, is it not clearly time that some radical change and solution were introduced? Is it not the case that anyone who looks at the situation objectively finds himself fundamentally behind the proposals in the White Paper?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is quite right. I think that the subsidy is about 14 times greater, but otherwise I entirely agree with what he has said. In Northampton, the revenue support is 16 per cent. of the total cost of the bus operation. We believe that that money can be saved by increased efficiency or productivity, as has been demonstrated in many areas where competition has been tried. I believe that when the Bill is published, the policy before the House will lead to greater and better bus services and smaller subsidies, to the benefit of all concerned.

Mr. Stephen Ross: We hope that the delay in publishing the Bill means that the Secretary of State is taking on board some of the more sensible representations that have been made to him by the Bus and Coach Council and by Hackney carriage proprietors, among many others. Is that so?

Mr. Ridley: Many responses to the consultative documents have been received, and we have been careful to take all the good advice that they have included. I am sure that I can count on the hon. Gentleman to support the princples of competition and of putting the consumer first, which used to form one of the Liberal party's foremost platforms.

Mr. Parris: Will my right hon. Friend attend not only to the chorus of vested interests that can be expected to be raised against such a change, but to the interests of those passengers who benefit from these changes but who do not yet know who they are?

Mr. Ridley: We know that about 40 per cent. of the population depend on buses, and that is a very large clientele. I confirm that the proposals in the White Paper, and eventually in the Bill, are designed to assist and improve the lot of the passengers rather than of the operators.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Is it not time that the Secretary of State realised that his proposals are causing great anxiety throughout the community? Does he appreciate that many of those with vast experience of the transport industry believe that deregulation is a receipe for disaster? Is it not time that he rethought the whole issue and entered into further discussions with the local authorities, trade unions and voluntary bodies, such as the National Federation of Women's Institutes.

Mr. Ridley: If the hon. Gentleman has the interests of the passengers at heart, he should try to reassure them that the Government's proposals will not only increase the standard and frequency of services but also, we hope, reduce fares in many cases. He should be reassuring his constituents that the proposals are in their interests. He should not be listening so much to the operators.

Mr. Robert Atkins: Does my right hon. Friend recognise that long delays in the introduction of the Bill will not help the future of Leyland Bus, in my constituency which manufactures the best buses in the world? Does my right hon. Friend recognise that an urgent introduction of the Bill, allowing for all the changes and considerations that might have to be made, is in the interests of the manufacturers as well as of potential passengers?

Mr. Ridley: In view of my hon. Friend's urgent representation I shall alter my original answer from

"Shortly" to "Very shortly." I am fully aware of the problems of Leyland Bus. I have visited the factory. After an initial difficult period, I am sure that our policy, will result in more orders for the British bus industry, provided that it is competitive and supplies the market with what it wants.

Mrs Dunwoody: Does the Secretary of State not understand that the elimination of cross-subsidy between routes will materially damage, above all, the people who live in rural areas? Since his White Paper said that the three trial areas had been failures, why is the right hon. Gentleman not prepared to accept that what he suggests is totally unworkable and irresponsible, and is aimed particulary at the people who cannot hit back—the bus passengers?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Lady has got it wrong again. If she studies the trial areas in Hereford and Worcester she will discover that the absence of cross-subsidy has resulted in a reduction in the subsidy, the same network being provided in the rural areas and with lower fares in many cases. What happened in Hereford and Worcester can be applied generally to the rural areas and so provide better bus services with greater frequencies and at less expense.

Rural Bus Services

4. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what specific definition of rural areas he proposes should be used for the purpose of transitional grant aid for bus services in such areas.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): For the purpose of the rural bus grant we propose to define rural areas as being areas outside metropolitan counties and the larger towns as measured by data provided by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys. We shall listen to the views of Members as to the size of small town which should qualify as rural.

Mr. Freeman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. On the assumption that the new levels of rate support grant will compensate the county councils for the loss of the revenue element of the transport supplementary grant, how will the £20 million of transitional aid in the first year to the rural areas be distributed so that the benefit goes to the rural areas?

Mr. Spicer: The switch to capital only TSG will make no difference to revenue support, which will continue to be at the discretion of local authorities. The rural bus grant will be given through the fuel duty rebate mechanism. Operators will apply for the rural bus grant element on the basis of the services registered in rural areas.

Mr. Haynes: Why does the Secretary of State keep saying that we shall receive a better bus service under the Bill? Does the Minister not realise the serious effect that the Bill will have upon rural areas? It is no good talking about the transitional period, because we are talking about regular periods afterwards, bearing in mind that bus services will be seriously reduced in rural areas, particularly in my constituency.

Mr. Spicer: Rural bus services — indeed, all bus services—have declined in the last 10 years by over 25 per cent. The trial areas in which we have experimented show that we can stop the rot and increase the quality and number of buses.

Mr. Adley: Is my hon. Friend aware that many of us applaud the theory behind the Bill, but have doubts about the practice? In the past few years in this place some of us have had experience of Governments who have had good ideas in theory but who have finished up a few years later wishing that they had done nothing of the sort.

Does my hon. Friend recognise that the success in Hereford and Worcester was due largely to the enthusiasm and support of the county councils for the scheme? If he tries to bulldoze the proposals through in the face of hostility from county councils, he may well find a difficult situation. As the Bill has been delayed, will he please bear in mind that willing support should be a prerequisite to what he is trying to do?

Mr. Spicer: Yes, Sir. I can confirm that the Association of County Councils has given the proposed Bill its support.

Publicity Campaigns

6. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Transport what road safety or vehicle maintenance publicity campaigns are currently being conducted; and what is their cost.

Mrs. Chalker: Our publicity programme for 1984-85 has an estimated cost of £3,953,000 and has included major campaigns on child pedestrian safety, cycling safety and drinking and driving. The programme for this financial year is now largely complete.

Mr. Hunter: Bearing in mind the additional seasonal hazards facing motorists, which are likely to be with us for some weeks, will the Department consider intensifying publicity campaigns, with the aim of seeking a greater awareness of vehicle maintenance and safety among motorists when driving in ice and fog?

Mrs. Chalker: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that question. Of course, publicity on vehicle maintenance is important. We have brought out much publicity and always do so whenever new regulations are introduced. In hazardous weather motorists must be aware that they should go out only if it is really necessary. They should check their fuel, oil and anti-freeze and ensure that their windscreens and lamps, both front and rear, are clean. However much hon. Members may charge me with being a nanny in that respect, I must say that those who do the sensible things on the road are more likely to be safe and here next week to tell the tale than those who ignore commonsense advice, which is what motoring in winter weather is all about.

Mr. Stott: As the hon. Lady and I have an abiding interest in road safety, may I ask whether she or the Department has any views on the quality of road safety which is currently being afforded by Sir Clive Sinclair's latest invention, which I am given to believe is a bike?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the C5 is a trike which falls completely within the electrically assisted pedal cycle regulations. I should make it clear that it is a bike in the sense that one has to pedal in it. There is no way in which it is a motor vehicle. We are obviously monitoring what is going on at the road research laboratory.

Mr. Higgins: I welcome the recent poster campaign encouraging pedal cyclists to have lights on at night. Will my hon. Friend recognise that the number of bicycles without lights is still appallingly high, and will she encourage the full enforcement of the law on those who risk their lives and other people's safety?

Mrs. Chalker: I could not agree more with my right hon. Friend. Whenever we can we point that out, and I know that, whenever possible, police forces insist that cyclists obey the law and have properly lighted cycles. All cyclists put themselves in terrible jeopardy if their cycle lights are not in proper working order and if they are not dressed so that they can be clearly seen on the roadway at all times.

Bus Deregulation

7. Mr. Cowans asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received about the effect on rural bus services of bus deregulation.

8. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received about his White Paper on buses.

9. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received about the buses White Paper and its effect on rural services.

Mr. Ridley: I have received about 7,000 responses so far to the White Paper on buses and the consultation documents which were issued subsequently. A substantial proportion of the responses have speculated about the effects of the proposals on rural bus services.

Mr. Cowans: I assume that the Minister has read all the representations and taken due consideration of them. I say that because when the Under-Secretary of State answered question 4 he led the House to believe that the Association of County Councils supported the White Paper on buses, yet when it gave evidence to the Select Committee its view was somewhat different. I do not know whether it has had a remarkable change of opinion in the past 48 hours.

Assuming that the right hon. Gentleman does read the representations—I am sure that he does—does he realise that there is wide and growing concern, not only in the industry, but among passengers, that his proposals will decimate rural transport and isolate entire communities? Will he, even at this late stage, go back to the drawing board and return with some workable and realistic proposals which many within the industry and the passengers may find able to support?

Mr. Ridley: I am surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman, so early in the day, prejudging the inquiry into these matters by the Select Committee of which he is Chairman. I have read the written representations of the Association of County Councils, which were broadly supportive of the proposals, though querying some of the detailed provisions. The hon. Gentleman would be mistaken to try to frighten rural passengers about these proposals. He may be interested to learn that in Hereford and Worcester 38 per cent. of the total revenue subsidy cost was saved, which would have been available had the county council wished to buy more rural services. Instead, it preferred to leave the present pattern of rural services and make the saving for the ratepayers.

Mr. Maclean: Is my right hon. Friend aware that my constituents welcome the proposals because they realise that rural bus services are practically non-existent and that our proposals are the only hope of increasing those that exist? Does he think it significant that in recent months the Liberal party in my constituency, which likes to believe that it is the champion of rural services, has been trying to hype up a campaign against the proposals but has had to abandon it because last weekend it found not one supporter?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is the true voice in this House of rural dwellers, unlike the hon. Members for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans), for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) and for Gower (Mr. Wardell), who have asked the question. I agree that nobody can be satisfied with the present position of rural services and that the radical plan that the Government are putting forward to provide more and better services should be supported, even by hon. Members who represent urban constituencies.

Mr. Cartwright: In view of the support which expert bodies, such as the Bus and Coach Council, have given to the idea of introducing competition through the franchising of bus routes rather than having a free-for-all on the roads, may we be told whether the changes that the Secretary of State has made to his original proposals embrace that kind of approach?

Mr. Ridley: I do not believe that franchising would achieve anything like the scale of benefits that the proposals in the White Paper for full competition will bring, for two reasons. The first is that county councils would, under the franchising proposals, use their judgment as to what was the right pattern of supply to meet the market, rather than allow the market to determine the pattern of supply of services. The second is that once a franchise was obtained it would be protected from competition, and that would have the effect of not allowing the full benefit from increased productivity and reduced costs, which we believe will come from allowing full competition, to be developed.

Mr. Canavan: Will the Secretary of State confirm reports that he has had to delay publication of the Bill because of strong opposition from Members of Parliament, including some Tory Members who represent rural areas? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that unless he wants to see public transport reduced to a mere skeleton service run by cowboys, he will have to scrap the Bill completely in view of the devastating effect that it will have on bus services, particularly in rural areas, and on jobs in the coach-building industry; for example at Walter Alexanders in my constituency?

Mr. Ridley: There has been an enormous number of representations and it has been important to take great care to design the detailed provisions of the Bill to facilitate the transitional period leading to the deregulated regime. That is why we are running slightly late. However, the hon. Gentleman will be pleasantly surprised by how soon the Bill will be in the Vote Office. If he has the interests of his rural passenger constituents at heart, I look forward to him joining my right hon. and hon. Friends in voting to support the proposals that are set out in the Bill.

Mr. Pike: Does the Secretary of State accept that while a small minority might have better services as a result of the Government's proposals, the cost will have to be paid for by those living in rural areas? Those living in rural areas and those who are dependent on off-peak services and Sunday services, and the elderly and the disabled. About 3,000 of my constituents have written to me on this issue, as they are concerned about the Government's proposals. They hope that the Government will decide to withdraw them.

Mr. Ridley: Those who are paying the high levels of cross subsidy are those living in the cities, especially those in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. They live on bus routes on which there are many passengers. They are being taxed, as it were, to subsidise those who live in leafy suburbs in rural areas. As a Socialist, which I assume the hon. Gentleman to be, is he satisfied with that pattern of cross subsidy?

Mr. Beith: Does the Secretary of State realise that in Northumberland there will be commercial pressure for the operators to compete for the routes on the fringes of Tyneside, leaving local authorities with insufficient moneys to provide revenue subsidies to the operators, who are left to make an attempt to provide a service for the large and thinly populated rural areas?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman knows that I am not a stranger to Northumberland. I can confirm that the bus service in rural Northumberland leaves a great deal to be desired. I believe he will find that a greater service is able to be provided for the same amount of money by receiving tenders for rural routes.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will the Secretary of State make it clear that in areas such as Hertfordshire the cutting of a £1 million subsidy will result in the county spending £2·4 million on replacing school buses alone? Why does he not have the honesty to say that in the trial areas, expecially in Hereford, a number of buses were so dangerous that they had to be taken off the roads? It will be the passengers who will pay for the mad Bill that the Government propose.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Lady has it wrong, again. I think that she read an article about Hertfordshire and the transport supplementary grant. That had nothing to do with the bus Bill. Secondly, the percentage of buses passing initial inspection in 1983-84 was as follows: National Bus Company vehicles 60 per cent., private bus operators' vehicles 56 per cent., passenger transport executive operators' vehicles 49 per cent., and London Transport vehicles 47 per cent. That shows that the private sector has an extremely good safety record.

Dial-a-Ride Service

10. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the London borough councils with whom he has discussed the future of the dial-a-ride service; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: We are in full discussion with the London Boroughs Association. We have also made contact with the Association of London Authorities, but we are still awaiting its response to our invitation to join the discussions.

Mr. Cox: Is the Minister fully aware of the increasing concern of the disabled and the organisations that represent them about the uncertainty of the future of the service? As the service is now being developed in London, it is the Government's duty to put some pressure on authorities such as the borough of Wandsworth, which will not make any commitment. It seems that the hon. Lady cannot be aware of the concern and could not care less whether the service continues or dies. It is up to the Government to help the disabled now that the service is in being.

Mrs. Chalker: It is my firm intention that the scheme shall be determined by the London boroughs, which are talking with us, and that includes Wandsworth. As a resident in that borough, I at least have some say in what goes on within it. The only doubt that is being put in the minds of the disabled about the dial-a-ride scheme is coming from those who are campaigning against the Government's policy. It is they who are worrying the disabled. I can assure the disabled that we are discussing the future of the dial-a-ride scheme. We recognise the importance of it, and the purpose of the talks is to find the best way of continuing to meet the need. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will desist from scaremongering, if that is what he has been doing.

Mr. Eggar: Is not the way in which the GLC is spending ratepayers' money and stirring up concern among disabled people completely disgraceful? Is my hon. Friend convinced that the way in which the GLC spends money on this scheme provides the best value for money for disabled people?

Mrs. Chalker: I am sad to say that the GLC is not spending money in the best possible way. What we have been doing with the London branch of the national advisory unit for community transport to make its schemes develop in the most effective and efficient manner is the best way in which we can help not only to maintain the dial-a-ride system but to provide other systems to enable disabled people to get around. I shall continue to ensure that that happens, whatever the GLC does.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Minister aware that one reason why the disability organisations wish to have a better relationship with London Regional Transport is that they do not necessarily consider themselves to be clients of social services and, therefore, within the purview of the London boroughs? Does the hon. Lady accept, therefore, that it is desperately important that people who rely on dial-a-ride should be able to look forward to that kind of relationship with LRT?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman's statement bears out the steps that LRT is taking with the new heads of its unit and one of its board members, who is directly responsible for the transport of disabled people in London. A number of the organisations for the disabled have already told me that they are pleased with the steps that LRT is taking through that unit to help disabled people to use conventional and new forms of transport in the future.

Mr. Snape: Does the Minister accept that if the Department of Transport returns to the GLC the £50 million that the Department improperly filched from it, due to the incompetence of the Secretary of State, much more money will be available for the dial-a-ride scheme and other schemes? That is a fact, and not scaremongering.

Will you confirm, Mr. Speaker, that the purpose of the sub judice rule is to protect juries from being improperly influenced and that the rule has no relevance to a civil case, when a judge hearing an appeal is specifically precluded from referring to Hansard? It is about time that Ministers, especially those in the Department of Transport, were responsible for their actions and stopped hiding behind their own cowardice.

Mr. Speaker: The sub judice rule would apply to civil cases.

Mrs. Chalker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall be guided by you. One of the problems of the dial-a-ride scheme—[Interruption.] If the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) would listen, I might be able to give him an answer to his question. The point about the dial-a-ride scheme is that we must effectively serve the needs of disabled people. Their needs can be best identified by those who are closest to them at local level. We are seeking to obtain the best value for money so that dial-a-ride can best help those who cannot get on conventional transport, and we shall continue to do that.

Mr. Snape: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you accept a point of order?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Not now. I shall hear points of order later.

Later:—

Mr. Snape: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During an earlier exchange I referred to the judgment by the court last Friday that the Secretary of State for Transport had acted in taking from the Greater London Council the sum of £50 million to fund London Regional Transport. The Secretary of State's reply during that exchange was that the matter was sub judice.

"unlawfully, irrationally and procedurally improperly"

First, my information is that by lunchtime today no official notice of appeal had been received by the court. Is the matter sub judice because the Secretary of State says so or because of some action taken by the Department of Transport?

Secondly, I understand that any press inquiries about the original court case made to the Department of Transport over the weekend were deflected by that Department on the ground that the matter was sub judice.

Thirdly, is it fair or proper for Ministers to hide behind the sub judice rule, when the purpose of that rule is to prevent the improper influencing of members of the jury rather than to prevent a judge from reaching a decision on the merits of a case?

If the House is not allowed to call Ministers to account, there is little purpose in Question Time or in asking Secretaries of State to come before the House.

Mr. Ridley rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the Secretary of State answers, perhaps I could clarify the issue. The resolution of the House on 23 July 1963 makes it clear that matters awaiting or under adjudication in a civil court should not be referred to in any question to a Minister, including supplementary questions, and this rule applies during the period when notice of appeal is given and until that notice of appeal has been decided. I am not aware whether the notice of appeal has been given.

Mr. Ridley: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have given notice to the court of intention to appeal. That is not the same as formal notice of appeal, but, as far as I am concerned—I am not talking about Opposition Members—it would clearly be improper for me to respond in any way on the substance of the matters about which we have given notice to appeal. Perhaps I should not have used the phrase "sub judice", but that is why I refused to comment on the points of substance.

Mr. Snape: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask you to give us a ruling as to when the sub judice rule applies? Does it apply when a Minister says that his Department intends, at some unspecified time, to appeal against a judgment with which he disagrees and as a result of which he has been found to be acting or does it come into effect when a physical application is made to a court that the original judgment be set aside?

Mr. Speaker: As I understand it, the matter is sub judice when a formal notice of appeal has been given.

Mr. Snape: Then, further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker, surely the Secretary of State is accountable for his actions and should have replied to the questions put to him during Question Time. As, in my limited experience, this situation is unprecedented, I ask you to allow an extension of Question Time so that the Secretary of State can be held to account for those unlawful, irrational and procedurally improper actions of which he has been found guilty by a court. When one reflects on the odium that the Government have poured on elected members of the GLC because of their attempts to run public passenger transport in London, it makes one feel that it is grossly improper to allow the Secretary of State to get away with hiding behind a sub judice rule which, as you have just ruled, does not exist.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House knows that I am not responsible for answers or supplementary answers from the Front Bench. I cannot help the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Tony Banks: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that we have exhausted this subject.

Mr. Banks rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already said that I cannot help the hon. Gentleman. I cannot allow an extension of Question Time. We have a busy day ahead of us.

Mr. Snape: Further to that point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot help the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Snape: I have a different question.

Mr. Speaker: Well, ask it.

Mr. Snape: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not get any pleasure from doing this at this time of the day. However, you ruled that if a matter was sub judice the Secretary of State could not be expected to reply to questions on it. We have just heard that the matter is not sub judice, but the Secretary of State is still refusing to answer the question. I appreciate that you cannot tell the Secretary of State when or whether to answer a question in the House. However, I hope you will agree that it is a gross abuse of the proceedings of the House for the Secretary of State to claim something that is false. I am not allowed, by the rules of the House, to say that the Secretary of State was telling lies, but I am bound to say that I would have great difficulty in finding any other way to describe his conduct this afternoon. I am asking you, Mr. Speaker, as the protector of the rights of all hon. Members, both Front and Back-Bench Members, to give a specific ruling that the Secretary of State is wrong and to call him to account and ask him what he is prepared to do about it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have given a factual ruling. I cannot go any further. The Secretary of State is responsible for what he says in answer to a question. He can answer it, but he need not do so, and that is a matter for him.

Mr. Ridley: Perhaps I might help. It is for you to rule, Mr. Speaker, whether a matter is sub judice. I made it clear during Question Time, and I repeat it now, that, as I have given notice of my intention to appeal, I shall not reply to questions that would prejudice that appeal when it comes on. That does not apply to the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape), but it does apply to me.

Mr. Tony Banks: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you give us your guidance on another point? Although you cannot require the Secretary of State to say anything specific about this matter, will you ensure that in both the Local Government Bill Committee tomorrow and in the rate support grant debate on Wednesday—because this judgment has an impact on the proceedings on both those measures—no one will be banned from saying something on the ground that the matter is sub judice, when it is clearly not sub judice?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The sub judice rule would not apply to legislation anyway, so the matter is open to the hon. Gentleman.

British Rail (Ancillary Services)

12. Mr. Tracey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to discuss with the chairman of British Rail progress on contracting out ancillary services on the railways.

Mr. Ridley: It has long been British Rail's policy to procure its supplies through competition. I am glad to say that the board has now decided to extend competition to the provision of support services. It has drawn up criteria to establish this competition on fair and equal terms and I will arrange to put copies of the criteria in the library.

Mr. Tracey: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that answer. I should like to concentrate the attention of my right hon. Friend and the chairman of British Rail on catering services on British Rail trains and stations. I believe that they will find a considerable appetite for change among the public.

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is right. So far, hardly any catering on the trains, and not all that much on the stations, is let out to competitive tender. The new criteria, which I urge my hon. Friend to study when he obtains his copy from the Library, will give the private sector the rules of the game, showing how the private sector may apply to British Rail to be allowed to bid for contracts to carry out catering—I hope to the general gastronomic satisfaction of all rail passengers.

British Railways Board

13. Mr. Ron Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many meetings he has had with the chairman of the British Railways Board since 1 October; and what subjects were discussed.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): My right hon. Friend and I have had four meetings with the chairman since 1 October last. We have discussed a wide range of subjects of mutual interest, including investment.

Mr. Lewis: At the meetings with the chairman of the board, did the Minister and his superiors discuss the question of safety on British Railways? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in the railway fraternity today there are some misgivings about the lack of maintenance of the old vehicles that are now running? Is he further aware that many trains are running late mainly because of a lack of normal maintenance procedures? At his next meeting with British Rail will he bring that matter up? Is he further aware that today on British Rail men and women work more overtime than is normal? Would it not be better to pay them a decent rate of pay and to employ more people?

Mr. Mitchell: The level of maintenance of rolling stock is a matter for British Rail management, and I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's point to the attention of the chairman. British Rail has embarked on a major programme of investment in new rolling stock. I have today written to Bob Reid, the chairman, approving investment in 240 medium-weight sprinter DMUs at a cost of about £60 million.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875

53. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Attorney-General how many persons were prosecuted in the Crown court in 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively, for offences contrary to section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875.

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): Offences under this section are purely summary and not justiciable in the first instance in the Crown court. Proceedings under this section are ordinarily instituted by the police and not by the Director. One prosecution was commenced in 1982, and two in 1983. Equivalent figures for 1984 are not yet available, but since 13 March 1984 275 people have been charged under this section.

Mr. Carlile: First, I am grateful to the Attorney-General for his correction about the mode of trial, which I accept. Does he agree that there is an urgent need for an early review of public order offences? Does he further agree that the revival of a previously disused public order offence specifically for the purpose of charging pickets in the miners' strike is liable to exacerbate already difficult circumstances unnecessarily?

The Attorney-General: The Home Secretary is conducting a review of the public order aspects of the law. The offence covered by section 7, of which the hon. and learned Gentleman disapproves, is not one which should or could be outside the criminal law. The value of a law is not measured in inverse proportion to the length of time it has been enacted. There are three grades of unlawful assembly, for example, which the Law Commission recommended, of which the hon. and learned Gentleman is no doubt aware. Those matters are being considered by the Home Secretary, who, I hope, will be able to deal with them shortly.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that this piece of legislation came into effect precisely to deal with the sort of intimidation that we are seeing at the moment? Can he assure me that he has had consultations with chief constables about obtaining evidence from working miners to the effect that the National Union of Mineworkers' leadership is organising a conspiracy? Will he take this opportunity to encourage working miners to come forward with further evidence, which will enable the conviction of the ringleaders to take place so that my constituents, who, even today, are visiting me because they cannot get to work without suffering from intimidation, can get justice?

The Attorney-General: It is not for me to have conferences with chief constables. That would be a matter, if appropriate, for the Home Secretary. It is true that there is a dearth of evidence that would be necessary if, for example, the Director of Public Prosecutions were seeking to initiate proceedings for conspiracy under section 7. He would need to have evidence which, at the moment, is not available. I have no doubt that the chief constables are carrying out their duties properly. I would welcome any working miner who has evidence of an offence under section 7 making that evidence available to the police.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Surely the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) has the better point here. The use of the legislation in recent times has concerned solely industrial disputes. There is a real fear and danger that it will be seen as partisan, and that respect for law and order will be undermined for a considerable period in communities where such a law is used.

The Attorney-General: I congratulate the hon. Member on his appointment to the Opposition Front Bench. I hope that he will enjoy it.

The 1875 Act was designed exactly for this sort of industrial dispute. I cannot imagine occasions on which it would be used other than in the course of industrial disputes. As I said in answer to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), I cannot believe that the criminal law could be effective without at least having the section 7 offence or one similar to it.

Price Waterhouse (Sequestration)

54. Mr. Adley asked the Attorney-General what recent discussions he has had with Price Waterhouse about sequestration; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I have not had any discussions with Price Waterhouse since my statement to the House on 11 December. I have nothing to add to what I told the House in that statement.

Mr. Adley: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the National Union of Mineworkers and its Labour party allies are doing their best to put about the story that it is the Government who are somehow instigating the legal actions? Therefore, will the Attorney-General—and his right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench and in the Government—take every opportunity to remind the public that this is not the case, and that the actions are being brought by working miners who feel that Mr. Scargill and his colleagues are purloining the union funds in a disgraceful and illegal way, in the light of the fact that there has been no ballot?

The Attorney-General: My hon. Friend is right. Last Friday there were three different actions before the High Court, in each of which the plaintiffs were working miners, some from south Wales and some from other mining areas.

The sequestration—and the order and the indemnity that I gave arising from it—was not for the benefit of the plaintiffs. It arose simply from a breach of an order of the court that amounted to contempt of court. In my role as guardian of the public interest I thought it necessary that I act to avoid the real risk that the order of the court could be flouted.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Attorney-General aware that he can try as hard as he likes to suggest that the Government are not involved in the court cases, but that when the public realise that the working miners' committee has been advised by two people who have served their apprenticeships at No. 10 under the Prime Minister, and take into account all the other people who have been assisting in the legal battles of working miners, they will be bound to come to the conclusion that the Government are heavily involved in the court actions? The Government are in it up to the neck, with a view to trying to smash the NUM, but they will not succeed. The Government see it as a prelude to smashing the whole of the TUC.

The Attorney-General: I am not sure whether it would be possible for a miner Member of Parliament to pay a greater insult to fellow miners than to say that they are acting under the advice and guidance of the Tory party. It is simply not true.

Latent Damage

55. Mr. Chapman asked the Attorney-General when he expects to conclude consultations following publication of the 24th report of Lord Chancellor's Law Reform Committee on latent damage.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): The Lord Chancellor's Department has asked for any comments on the Law Reform Committee's report to be sent to it by the end of March.

Mr. Chapman: If it is my right hon. and learned Friend's intention to introduce legislation in this Session of Parliament, he will know that amendment and clarification of the law, particularly relating to latent defects in buildings, is urgently required by all those involved in the process of construction, not least by the owners and occupiers of buildings.

The Solicitor-General: The Lord Chancellor is well aware of the importance that is attached by many people, in the professions for which my hon. Friend speaks, to the contents of the report and to the subject generally. The Lord Chancellor is, however, equally determined to ensure that the public have an opportunity to comment upon the recommendations of the report. He has asked for those comments by the end of March. It is very important that any legislation should not be found to suffer from a latent defect. Therefore, I am afraid that the Lord Chancellor cannot give the undertaking for which my hon. Friend asks.

Price Waterhouse (Sequestration)

56. Mr. Winnick asked the Attorney-General if any public funds have yet been paid to Price Waterhouse in regard to its role as sequestrators of the National Union of Mineworkers' funds.

The Attorney-General: No public funds have been paid to the sequestrators.

Mr. Winnick: Will the Attorney-General bear in mind that all the points made originally by the Opposition when the Government's decision became known remain justified, and that the amount of bias in the decision of the Government, who are acting in a way totally different from the way in which they have acted in any other circumstance, shows only too clearly that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should think about the matter again?

The Attorney-General: I ask the hon. Gentleman to read again the short speech, much interrupted, by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General when he wound up the debate on 19 December.

Mr. Spencer: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that there is a need for the High Court to have a permanent fund available to it for use in sequestration proceedings? Will he discuss with the Lord Chancellor how such a permanent fund might be set up?

The Attorney-General: Certainly, that is one of the matters that has arisen as a result of this quite exceptional action, which is without any precedent, as everybody knows. No doubt I shall have the opportunity to discuss it with the Lord Chancellor.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid (Asia)

60. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of the overseas aid budget goes to Commonwealth countries in Asia; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): In 1983 some £187 million, amounting to 32 per cent. of British bilateral aid, went to Commonwealth countries in Asia. Over that period £125 million, or some 30 per cent., of our multilateral aid contributions went to the same countries.

Mr. Proctor: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the real shortage in those countries is of entrepreneurs? What part does the aid budget play in the creation of more entrepreneurs in those countries?

Mr. Raison: I do not think that it is as true of the Asian countries as it is of the African countries that there is a grave shortage of entrepreneurs. On the other hand, in one way or another, the aid programme provides scope for entrepreneurs, and we stress the importance of countries reducing their excessive overdependence on parastatals, which characterises so many of them at present.

Nicaragua

61. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will consider increasing aid to Nicaragua.

Mr. Raison: Her Majesty's Government have no plans to increase the level of their bilateral aid. Nicaragua does, however, benefit substantially from the European Community's aid programme.

Mr. Dubs: Is the Minister aware that Britain's bilateral aid currently stands at around £25,000 a year and that that sum seems to be very trivial in relation to the needs of the country? May I ask the Minister to reconsider increasing aid to Nicaragua, because if he does not do so many people will think that his motives are political spite rather than a realisation of the needs of the people of Nicaragua?

Mr. Raison: The fact of the matter is that Nicaragua is by no means the poorest of the countries in central America, and is not among the poorest 50 countries as defined by the World Bank. Our intention is to concentrate our aid as far as possible on the poorest countries, and Nicaragua does not fall into that category.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Does the Minister accept that, apart from humanitarian considerations, the recent history of liberation movements and other such organisations in Africa shows that if we in the West do not give aid to Nicaragua or countries like it, it is almost inevitable that such countries will be put into the hands of the Communist bloc, which will certainly aid them?

Mr. Raison: I can only repeat that it is not possible for the United Kingdom to undertake substantial aid programmes to every country in the world. We have our priorities, and of course countries with historic connections rate high in our priorities, by and large. Nicaragua is not one of the poorest countries.

Ethiopia

62. Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has called on the Ethiopian Government to negotiate safe passage with the liberation fronts in Eritrea and Tigre to ensure the distribution of food aid to those areas.

Mr. Raison: It would not be realistic or appropriate to expect the Ethiopian Government to negotiate with rebel movements in ways that might involve recognition of their claims. We have asked the Ethiopian Government on several occasions to ensure that food and other relief supplies reach all areas of the country. For some areas that is carried out most effectively by the voluntary agencies.

Mr. Holland: Surely the Minister is aware that the situation in key food distribution areas such as Makale is getting worse, not better, and that dozens of children are dying each day in such distribution centres, as many British people saw last week on television. The Minister has been to Makale and knows the problem there. The Government do not control the surrounding areas—the drought areas. Why is it inappropriate for the right hon. Gentleman to bring pressure on the Government? If he does not do so, or does not get the Council of Ministers of the EC to do so, there will be tens of thousands of needless deaths in the days and months to come.

Mr. Raison: With our partners we are now providing substantial quantities of food aid to Ethiopia, and that is as it should be. We make sure that the food reaches the area around Makale. It is difficult—we do not deny it for one minute—to see that it is distributed to all those who come under the rebels' authority. On the other hand, substantial numbers of people are moving in from the rebel-held areas to Makale to get food there.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: With regard to my right hon. Friend's original answer, will he deny that the Royal Air Force is to be withdrawn from helping in Ethiopia?

Mr. Raison: We have not yet made a decision about that. The RAF has done enormously valuable work. We have to consider what is the best use of our resources.

Falkland Islands

64. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is (a) the total cost of the Brewster housing project in the Falklands, (b) how many Brewster houses are occupied and unoccupied, respectively, and (c) what are the categories of occupiers of the Brewster houses.

Mr. Raison: The final cost of the project will not be known until details of local expenditure on site services and infrastructure and other related claims have been submitted. At present, 33 houses are occupied and the breakdown of occupants is as follows: 13 islanders, 13 personnel on contract to the Falkland Islands Government, three immigrants and four diplomatic service and Ministry of Defence personnel. The Falkland Islands Government estimate that the remaining 21 houses should be occupied by the end of this month.

Mr. Dalyell: Is the cost above or below £100,000 per house, and does the Minister regard that as value for money?

Mr. Raison: It is above £100,000 per house, but it must be remembered that that includes the cost of transporting materials there, the preparation of the sites, provision of water, electricity and so on. The Falkland Islands Government have also acquired ownership of other assets such as plant, equipment and an accommodation block as part of that process.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Minister recall that the Select Committee on Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs was dissatisfied with the arrangements made by his Department for tendering for those projects and their subsequent administration? Will he consider that report and ensure that in any future emergency of this kind much better and clearer arrangements are made?

Mr. Raison: I have studied the report, although it relates to events that took place before I took up my present post. I accept that we must consider carefully what can be learnt from this episode, but I do not accept that the whole thing has been a waste of time and money.

Ethiopia

65. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the additional quantities of food being provided for Ethiopia by the Common Market will be from additional resources or from reducing aid to other countries.

Mr. Raison: The cost of the 1·2 million tonnes of grain pledged by the European Council on 4 December for African countries affected by drought will be met by transfers from other parts of the Community budget not related to aid, from the unallocated emergency provision of the European development fund and from the 1985 Community food aid programme. In addition, member states will make available directly more than one third of the total amount. The British share of those actions will be met from the public expenditure provision for overseas aid.

Mr. Taylor: Is it not highly disturbing that the total amount of food that the Common Market plans to send to Ethiopia next year is less than the amount sent every six weeks to the Soviet Union? What justification can there be for anyone going without food in Ethiopia when such unmanageable surpluses are being sent to the Soviet Union at vast expense to the British taxpayer?

Mr. Raison: My hon. Friend should realise that the quantity of aid pledged by the Community to Ethiopia and other parts of Africa is very substantial. He should also realise that the sending of Common Market grain surpluses is not a matter of giving something away free. It involves substantial costs — about £250 per tonne of grain transported and delivered in Ethiopia. The equation is thus more complicated than my hon. Friend suggests.

International Planned Parenthood Federation

66. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what amount the United Kingdom will contribute to the International Planned Parenthood Federation in 1985-86.

Mr. Raison: We have agreed to contribute £3·75 million to the International Planned Parenthood Federation in 1985.

Mr. Deakins: The Minister must be aware of the total withdrawal of funding to the IPPF next year by the United States. Will he bear that shortfall in mind, as the IPPF contributes to many valuable programmes in the developing world and it would be appalling if that work had to be substantially reduced?

Mr. Raison: I am aware of the cut in support from the United States, but the £3·75 million to which I have referred is an increase from £3 million in 1984, so I believe that we are doing our bit.

Turks and Caicos Islands (Airport)

68. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement concerning the closure of the new airport at Providenciales in the Turks and Caicos Islands.

Mr. Raison: The airport was closed to scheduled jet services from 29 November to 19 December while maintenance work was undertaken on the runway. It is now open and operating normally.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Minister recall that another report of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee expressed dissatisfaction with his Ministry's arrangements for the construction of the runway? Will he assure the House that he will investigate the events of that time and the effect that they may or may not have had on the closure of that controversial airport?

Mr. Raison: I do not believe that the events of that time had any effect on the recent developments. I am advised that it is not unusual for such cracks to appear. The runway is now operating successfully and so, I believe, will the Club Med project.

Sterling (Exchange Rate)

3.38 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook) (by private notice) asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the sterling exchange rate and the prospects for interest rates in Great Britain.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): Movements of the exchange rates on the markets over the past few days have been fully reported.

As my predecessor made clear to the House on a previous occasion, successive Governments have made it their practice not to make statements about the level of the exchange rate; and like him I do not intend to depart from that practice.

So far as interest rates are concerned, the Bank of England announced this morning that its minimum rate for lending to the discount market would be 12 per cent. This demonstrates the Government's resolve to maintain sound monetary conditions and to take whatever steps are necessary to ensure continued success in the battle against inflation.

Mr. Hattersley: Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer recognise that today's events demonstrate that the Government's economic policy is a shambles, and that its inadequacy has been emphasised by his incompetence and vacillation during the past week? Will he confirm that interest rates now stand at the figure which the Government inherited in 1979? We have had public spending cuts, and unemployment has been pushed up to record levels, but the central objective of lower interest rates has not been achieved.

Secondly, what, if anything, is the Chancellor's exchange rate policy? Will the pound soon be left once more to market forces, or is today's open intervention an admission that his supine inactivity during the past fortnight has contributed to today's crisis and will result in a certain increase in mortgage rates during the next 14 days? Will he have the grace to admit that a policy which he repeated and confirmed only a week ago—leaving interest rates to be determined solely by market forces —has been abandoned, in disaster for the economy and in humiliation for the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Mr. Lawson: I note, as the House will have noted, that the right hon. Gentleman described the level of interest rates that we inherited from his Government as a shambles. The objective of Government policy is to reduce inflation, to hold it down and to reduce it still further. We have succeeded in doing that, but the Labour Government failed conspicuously to do it, despite the fact that, on several occasions, the right hon. Gentleman declared that to be the central objective of their policy.

As to open intervention, I should remind the right hon. Gentleman that, when the new arrangements for monetary control were published on 5 August 1981 in a Treasury press notice, the relevant section read as follows:

"The Bank will cease to post a continuous Minimum Lending Rate from 20 August, as this would be inconsistent with the objective of the new arrangements to give the market more influence over the structure of interest rates. The option"— [Interruption.] Hon. Members should be patient. I continue:

"The option will, however, be retained for use in some circumstances of announcing in advance the minimum rate which for a short period ahead the Bank would apply to any lending to the market."

That is precisely what happened today. It was my decision on the advice of the Governor of the Bank of England.

Finally, I should say that several factors have been at play here, one of which is uncertainty about oil prices. Another is the sharp rise of the dollar against other currencies. A third factor has been doubts about the Government's resolve to persist with their counter-inflationary policy in the light of the continued pleas for still higher public borrowing and expenditure. The Government's decision today demonstrates that those siren voices cannot be listened to if inflation is to be brought under control. That is the purpose of our action.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): Is it not essential to consider recent events in an international context? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the high rate of the dollar has been a fundamental aspect of the problem? Given that that is so, will he make renewed representations to the United States Administration on the need to reduce the American deficit and interest rates?

Mr. Lawson: My right hon. Friend is right. That is the view not only of him, myself and the Government, but of most European Governments. As my right hon. Friend is aware, I shall be flying to Washington the day after tomorrow — [Laughter] — for a discussion with the American Treasury Secretary and other finance Ministers. These matters will be very much under discussion.

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): To avoid further damage, will the Chancellor try to reverse the clear impression that he has given to foreign exchange operators in recent weeks that he has been relying on the weakness of the pound against the dollar in respect of our North sea oil earnings in order to make partisan measures in his forthcoming Budget? Will he make it clear at last that he has no intention of using adventitious and possibly short-term exchange positions to make long-term Budget decisions?

Mr. Lawson: I have given no indications of the kind that the hon. Gentleman is referring to.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): As the main influences on sterling—the strong dollar and the oil price—are largely outside the Government's control, and as the outlook for inflation is very good, can we assume that the hike in interests rates will be relatively short-lived? Would the situation be rather smoother in the future if we now joined the European monetary system as a full member?

Mr. Lawson: On my right hon. Friend's first question, interest rates will obviously remain at this level for no longer than is necessary to secure proper monetary control, proper monetary conditions and a continuation of our success against inflation. They will have to continue just as long as is necessary to achieve that.

The question of full membership of the European monetary system is continually under review, but that is a financial discipline of its own kind, which requires the use of interest rates whenever necessary to maintain a particular parity.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Why is it that, three years after abandoning minimum lending rate, the Chancellor is returning to it? Is it because a clear signal was required that the Government have an interest rate and exchange rate policy? Does not that show up the irrelevance of the Government's money supply policies?

Mr. Lawson: Not at all. As I showed with my quotation from the press notice issued when the new arrangements were set in place in 1981, this was deliberately retained for use in circumstances where it was necessary for a clear signal to be given of the Government's policy and resolve. That has been given. We will return immediately to arrangements that do not involve the posting of a particular minimum lending rate.

Mr. Peter Hordern (Horsham): Since the new level of interest rates must, at least in part, reflect the expansion of credit on the broad measurement, does my right hon. Friend still think it appropriate that there should be £1·5 billion available for the reduction of taxation in the Budget?

Mr. Lawson: I have as yet no reason to depart from the indication that I gave at the time of the autumn statement in November, but, of course, I shall be reviewing it, as I said at the time, before the Budget and it would be very unwise to assume that that amount of tax reductions can necessarily be given. But these matters will have to be reviewed at the time of the Budget and I think that there is no point in speculating about that now.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer agree that, provided that the Government can fund their borrowing requirement and meet their sight liabilities, which are their first obligation, nothing but benefit can accrue to the economy and to the unemployed from the prospect of a fall in oil prices and the associated fall in the exchange rate of sterling?

Mr. Lawson rose——

Hon. Members: In theory, yes.

Mr. Lawson: I have always understood that it was part of the right hon. Gentleman's credo not to express particular views about the desirability of particular price levels for any particular commodities—that goes for oil as well. I believe that disruptive movements in either direction are harmful to the world economy and to the United Kingdom economy.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Do not the events of the past few days show that it was always possible and right for the Government to take account of movements in exchange rates in deciding their financial policy, but that, equally, it is not sensible to isolate one target as the benchmark, be it the public sector borrowing requirement, the exchange rate or any other shibboleth?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is correct, in the sense that a number of indicators of monetary conditions have to be used in assessing the conditions appropriate for a continued decline in inflation and a continued economic recovery of the kind that we are enjoying and will continue to enjoy. Indeed, that recovery compares far better against the performance of the rest of the world, and particularly of the rest of the countries of the European Community, than was the case when the Labour Government were in office.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): What does the Chancellor expect the effect of these higher interest rates to be on the level of unemployment?

Mr. Lawson: The one thing that would really cause a sharp increase in the level of unemployment would be a resurgence of inflation, which is precisely what would follow from the policies advocated by Opposition Members and which is precisely what we are determined not to indulge in.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): What influence has the miners' strike had on the recent fall in the value of sterling? Does not my right hon. Friend agree that there are underlying factors that justify a higher level of sterling, such as a balance of payments surplus and a low rate of inflation?

Mr. Lawson: As the House knows, one of the problems that we face is that public borrowing this year is running ahead of what we had planned, partly because of the cost of the coal strike but partly for other reasons. But this only reinforces our resolve to keep public expenditure firmly under control. With regard to my hon. Friend's second question, there are indeed several very positive factors, and such fluctuations in the market place do tend to be excessive from time to time.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend accept that most of us would agree that he was quite right not to throw reserves at the sterling rate, a practice which proved so disastrous in 1973-74? Bearing that in mind, does he accept that some of us are disappointed at this departure from the free market economy and free market exchange workings? If my right hon. Friend is right, and this is meant to be only a short-term move in interest rates, will he—as we have already made a dent in the free market — ask the building societies not to take any precipitate action to increase the cost of house borrowing for at least a month?

Mr. Lawson: Of course, the level of mortgage rates is a matter for the building societies and not for me, but I am sure that they will have heard what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Is not the truth of the matter that the panic measures that the Government have had to take today are a direct consequence of the complacency and contradictory statements that we have heard in recent times from Government Departments? Can the Chancellor explain why, in recent days, different briefings have emanated from No. 10 Downing street and the Treasury? Will he confirm that his statement and the action taken by his Department today is supported by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Lawson: Of course, the measure that I have announced today is part of a policy that is the policy of the entire Government. I have read some of the stories that have appeared in the newspapers with both amazement and dismay, but I do not think that this is the first time that Governments have had that experience when reading newspaper stories.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson (New Forest): May I warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend on his firm action today? A strong and internationally respected currency is an essential weapon in the fight against inflation. However, as oil prices are a significant factor in achieving that goal, will he ensure that the British National Oil Corporation does not take unilateral action which could affect prices so that it could be regarded as an unfriendly act by other producers and so lead to an oil price war?

Mr. Lawson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his opening remarks. The second part of his question is not strictly speaking a matter for me. But it is the Government's policy — which has been pursued for many years and which was, I believe, held by the previous Government—that United Kingdom oil prices should be in line with the market and that there should not be artificial prices. Nevertheless, I think that BNOC realises that it has a duty to conduct its day-to-day policy in a way that causes as little political or economic disruption as possible.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Will the Chancellor stop blaming everyone but himself? Does he not recall that on 29 July 1980 the Prime Minister told the House that the pound was high and strengthening, because

"investors overseas believe that our economic policies are right, that they will succeed, and that under a Tory Government Britain is worth investing in."—[Official Report, 29 July 1980; Vol. 989, c. 1305.]

Now that the pound is half as high, what does the Chancellor think is the markets' verdict on his Government's economic failure?

Mr. Lawson: If we are going to talk about quotations, I was interested to read—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] I have already answered the question. As the House knows well, there are basically three factors affecting the exchange rate at the present time. There is the oil price weakening, the strength of the dollar against all currencies, not just against sterling, and the doubts about whether monetary conditions are fully consistent with a lower rate of inflation and, indeed, whether public expenditure may not be running excessively high. I emphasise the last point in particular. There is no way in which we can consistently be getting inflation down with scope for increases in public expenditure or increases in public borrowing. I think that that must be fully understood.

I have a quotation from the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) at the Aneurin Bevan lecture on 13 October 1984—about three months ago. He said:

"Of course, we need an exchange rate which encourages exports rather than assists imports. And some adjustment in the value of sterling may therefore be necessary—at least against the weighted average of currencies."

As there has been a reduction since then of 6 per cent., is that adjustment bigger or smaller than the adjustment that he sought?

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): Is it not about time that we told our American allies that their continued failure to deal with the strength of the dollar is an unfriendly act which makes a mockery of economic interdependence? Will the Chancellor give an undertaking to the House that when he meets the new American Secretary of the Treasury later this week he will underline the fact that that feeling is widespread in the British Parliament?

Mr. Lawson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Certainly, I think that I shall be underlining, as others will underline, the need for the United States to take measures to reduce its budget deficit.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): If, as is manifest, the pound has slumped against the dollar partly because of a mild softening in world oil prices, what steps does the Chancellor intend to take in the longer-term to deal with the crisis which is already on the horizon — that declining oil production will reveal to the world the disastrous state of the United Kingdom balance of payments?

Mr. Lawson: Oil production in this country is going to be very substantial for many years to come. I think that it is foolish of the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) to assume that it will suddenly disappear. It will be a major factor in our economy for many years to come.

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): Is my right hon. Friend aware that on this side of the House his move is seen as both inevitable and correct? When my right hon. Friend goes to the United States in two days time, will he draw the attention of Mr. Baker, the new Secretary of the Treasury, to the fact that it is in the best interests of the United States itself that the inevitable continuing rise of the dollar is halted, so that international trade, particularly between western Europe and the United States, is carried out on a more even keel?

Mr. Lawson: Sooner or later, I believe, the value of the dollar in the foreign exchange markets will decline, but it is impossible to say when that will occur. One of the problems about much of the criticism from Opposition Members is that they find it impossible to understand the nature of the markets and the fact that we have to conduct our policies within a context of markets which are often wayward and unpredictable.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that this is a private notice question and an extension of Question Time. There is an important debate tomorrow on the reduction of unemployment through public investment. Although the motion is not yet on the Order Paper, I have no doubt that hon. Members will be able to allude to this matter in that debate.

WELSH AFFAIRS

Ordered,

That the matter of Regional Policy as it affects Wales, being a matter relating exclusively to Wales, be referred to the Welsh Grand Committee for its consideration.—[Mr. Biffen.]

Orders of the Day

Trustee Savings Banks Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

4 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

May I begin by drawing the attention of the House to the White Paper—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will those hon. Members who are not remaining for the debate please leave the Chamber quietly?

Mr. Stewart: May I draw to the attention of the House the White Paper which was published on 18 December 1984, which sets out the proposals for reorganising the trustee savings banks? That White Paper, which is the background to this Second Reading debate, contains a background to and history of the trustee savings bank movement and to the legislative arrangements which have applied to the trustee savings banks over many years. It also sets out the recent developments in the trustee savings banks leading up to the Bill and the further proposals which are described in the White Paper in the form of a letter from Sir John Read, the chairman of the central board of the trustee savings banks. That describes in particular the elements of the proposals which are not contained in the Bill.

Other documents which hon. Members may find relevant to the subject are available in the Library. They are the Treasury press notice of 18 December, a press notice of the same date by the trustee savings banks central board, the TSB group report for 1983, and the draft memorandum and articles of association of the TSB Group plc, as it is intended to be. That last item is optional reading, even for enthusiasts.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): There is usually a period after the publication of a White Paper when the public have time to digest its contents. Is it not a bit of an irrelevance to publish a White Paper when the Bill is introduced so quickly thereafter? Has the pushing forward of the Bill anything to do with the difficulties that the Government are running into over the privatisation of British Airways?

Mr. Stewart: The Government published the White Paper on the same day to explain the background to the Bill and to set out the matters that I have just described. I should have thought that that would have been helpful not only to hon. Members but also to those outside who take an interest in the proposals. The proposals themselves have been known in general outline for a couple of years or more. It is convenient for the House to have before it the way in which the Bill is formulated and the other matters which Sir John Read describes, and the White Paper fulfils that function.

The Bill deals with only those parts of the proposals which are the responsibility of Government. The trustee savings banks themselves are primarily responsible for the arrangements about their own future. In particular, they have direct and immediate responsibility for the reorganisation for the companies and bodies within the group to which the Bill refers. The production of the Bill and the bringing forward of the proposals is the consequence of a long period of discussion, including close consultation between the Government and the trustee savings banks.

The second paragraph of Sir John Read's letter in the White Paper says:

"I confirm that you have the full support of the TSB Group in promoting this Bill. In August 1982, after lengthy and very careful consideration of the options, both by the Treasury and within the TSB Group, I announced that the TSB Group wished to reorganise into a Companies Act structure and to acquire additional capital and a wide pattern of ownership by issuing shares to the public. As the main purpose of the Bill is to permit the TSBs to take these steps, we naturally welcome it."

As I said when the Bill was published, I am glad that it has proved possible to introduce it into Parliament during this Session. That enables us to complete the statutory arrangements for enabling Trustee savings banks to obtain full private sector status without delay. I am anxious that they should be in a position to realise their potential and to play a full part in the development of the banking sector. That will increase competition and consumer choice in retail banking at an important stage in the evolution of financial markets.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): The Minister will be well aware of the report of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on the Royal Bank of Scotland which sets out the desirability of the Scottish banking sector being retained with its full integrity and autonomy. As I read the Bill and the White Paper, the autonomous trustee savings banks in Scotland will be subsumed into a new company, the TSB Group, which will have overall authority. The TSB in Scotland has had a much larger and more important role to play than the TSB in England and Wales, as I think the Minister will agree. As a result, we shall see the bank disappearing and the overall effect will be a diminution in the Scottish investment sector and the control of investment operations within Scotland. Would not that be a bad thing, given the overweening centralisation of the British economy and financial sector in London?

Mr. Stewart: Under the existing structure with the central board, there is already a good deal of centralisation and co-operation between the individual trustee savings banks. As I understand it, there is unlikely to be any diminution of that after the reorganisation. The structural changes are needed for other reasons. If the hon. Gentleman is worried about that point, I hope that he will consult the trustee savings banks.

I visited the TSB in Scotland a few months ago and I was impressed by what I saw. In no sense did I get the feeling that the Scottish indentity or the bank's independence was thought to be in any sort of jeopardy as a result of the proposals. I certainly do not believe that to be the case. Indeed, the savings bank movement originated, like many good things in the financial sector, in Scotland. I recognise that after reorganisation the TSB will want and need to retain a substantial measure of its identity. But the proposals that we are considering today are the culmination of a process in which the trustee savings banks themselves have recognised that more co-operation and communication between them is needed. Therefore, it is partly their own banking needs which have led to the present proposals.

Mr. Wilson: The Minister gave an assurance that there would be no diminution in the level of centralisation compared with the previous structure, which I did not entirely welcome and which was not exactly what I had in mind in seeking that assurance. Does he recognise that there is a difference between co-operation, which can be desirable, especially in the confederal arrangement which existed before, and one company, one integrated shareholding, where the majority of the shareholders throughout the United Kingdom will have the right to take investment decisions which could result in the dismantling of the trustee savings banks in Scotland in five to 20 years' time as a result of a change of policy?

Therefore, will he consider building into the Bill something along the lines of that which has been given to the TSB in the Channel Islands, where there is to be a separate shareholding which will safeguard some of the autonomy of the TSB there? It is important that there should be something in the Bill to safeguard the Scottish situation.

Mr. Stewart: I hesitate to be drawn into a long debate on that question at this stage. I shall be interested to hear what the hon. Gentleman says in his speech. Having listened carefully to his intervention, I think it might be helpful if I covered the remaining aspects with which I wish to deal, and, by leave, I shall reply at the end of the debate to the points that hon. Members make.

This legislation will also pave the way for the ownership of the TSBs to be established in the hands of the shareholders of the new group, with priority for those who, as depositors and staff, have contributed to the success of the TSBs. I welcome the opportunity that this will provide for spreading share ownership more widely and, in particular, for enabling those who have been involved in the business of the TSBs as customers and employees to invest directly in their future.

The Bill will enable the TSBs to reorganise on to the same basis as the major banks with which they compete in the high streets. The Bill is required to transfer the business of the existing TSBs into the new bodies being set up under the Companies Act framework and to make provision for a number of other specific aspects of the transition. I shall comment shortly on the provisions of the Bill.

Many of the proposals for the future of the TSB group do not require legislation. These are the responsibility of the TSBs and their central board, though the Government have been involved in the discussion of the overall strategy. The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson), may be aware that on a number of aspects of these proposals it is for the TSBs, rather than for me, to respond.

I do not propose to give, and I cannot give, assurances about the internal arrangements of the TSB group. However, I can emphasise that the arrangements which are permitted by the Bill and which the Bill empowers the TSBs to carry through have been discussed between the TSBs and the Government and are agreed by the management of the TSBs to be in the TSB interest.

Sir John Osborn (Sheffield, Hallam): While welcoming the Bill and my hon. Friend's remarks, may I ask if he is aware that some of us with an interest in the TSB and small banks generally believe that one of their great assets is that they have brought in the small saver? Has my hon. Friend had an assurance that the strong character of the TSB will continue, bearing in mind that it will be competing with building societies and other banks?

Mr. Stewart: I recognise the contribution which my hon. Friend and many other hon. Members have made to the TSB movement and the interest which they take in it. I share his concern that the TSBs should maintain their provision for the small saver and their local connections, and everything that I have heard in the discussions leading up to the introduction of the Bill convinces me that that is still the intention and purpose of those concerned with the TSBs, and I welcome that fact.

As soon as the proposed reorganisation is complete, the new TSB banking companies will apply for authorisation under the Banking Act, and the special arrangements for the supervision of the TSBs by the Treasury and other provisions in the Trustee Savings Banks Act which at present apply to the TSBs will come to an end. The new TSB banking companies will then have the same legal status as any Companies Act company and will be subject to the same legal and prudential requirements as other major banks in the United Kingdom.

It will be clear that the Bill is a technical document. Clause 1 sets out the definitions on which the rest of the Bill is based. The existing TSB group consists of the four existing trustee savings banks, the TSB central board and the subsidiary companies which they already own through Trustee Savings Banks (Holdings) Ltd., which is described as "the existing holding company."

The new TSB group will consist of the new holding company, in which shares are to be issued to the public, and its subsidiaries — that is, the new TSB banking companies and the specialist companies, which are identified in this context in the family trees on page 7 of the White Paper. The new holding company will be called TSB Group plc, although the Bill does not refer to it by name.

Mr. Craigen: As the term "trustee" has a particular meaning, are we to take it that the bank will be "TSB" and will not be "Trustee Savings bank"?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman was good enough to give me notice that he would raise that question. The last page of the White Paper contains a reference to that in paragraph 13 by Sir John Read:

"We intend for continuity purposes to retain 'Trustee Savings Bank' in the full legal title of the new banking subsidiaries."

I understand that there is no objection to the use of that word in this context, although it is a matter for the Department of Trade and Industry in relation to company names. I gather that there is no difficulty in the use of the word or in the use of the word "trust", which is frequently used in banking matters and for companies of that kind.

Clause 2 deals with the central board established by the Trustee Savings Banks Act 1976, on the Standing Committee on which I served. The central board will need to undertake a wide range of operations during the reorganisation and is therefore given additional powers as necessary for that purpose. Once the reorganisation is complete, the central board becomes redundant; therefore the Treasury is given power to bring the existence of the central board to an end.

Clause 3 is the central provision. It vests the business of the various bodies which comprise the existing TSB group into the appropriate parts of the new TSB group.

The central board holds a number of assets, liabilities and obligations, and these will be transferred to the new group holding company. The Bill transfers the business of each of the existing TSBs to the appropriate new banking company which is to replace it. Each of these companies will be a subsidiary of the holding company. The clause makes it clear that contracts of employment are not affected, so that employees will enjoy exactly the same terms of employment after the reorganisation as before.

Clause 4 deals with the running down and eventual dissolution of the existing TSBs, which will be no more than shells once their business has been transferred to the new TSB banking companies. It provides for the trustees to vacate office once any outstanding accounts have been drawn up, and empowers the Treasury to dissolve the TSBs by order. The Trustee Savings Bank Act 1981, which consolidated earlier legislation, will also become redundant. The Treasury is empowered to repeal that Act by order, subject to transitional and saving provisions as appropriate.

Clause 5, with schedule 2, contains a number of tax provisions the purpose of which is to ensure that the TSBs do not suffer adverse tax consequences in the reorganisation which would not have applied in a reorganisation involving bodies all of which came under the Companies Act.

Clause 6 follows the tradition of earlier TSB legislation in providing for the remaining members of a class of savings bank which was established under an Act of 1819 dealing with savings banks in Scotland. These banks are not trustee savings banks, although up to now they could convert into TSB status if they wished. At present there are two such banks, one of which has announced its intention to merge with a major Scottish commercial bank at the end of this month. When the Bill is enacted, these provisions will therefore apply to the one remaining member of the class, the Airdrie savings bank, which has a number of branches in the Glasgow area.

The effect of this clause, with schedule 3, is to rectify an error in the Banking Act 1979, an Act prepared by a Labour Government, though I accept that the omission was inadvertent. The Banking Act was drawn up in terms which precluded the 1819 savings banks from seeking authorisation from the Bank of England to take deposits.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Apart from a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, what is to prevent another clearing bank from taking over the TSB?

Mr. Stewart: In the immediate future, the structure prevents that. As the right hon. Gentleman will know from the White Paper and from information provided by the TSB, it is the intention, after the Bill is enacted, to issue shares which would be in the ownership of the TSBs in future. It is intended also—this is a matter for the TSB movement rather than for the Government—that for the first five years after it has become a private sector group there should be a limit on a shareholding by any one shareholder of 5 per cent. of the capital, and thereafter a limit of 15 per cent. It will be many years hence before the issue will arise whether the TSBs might be taken over by any other group.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): The Minister has stated the position as it is set out in the memorandum that accompanies the White Paper and the Bill, but that is not written into the Bill. The Bill does not lay down any provisions that would prevent a takeover of the sort that my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) has postulated.

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Lady is right to say that the Bill does not contain any such provisions. We are dealing with the intentions of the TSBs, and I think it proper that they should deal with their own affairs without the involvement of the Government.

Apart from dealing with the commencement and repeals in the usual way, clause 7 provides that the Bill will have direct effect on the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man. The island authorities involved have agreed that it is in everyone's interest that the reorganisation should proceed on the same basis and at the same time throughout the British Isles, even though in a number of respects the Bill contains matters which would normally be the subject of separate legislation on the islands, or at least an extension to the islands at the option of the local legislatures. I thank the island authorities for agreeing to this procedure. I readily acknowledge that the special circumstances which follow the pattern of earlier TSB Acts do not constitute a precedent detrimental to the constitutional position of the islands.

I shall mention briefly one or two matters that have been raised in public discussion of these proposals since their introduction. After a long and distinguished history as banks encouraging thrift and savings but with few other functions, the TSBs found it increasingly difficult to compete in the market place during the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s. The committee which was established in 1971 under Sir Harry Page was invited to consider the future of the TSBs and it recommended the development of their banking services. That was followed by the 1976 Act, which was introduced by the then Labour Government. That measure created the central board and permitted the TSBs to undertake new activities.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: The Page report suggested that there should be a third force. The first force consisted of the clearers and the second of the National Giro. The third force was the trustee savings banks, which would look after the local community and concentrate on small savers. I reaffirmed that from the same position which the hon. Gentleman now occupies. What has changed since then? What has happened to the third force?

Mr. Stewart: The third force can take different shapes at different times. The trustee savings banks were enabled by the Labour Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a member—this process is being taken further forward by the present Administration — to develop in the way they thought best in their own interests.

The background and the financial markets have changed a great deal since the early 1970s and so have the services that are expected by customers of different types of banks. Sir John Read comments in his letter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the White Paper:

> "The TSB group today is radically different from the TSB movement of ten years ago and has shown that it is fully capable of competing with other financial institutions in a fast-changing environment."

The way in which the TSB movement has been able to adapt itself and to develop its business is impressive. At the same time, it has retained many of the important traditional characteristics of a movement that concentrated on small savers and local communities.

Mr. Craigen: How will the introduction of shareholders looking for dividends help the average customer of the TSB?

Mr. Stewart: The proposed public issue of shares will complete the transition of the TSBs to a fully-fledged status in the private sector. That will assist all those who have anything to do with the movement by giving them access to capital markets and the accountability which presently is lacking. The public issue will be made possible by the Bill, but that will not be a matter for the Government. Dividend policy and future profitability will be matters for the TSBs. Surely a body of interested shareholders, particularly one that includes depositors and the staff, which will have priority when the issue is made —I hope that members of the staff will take up the shares on a substantial scale—will be the best way of ensuring an identity of interests between depositors and the staff of the banks which has been the strength of the movement in the past.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): Does my hon. Friend agree that the important point, which was missed by the interventions of the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) and the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen), is that the TSB movement comprises local people in almost every town and village in the country, and that their initiative has led to the Bill's introduction? They are the people who want it and they are the depositors. That is why things have changed from 1971. As the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee — the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne — will recall, I was a strong supporter of the Page report when I was an occupant of the Opposition Benches. However, things have moved on since then, and so has the TSB movement.

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend has summed up the position extremely well. I emphasise yet again that the Government are introducing a Bill that enables the TSBs to do what they want to do. Surely that should be welcomed on both sides of the House. The TSBs have made a great deal of progress in the past 10 or 15 years. Indeed, they have made good progress since the 1976 Act, which was another helpful stage in their development. I compliment Sir John Read and the members of the central board, the management and the staff of the TSBs centrally and at individual banks on the way in which they have responded to the challenge of major changes and on the progress which the movement has made since its legislative basis was altered a few years ago.

An issue which has been raised on many occasions is the ownership of the trustee savings banks. It has been said that the Bill is a privatisation measure but it is not what is generally understood to be a privatisation measure, which is a disposal by the Government. The Government do not own the TSBs. The money raised by the share issue will go to the banks and enable them to develop for the future. In that respect, the Bill is fundamentally different from privatisation measures. I suppose that it is a privatisation measure in the sense that it takes the TSBs into full and orthodox private sector status, but it takes them from a form of no man's land in which ownership is not established and not from the public sector.

The TSBs are not owned by their employees or depositors. Nor are they owned by the trustees or the Government. Unlike building societies, they have no shareholders. Ownership is one of the issues which it is incumbent on a Government and Parliament to resolve.

Sir John Osborn: Can the TSBs handle this without the backing of legislation to limit shareholding to 5 per cent. in the early years and 15 per cent. later? To what extent will those shares be freely exchangeable? In about 10 years' time, will I as a member of the public be able to buy some shares or will there be severe restrictions? How will this be handled?

Mr. Stewart: I hope that my hon. Friend can buy shares at any time in the future after the issue takes place. I do not know how substantial my hon. Friend's resources are, but if he wished to buy more than 15 per cent. of the TSB group he might find some obstacles in his way. Provisions for dealing with this aspect will be incorporated in the memorandum and articles of the company. The provisions will operate in that sense and not by legislation. They will, of course, be subject to the ordinary provisions of company law.

The Bill is designed to end the statutory relationship of the TSBs in a special position with Government and Parliament. The Government and Parliament are responsible for resolving the questions of ownership, supervision and taxation involved in the reorganisation, the repeal of earlier legislation, and so on. The TSBs will have the responsibility for carrying out the changes. The Bill and the proposed reorganisation that will follow mark the end of an era. The trustee savings banks will cease to have a unique and an anomalous—in today's world—form of constitution. This Bill will, therefore, be the last in a long line of Bills dealing with the trustee savings banks.

I am glad that the Bill removes many of the restrictions on the TSBs' freedom of action which have constrained their progress. I am sure that the proposals we are putting to Parliament are in the interests not only of the TSBs but of their customers and their employees, and I hope that the proposals will be warmly welcomed. The TSB movement has a long history and a distinguished past. I am convinced that the TSBs have an important future. The Bill will enable them to take advantage of new opportunities, and I commend the legislation to the House.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): The Economic Secretary has rightly said that the Bill is designed to end a series of changes in the trustee savings bank movement. The changes began in a serious way with the Page report, which was commissioned in 1971 and produced in 1973. The report led to the first Bill which, in 1976, radically changed the operations of the TSB.

The Economic Secretary rightly said that the trustee savings bank movement had had a long and distinguished history. The first savings bank was set up in 1810 in Ruthwell in Dumfriesshire. That bank and others of its kind were designed to encourage thrift among working class people. Some of the branches seemed to have an interesting history. One of the early branches formed in Edinburgh was brought into being by a local branch of the Society for the Suppression of Beggars. Those who set up the banks frequently expressed strong moral feelings. S. W. Nicholl in his "Summary View of Report and Evidence Relating to the Poorhouse 1818" said:

"In every new disciple of the Savings Bank I see at least two apostates from the Poor Rate and in 15 or 20 years there is no reason to doubt that the inherent and progressive principle of the Savings Bank will have not only stopped the progress but will have entirely routed the influence of its antagonist the Parish Rate."

In the eyes of some of their instigators, the trustee banks were designed to encourage the poor not just to save but to save so that they would not be a burden on the rates. In some ways, one can see an early form of Thatcherism in the minds of some of those who were responsible for setting up the trustee savings bank movement. I do not mean to suggest that that was the only motive for setting up the banks; other people with philanthropic motives wanted to assist people in obtaining access to savings and the benefits that they could bring.

The banks have already changed considerably. Some of those changes might make the early founders turn in their graves. There are 2 million credit card holders among the 6 million customers, and that is some distance from the early notion of encouraging thrift. The changes in 1976 allowed the TSBs to operate full banking functions, including the ability to make loans to depositors, although those loans were restricted to members of the ordinary public and corporate loans were not encouraged. Since then, TSBs have developed deposit and credit services, cheque, savings and investment accounts and fixed term bonds. The TSB group offers insurance services and unit trusts through the TSB trust company. The TSBs operate credit cards, and the United Dominions Trust Ltd is an instalment credit and leasing company. Mortgage facilities have already become available.

As the Economic Secretary rightly pointed out, the further changes envisaged in the Bill do not amount to a privatisation measure. If this were a privatisation measure, the Opposition's attitude would differ. The Government do not own the trustee savings banks and, in spite of the doubts about the ownership, will not benefit from the proceeds of this sale. The Government's inevitable involvement is due to the history of the bank because it is under the supervision of the Treasury. The bank will now be transferred to the supervision of the Bank of England under the Banking Act 1979.

The questions dealt with by the Economic Secretary and in the White Paper make some of the issues a little clearer. The Page report referred to the ownership question. I understand that the members of the Page committee thought of raising that question when they were part of the way through their examination of the national savings movement. The Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies was asked to comment on who owned the bank. In paragraph 250 of the Page report he admitted that the statutory framework for the trustee savings bank

"left the true relationship between the depositor and his bank unclear. The wording of the Trustee Savings Banks Act 1969 indicated that the depositors were creditors of the bank, and therefore entitled, if the bank were wound up, to be repaid the full amount of their deposits plus the interest due. . . . On the other hand the Act, in providing for the use of trustees, did not make at all clear the extent to which, if any, the relationship between a depositor and a bank was also that of beneficiary and trustee."

The Page report then comments that if the banks are to be considered as mutual organisations without shareholders, the right interpretation would be for depositors to be entitled to the full value of the bank, which would almost certainly be more than the liability to repay deposits and accrued interest, unless there had been gross mismanagement.

Therefore, it is clear from the Page report that the chief registrar and members of the committee inclined towards the view that the depositors were the owners. Although this is denied in the White Paper in paragraph 4.02, the Government must either accept the principle that ownership lies with the depositors or, at least, strongly suspect that that might be the case. If ownership did not lie with the depositors, the Treasury would be only too glad to get its hands on the proceeds of the sale and to rush the sale through to ensure that there is money for tax cuts in the coming financial year.

The Economic Secretary glossed over the problems about ownership. In his reply he should make it clear, given the remarks in the Page report and the fact that the Treasury is not taking the proceeds of the sale, how the Government arrived at the view expressed in the White Paper that ownership plainly did not lie with the depositors of the TSB.

We accept the fact that the structure and ownership of the TSB is not wholly clear. Nevertheless, implicit in the Page report is the notion that the TSB is a mutual concern. How far did the discussions that took place with the TSB in 1982 and have taken place since, extend? As was clear from our discussions with the TSB and as the Economic Secretary said, the matter was fully discussed with the management of the bank. But given the strong remarks in the Page report and the fact that the depositors are at least possible or partial owners of the TSB, what consultation took place with the movement as a whole to decide its future organisation?

We accept that the form of the TSB should be clarified, but choices are available. We should reconsider the strength of the remarks in the Page report. Paragraph 263 states:

"The suggestion has been made that the trustee savings banks should be 'hived off' to the private sector as commercial concerns. If by this is meant that they should have shareholders and operate from the point of view of ownership like commercial banks we see such a solution as neither practicable nor desirable in principle. In evidence, the Committee of London Clearing Bankers put forward the argument that trustee savings banks represent unfair competition in that they are not required, as the nationalised industries are, to realise a 'proper rate' of return on capital employed. In effect, the argument put forward by the clearing banks amounts to saying that the principle of mutuality is inconsistent with free competition. But this is manifestly not true. The principle of mutuality operates in the vigorously competitive fields of insurance and building societies and indeed in certain unit trusts. It is in our view highly suited to the needs of financial institutions such as the trustee savings banks if they play a wider role in the provision of financial services. Thus, there is no need to choose between the extremes of direct central government control on the one hand and full private commercial ownership on the other. We see no reason why the trustee savings banks, as reorganised along the lines suggested in the recommendations set out below, should not exist as mutual organisations primarily in the private sector of the economy. The principle of mutuality means in effect that the profit that accrues to the banks is indirectly distributed in kind to the depositors through improvement in services and lower costs of service rather than distributed to equity shareholders. A set of mutual banks . . . seems to us an excellent way of providing a competitive service for the financial needs of the small saver and small depositor."

Given that the nature of the organisation needed clarification if the TSBs were to move ahead, they could nevertheless have moved forward in the form of mutual organisations.

At the time of the Banking Bill 1978 we envisaged that the TSB would continue to move towards the private sector, that that would be completed by the early 1980s and that it would then be developed sufficiently to bring it within the supervisory system of the Banking Bill. That is what the then Minister said. Some of us might have preferred movement in other directions, such as towards the formation of a state bank, but that was not on the cards for the then Labour Government.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg rose——

Dr. McDonald: I shall finish this point before I give way.

The TSB could have moved into the private sector in a mutual form. We envisaged the move into the private sector, but said nothing about the form at that stage. There is no reason why a mutual form of reorganisation should not be the form that the TSB now takes.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: The hon. Lady said that some hon. Members at that time might have wanted to move in a different direction, such as towards the formation of a state bank. Is that her view now?

Dr. McDonald: Given the present direction, we would not now envisage that future for the TSB. The existence of a state bank in some form is another matter. I was not referring specifically to the TSB when I made that point.

Perhaps in his reply the Minister will say something more about the reasons for rejecting mutuality. In our discussions with the TSB we understood that the main reason for rejecting mutuality as a method of development was the need for increased capital. The argument is that the public limited company form of development is essential to raise new capital. When we inquired what the reasons were for wishing to raise new capital, the TSB claimed that it was to improve the technology of the banks. They were among the first to introduce new technology and now need to make systems compatible with those of other banks because banks are being drawn into one network. The TSB wants to update technology, to introduce home banking and to extend the branch system, especially in the south, where it is not strongly represented.

Mr. Wilson: Will the hon. Lady accept that the Trustee Savings bank has been particularly strong in Scotland and northern England, where it originated? If it is to be the policy of the new unified board to concentrate in the south of England, it may mean that assets which have been utilised in the traditional areas for the requirements of small depositors may now be required elsewhere for industrial purposes. Areas in Scotland and the north of England could thereby be denuded of cash. Would not that be a very bad development for the areas which originally developed the TSB?

Dr. McDonald: The hon. Gentleman has made a point that I wish to deal with slightly later in my speech. At the moment I was wishing to explore the reasons for rejecting mutual organisation as the proposed mode of development of the TSB, but before I do so I should like to add one further point.

With the sale of shares, the TSB is generally expected to raise about £1 billion. Its assets are currently worth £700 million. I am sure that the Economic Secretary is aware that there is speculation not so much that the TSB will be taken over by another bank—such speculation occurred at an earlier date—as that the TSB might take over another bank. That was mentioned in the Investors' Chronicle in December. It is described as being in a strong position because, unlike some banks, it is not suffering from ill-considered overseas lending. But if it were to take over another bank—perhaps a subsidiary in Britain of a foreign bank, which is one form that the speculation takes — it could extend into overseas lending through a takeover of that kind.

In future, the Trustee Savings bank will be under the supervision of the Bank of England and not the Treasury. Can we have an assurance from the Economic Secretary that, if a takeover of the kind that I have just described takes place, the Bank of England will supervise it, and supervise the operations of the TSB and other banks with greater care than in the Johnson Matthey affair? It would be a pity if a bank which is currently in a strong position —and is described by all the financial commentators as such—were to fall into the trap of taking over another bank and thereby inherit a lot of difficulties for itself. We want an assurance from the Economic Secretary that in the future the Bank of England will more carefully supervise what banks are getting up to than it has in the past few months.

The Economic Secretary said that there is to be a limit on the shares held by any one shareholder—5 per cent. for the first five years and 15 per cent. thereafter. In interventions in his speech, it was said that those limits are to be found in the draft memorandum and in the future articles of the company. Indeed, they are set out in the letter which accompanied the White Paper. We do not consider that that is satisfactory. We see no reason why it should not be incorporated in the Bill, which is designed to facilitate the setting up of the central TSB Group plc, which will then be involved in the flotation of shares.

In the Bill, no date or time limit is set for flotation after the assets have been transferred to the TSB group. We understand that that will be brought about by a statutory instrument at some future date as a result of consultation between the Treasury and the TSB, but there is no time limit specified in the Bill, nor is there a limit in the Bill on the number of shares to be held by any one shareholder.

We fear that the nature of the bank could change very considerably as a result of the flotation of shares. At present, the TSB has 6 million customers, with 13 million accounts. It is roughly the same size as National Westminster and Barclays. The expectation is that depositors will have a pink priority form to enable them to purchase shares. The closing date for that — 17 December 1984—has already passed. Prior to that date there was a significant increase in the number of accounts, as financial commentators recommended that in order to get the valuable shares in TSB, people should open an account with TSB and thus be able to obtain a pink priority form.

Therefore, there is an unspecified number of new account holders. Persistent questioning on my part did not elicit the information that I should have liked to have. Obviously, people have been moving in and opening accounts, and they do not really form part of the TSB tradition.

I further discovered that 40 per cent. of the depositors could not possibly take up shares. Plainly, from the size of their accounts, they had not enough capital available. Obviously, they would not be allowed to borrow from the TSB in order to buy shares in it. Therefore, a large number of the traditional depositors will not be able to take up the shareholding, whereas new depositors have come in simply with an eye to taking up the shareholding. There are, in addition, 25,000 members of staff who are qualified to buy shares.

The allocation of the shares is not dealt with in the Bill and, indeed, it is not mentioned in the letter to which I referred. I know that the TSB has that matter under consideration. We should like provision to be made in the Bill to enable more of the traditional depositors to take up shareholdings, and to give staff a specific right to a number of shares. In that way some of the traditions of the TSB could be preserved. That would be better than simply saying that depositors would have priority forms and that some shares would be allocated to the staff. If those provisions were made, as the bank changed from being some—but not very clear—form of mutual organisation to a public limited company, part of the traditions would be preserved. We should like the Bill to provide that staff have not only a right to buy a certain number of shares but a definite say in the running of the bank. However, those are matters for the Committee stage.

The Trustee Savings bank has specialised in personal services. Indeed, personal customers account for 95 per cent. of the customer base. One of the features of the bank has not only been its concentration in Scotland and the north of England but the fact that, whereas other banks have withdrawn branches because they found it extremely difficult to operate in certain areas, the TSB has maintained branches in, for example, certain council estates in tough areas of Glasgow where no other bank is prepared to stay. The TSB wants to move into the more lucrative banking areas of the south of England. We do not want it to do so at the cost of its depositors and customers who, as has been rightly said, have helped to build up the wealth of that bank in the past, a bank that is now on a par with the other four clearing banks in terms of size and of the value of its assets. We are concerned that in its move into the south of England, the TSB should not neglect those in Scotland and the north who have contributed to its wealth.

We are also concerned that in its desire to move into commercial lending, which is a small part of its business at the moment, the TSB does not neglect its involvement in local communities in the north and in Scotland. We do not want to see that bank building up other forms of admittedly profitable commercial traffic while jeopardising its commitment to personal customers. We would prefer it if the Bill ensured that that commitment to and involvement in local communities remained and, in our examination of the Bill in Committee, we shall do our best to ensure that those measures are built into the Bill.

5.1 pm

Mr. Eric Cockeram (Ludlow): I declare an interest, being a director and trustee of one of the regional TSBs since the 1960s, which has been a fascinating period while the TSBs have been developing.

I suppose that the seeds of the Bill were sown in 1971 when the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, now Lord Barber, recognised that the national savings movement needed bringing up to date. Much of it had not altered since 1945, at the end of the war, and that included much of the TSB movement. Therefore, the Page committee was set up. It was interesting that Sir Harry Page, the chairman, who tragically died two or three weeks ago, was a former treasurer of the city of Manchester. Other notable northerners, some from Liverpool, were on that committee, which was appropriate because the TSBs had their roots in the north of England and in Scotland.

The committee reported in 1973. If its conclusions could be summed up in one sentence, it would be to the effect that the national savings movement, including the TSBs, needed root and branch reform. A whole chapter was devoted to proposals about the TSBs. Shortly after that committee reported, we moved into the early months of 1974, when there was a general election, and the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) found himself Chancellor in the Labour Government. It was a tribute to him and to the common sense of the Labour Government at that time that they likewise accepted the reasoning behind the Page report and that, as its proposals were accepted in broad terms, this did not become a party political matter.

The TSBs proceeded to move more into the banking sector and away from national savings. They issued cheque books and in 1975 became members of the Bankers Clearing House to enable them to offer that facility. They offered personal loans in 1977, as well as overdrafts—two different things. Mortgages became available in 1979, as did commercial lending. The Trustcard came in as well.

It is significant that the TSBs have such a strong base throughout the country in the section of the public that, to use the jargon, used to be "unbanked", and that the Trustcard was an instant success. The TSB is now the second largest bank in the credit card business. Barclays is the largest and TSB is the second, followed by National Westminster, Lloyds and the troubled Midland, which collectively issued a card under one name. However, in pure banking terms the TSB is now No. 2 in the movement.

The TSB also acquired the United Dominions Trust, thereby being able to offer hire purchase and other facilities. It set up a trust company and has an insurance broking subsidiary. It has travelled a long way down the road to offering a full monetary and banking service to a section of the community which formerly, in broad terms, was unbanked. That is to be commended. The handling and retaining of cash in the home is not desirable these days. With modern computers and banking methods it is possible for all sections of the community to operate a bank account economically. The TSB has played a significant part in achieving that objective.

Therefore, in 10 years between 1973, when the Page committee reported, and 1983, the movement went a long way. It started off as little more than another arm of the national savings movement and a decade later it was virtually a full bank. That is a great tribute to the management of the bank, which has conducted that pretty substantial metamorphosis without any great traumas, carrying with it the good will of the customers and the staff, who had not been brought up in the banking world.

The TSB now has £8 billion in deposits, 6 million customers and 13 million accounts. It is a formidable organisation. Its reserves are in the region of £700 million and when, I hope, the Bill is passed, and after the public issue, its reserves will be over £1,000 million—no small organisation to have grown from what was little more than a part of the national savings movement.

As chairman of the all-party TSB group, I should like to comment—I am sure that other hon. Members share or have expressed this view—that there was a Bill concerning the TSB in 1976, another in 1978 and yet another in 1981. There is now a fourth in 1985. There are not many organisations — except perhaps British Rail, which seems to have a Bill every year—that have had four Bills in nine years. I think that that has been due in no small part to the lack of clarity of thought in the early days after the issue of the Page report about where the TSBs were going; but, happily, in more recent years, since Sir John Read took over as chairman and formed a management team including several people who came from the non-TSB world and who brought in fresh minds and thinking, there has been an acceleration of clarity of thought so that people now know exactly where they need to go and are setting off down the road of the decision —which I believe is fundamental—that the TSB should be a company with limited liability. That has many advantages. It not only clarifies the problem of ownership which, as the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. McDonald) said, was one of the issues on which there was considerable doubt in the past — that doubt must be resolved one way or another—but enables the bank to raise fresh capital by the issue of shares, as is intended, following the enactment of the measure, and on a future occasion, should the need arise and should it be desirable, to raise further capital.

It is abundantly clear that anyone in the banking world today must have access to further capital at short notice, if required, as the National Westminster became sharply aware in 1975 when its shares fell to 88p and it was necessary to raise capital very quickly when the shares rose above par again. I am sure that the currently much-troubled Midland wishes that it could raise further capital now. It is essential that the TSBs have that long-stop facility. It may also be needed for highly desirable objectives, such as further expansion and additional facilities for customers. The Bill points the way ahead so that we may now wrap up the conclusions of the Page report in relation to the TSBs.

The purpose of the Bill is fivefold. First, it completes the change from a national savings organisation to a bank offering full financial services to its very wide spread of customers, the bulk of whom are in the north of England and in Scotland.

Secondly, the Bill provides a constitutional framework and removes the ambiguity of ownership which has existed so far.

Thirdly—I hope that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will not mind my saying this — the Bill removes the TSBs from the shackles of the Treasury and puts them under the Bank of England. That is desirable for a number of reasons, not least because, if the new TSBs are to compete with other private banks, they should share the same umbrella and regulation.

Fourthly, the Bill will strengthen the TSBs' reserves and allow further capital to be raised. As has already been pointed out, it is not a privatisation measure at all.

Fifthly, it will establish very wide ownership of the TSBs. All staff who wish to become shareholders have been assured that they will be able to do so. One hopes that the same will apply to customers wishing to become shareholders.

Those who ask what is so desirable about having shareholders and why the TSBs should not continue as a mutual organisation should consider the history of the matter. Not putting too fine a point on it, it must be admitted that in the 1950s and 1960s the TSBs were in something of a rut. That was one of the reasons why the Page committee was set up. At that time there was no profit incentive and no incentive for management to expand and modernise. I believe that the very existence of shareholders will prove to be in the interests of depositors, as it has been in the case of the other clearing banks. I am by no means convinced that mutuality achieves that objective. In passing, I might whisper in the ear of my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary that the same might well apply to building societies, although that does not arise under the Bill.

For all those reasons, I support the objectives of the Bill, although, like many hon. Members, I shall wish to examine it carefully in Committee. I believe that the Bill is desirable in the interests not only of the staff and customers of the TSBs but of the nation as a whole. The number of clearing banks has fallen to four in recent yars. I believe that the establishment of a fifth is economically desirable for the purposes of the country as a whole. I wish the TSBs well in the future and look forward to the early enactment of this legislation.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): The hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Cockeram), with whom I have had the pleasure and privilege of working on a number of occasions in the Public Accounts Committee, rightly pointed out the importance of local interests in the trustee savings banks. Time and again we come back to the question of how to retain that strong local interest, which has been the driving force of the TSB and which makes it so different from many other banking institutions. The hon. Gentleman was also right to emphasise the advantages that the TSB has brought to people who would otherwise be "unbanked". I agree, too, that management was somewhat restricted before the 1976 Act. Opportunities existed but were not being taken and the success of that legislation, which I had the privilege of piloting through the House, lay in opening up opportunities for effective management of the interests of the banks themselves as well as their depositors and customers.

A total of 13 million accounts means that we are dealing with a very wide spread of the banking population. Sir Harry Page was a great city treasurer for my home town of Manchester; he was a person of great repute and standing and I knew him well. When he produced his report I thought that he had the balance right and I was most enthusiastic about it. The history of the Trustee Savings bank derives from the long neglect of people who, in the 19th century, were regarded as having insufficient means to use banking services. In those days, the banks were regarded as existing to serve people with substantial amounts of money on which they could obtain substantial returns in interest. Various enthusiastic individuals felt that that neglect of working people must be remedied and organisations such as the Yorkshire Penny bank were set up to give ordinary working people a fair deal for the disposition of their money so that they could obtain a comparable return on their deposits. All this was before small savings possibilities became available through the Post Office. There was little further development for many years.

Following 1965, cheque accounts were introduced and the TSBs were freed from their historical restrictions. That was the motive behind the Page report. The question was how to retain the enthusiasm and dedication that Page found while providing for the ability to expand and advance that is necessary in the modern banking world. I had a great deal of sympathy with the solution proposed by the Page report. It suggested that the TSB should be a third force, in addition to the clearing banks and the National Giro, both of which had a clear market for their activities, with clear distinctions between the different forces.

The 1976 Act sought to advance the opportunities of the TSBs by allowing them to undertake personal loans, overdrafts, credit card facilities, small business loans, mortgages and unit trust services. That legislation was highly successful and the idea of the third force remained intact. There was to be freedom from direct and detailed Government control, which had previously played a part in shackling the opportunities open to the TSBs, and the organisation of the units was to be strengthened on a regional basis. Some people were unhappy at the idea of a regional element being brought into the small, tight local organisation of the TSBs as a means of strengthening them. In the main, the problems were overcome, although some echoes of them still remain. There was to be a central authority from within the movement to provide a central direction.

That was the Page path—the establishment of the trustee savings banks as a mutually owned third force. As a result of the Bill, instead of a third force there will be two forces. There will be the clearing banks and National Giro, and inevitably the trustee savings banks will drift towards the clearing banks. When the Economic Secretary to the Treasury talked about the end of an era he said more than he had meant to say. I believe that there is a danger that the distinguished history of the TSBs will come to an end rather more quickly than anyone would wish.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) rightly asked what discussions had been held, not with management—clearly the Bill is the result of discussions with management—but with customers. If the ownership of the banks is uncertain, the uncertainty must lie between the management and the customers. The most important discussions should have been held with the customers. I hope that the Minister will reply to my hon. Friend's questions.

I also ask the Economic Secretary about the ownership of the TSB. He said that—as we know from the letter that was part of the White Paper—no one is allowed to own more than 5 per cent. for five years or 15 per cent. afterwards. I asked the Economic Secretary what assurances there would be on that point. He was unable to give me an assurance. That stipulation will not form part of the legislation. It will appear in the memorandum and articles of association. There is a world of difference between a promise made in the memorandum and articles of association and a provision with legislative force. All that is needed to change the memorandum and articles of association is an extraordinary general meeting. The procedure for changing legislation passed in the House is very different and much more rigorous. The memorandum and articles of association could be changed at any time —they are only promises—and that would mean the failure, collapse and demise of the third force.

The possibility of another body taking over the TSB after the memorandum and articles of association have been changed is not the only question. As my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock pointed out, the TSB could take over other banks. That could occur not in the obvious way but by way of a reverse takeover. The TSB could take over a rather larger body and use its name and standing to do a reverse takeover, and that would be the end of any hopes for a third force.

That is all very sad. It is not what I expected when we started on this road eight years ago. I thought that we were bringing in more imagination and responsibility, and giving the managers of these splendid institutions powers that they would use to create strong local organisations that could play an increasingly important part in their communities.

Mr. Cockeram: The right hon. Gentleman comes from Manchester. He will recall the problems encountered by the District bank in trying to remain a local bank. Coming from Liverpool, I recall the problems faced by Martin's bank in trying to retain regional autonomy. The objectives outlined by the right hon. Gentleman may be desirable, but it has not proved possible to retain small regional banks. Especially since the advent of computers, there must be a national network. Has the right hon. Gentleman fully taken that point into account?

Mr. Sheldon: Yes, indeed. That was the most important aspect of the 1976 Act. The Act embodied an understanding of the need for some central organisation but allowed those operating in centres of population to retain their own ways of acting and to remain a part of the local community. I had hoped that that spirit would be retained, and I am sorry that we heard nothing from the Economic Secretary—who went into considerable detail — about the reasons for the failure to retain some element of it. A great opportunity has been lost and I view the Bill now before us with great regret.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): I, too, declare an interest. Since 1953 I have been either an honorary manager or a trustee of the trustee savings banks, and am now a director of its south-east region. I am also a depositor. That is an important point to which I shall return.

It is important to recognise how it has come about that we are discussing such a Bill. There is a long history. I remember being persuaded by a senior alderman in the borough which I live in and represent to join the committee of honorary managers of the local branch. Being a cautious person, I asked what I would have to do. I was told that my position would be much like that of the Paymaster General — I would sign away all my rights to sign cheques. My position would be an honorary one, but I would be expected to represent the bank to people in the locality, to persuade people that the bank was a good institution, and to work with the bank to try to increase the number of depositors.

In those days, vast sums of money were lent by the TSBs to the National Debt Office for a measly return. Over the years, the Treasury has made enormous profits out of the TSBs. If the TSBs had been allowed to lend their money on commercial terms, it would have generated very much more money for the TSBs themselves. Secretly, therefore, the Treasury has not derived much pleasure from helping us to reach this stage.

That was the start. I was then translated to the board of the London TSB. We had annual meetings at the Mansion house under the presidency of the Lord Mayor. Then, as now, I was not always prepared to use only the calmest of language. I remember how at one annual meeting I exploded when the chairman of the London board said that there were certain problems involved in making it possible for our depositors to have their own chequebooks. I commented that what he really meant was that the clearing banks wanted us to remain as third-class customers, obliged to make our depositors pay for each cheque. They were not prepared to allow us to give a decent service. The chairman said, "That might have been expressed in more diplomatic language, but you are perfectly right."

The progress of the TSBs to their present state therefore met not only with less than enthusiastic support from the Treasury but with great opposition from the private sector banks. However, in time those banks realised that there was a great advantage in the entry into the field of an organisation that had found a way of interesting those people to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Cockeram) has referred as the unbanked. There was then a change of attitude. We were able to have cheque books, the development continued, and we had Page.

As the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) said, Page was a watershed, as he did more than look at the trustee savings banks. I contrast what the right hon. Gentleman said about Page's emphasis upon the community nature of the trustee savings banks with the way that he virtually killed the national savings movement by killing the national savings stamp and the groups that, up and down the country in every street and village, collected vast sums of money for the national savings movement. It is a difficult thing to reconcile. The right hon. Gentleman will remember the large deputation that I led to try to save the national savings stamp groups. It was an all-party issue. I found it strange that this move came from Harry Page, whom I had known well in local government circles, although I do not have the privilege and pleasure of hailing from Manchester. I visited Manchester about once a month, so I knew its rains as well as Harry Page.

I was a little startled when I listened to the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) because she obviously had to delve deeply to bolster her view of the trustee savings banks. I think that I can say without fear of contradiction that no member of the parliamentary committee has ever heard the origins of the trustee savings banks described as "primitive Thatcherism". I am not sure where she got that phrase from.

Dr. McDonald: I got it from the Page report.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: Page did not talk about Thatcherism. He was an astute enough treasurer to have said that Thatcherism, if there is such a word, when applied to rate capping for Manchester, was right and was brought on the Manchester council by its own activities. Harry Page, from his great height, would have told his councillors that in no uncertain terms.

The hon. Lady had certain other problems. She referred, for example, to people opening accounts to obtain benefit from the preferential pink form that will be available when the share issue comes. I am sure that she will have reminded herself that the moment that the Bill was printed, a stop was put on new depositors qualifying for the preferential issue and that 17 December was the cut-off date. Therefore, people cannot open new accounts in order to gain preferential treatment. Equally, it has been firmly said that only accounts that have been kept open will qualify in that way.

The hon. Lady was also worried about the arrangements for purchase for the staff and customers. I shall quote from a useful document that the chief general manager of the TSB issued on 18 December to the staff. It says:

"There will be priority arrangements for staff and customers. The priority to TSB customers recognises our particular wish to reinforce the special relationship which has always existed between the TSB and its customers."

That has been a most important element in the trustee savings banks movement.

The staff in the TSBs are different from the staff in the average high street bank. They are not the sort of people who suddenly appear out of cupboards. They are constantly in the bank, in the banking hall, meeting and serving customers — something that one finds less frequently on the part of the managers in most joint stock banks. Therefore, the TSB customer knows what the manager and staff of his branch look like and how they act. That is a useful and important factor.

The hon. Member for Thurrock said that, according to her research, 40 per cent. of TSB customers would not be able to take up the share issue because of the size of their accounts. That is a wrong assumption and one that she cannot make. She assumes that everyone with an account at the TSB has no account with any other bank. What is clearly said is not that one may purchase shares only to the value of one's account in the TSB, but that one's account in the TSB is the key to purchasing shares. I assure the hon. Lady that tens of thousands of people—I have not done the research — have accounts in the TSB and in other banks. They have those TSB accounts—the hon. Lady forgets this as well — because, until about 18 months ago, one got limited tax-free interest on one's current account in the TSB. Therefore people opened accounts there in addition to having accounts in joint stock banks.

Dr. McDonald: I was going on the percentage given to me by the TSB.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I hope that the hon. Lady will help me, as I should like to be accurate. Did she ask the TSB how many of its depositors had accounts that would enable them to purchase shares, or did she ask how many of its depositors had accounts with less than £500? I do not wish to do her an injustice, but unless one knows the question that she put, the answer is difficult to evaluate, as is shown by the phoney public opinion polls produced from across the water by Mr. Livingstone. They are meaningless unless one knows what the question was. Will the hon. Lady tell us what the question was? I am searching for help, not trying to be difficult.

Dr. McDonald: I asked a simple question. I was interested in what proportion of depositors were interested in taking up shares in the TSB once it was floated. I have given the answer that I received. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to pursue this further, he should ask the TSB about the nature of its research.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I shall do so. If that is the case, I question not only the hon. Lady's assumptions, but the basis on which that information could have been given to her. No one can say what the attitude of the depositors will be and no one knows what accounts depositors have in other banks. The hon. Lady should not put too much reliance on the 40 per cent. figure. I do not blame her for for putting it to the House, but I question that figure, from whatever source she got it, until I know the basis on which the information was supplied to her.

It is true, as has already been said today, that the TSB movement used to be Scottish-oriented. In the past 10 years, the enterprise and thrift of the south has overtaken that of the Scots, and it is no longer possible to say that Scotland is in the position that it was until about a decade ago. Until then, it was the major component of the TSB and year after year had bigger profits than the other components. However, those of us in London and the south-east always arranged to lend our resources to the north-west, the north-east and Scotland to help them in the opening and development of new branches, even in those days, when we were the poor relations of the north. I see no reason why that should not continue.

Mr. Wilson: I do not necessarily accept the hon. Gentleman's last assertion. However, does he agree that there is a difference between the south overtaking Scotland in terms of the development of TSB operations and what is proposed in the Bill, which is the taking over of the autonomous TSB within Scotland? Under the previous structure, the control of the operations in Scotland lay with the trustees of the TSB in Scotland, whereas now it will lie with the group.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: The complete autonomy that existed in the days of the Glasgow and Edinburgh banks and the wide variety of Scottish trustee savings banks was surrendered after the Trustee Savings Bank Act 1981 was passed. That was when we established the central board. The hon. Gentleman is addressing his arguments to something that happened several years ago. If he still feels strongly about the matter, he might take it up as a quid pro quo for those in England who are less than happy that the control of Williams and Glyn's bank will be taken over by the Royal Bank of Scotland. Such matters work both ways, and one must occasionally accept compromises. The Bill provides the trustee savings banks that we really want. It gives the opportunity to people to continue the work that they have been doing.

I began by talking about the honorary managers, and I return to the point made by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne about the localities. In his letter of 18 December, the chief general manager said:

"We will maintain our traditional role as a personal bank and continue to build on our achievements in the communities which we serve."

The regional board members act as liaison officers between the regional boards and the central board. They also visit branches and "sell" the bank, not only to personal customers but to professionals and institutions, on the basis that potential customers will know that local people are very much interested and involved. I have spent some 30 years in voluntary service of the trustee savings banks, and I would not support such a Bill if I believed that it would remove the link with the communities.

Two people might be singled out on the long road during the past 20 years towards the independence of the trustee savings bank movement. One is Sir Athelstone Caroe, who did an enormous amount in this area, and the other is Philip Keens, who pioneered much, including the unit trust movement of the TSB and the Trustcard. The movement owes a debt of gratitude to such individuals who dedicated themselves to the work of the trustee savings banks. They will be satisfied that the Bill provides——

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I apologise for not being in the Chamber for the beginning of the hon. Gentleman's speech. He may already have dealt with the point that I wish to raise. How will the independence of the trustee savings banks be improved by removing them from the ownership of the common people and putting them in the hands of a few shareholders?

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: The hon. Gentleman has just wandered into the Chamber. He has missed at least five speeches that would have told him all about this. Clearly, he has not even read the documents or the White Paper, which make it clear that the present ownership is problematical. He does not understand that preference in the purchase of shares will be given to customers and staff. With the greatest respect to him, may I say that I hope that he does not advise his clients without having read all his documents. He did this to me once before, and on that occasion he had to say that he was sorry. His intervention, again without proper preparation, does not do him the credit that he usually deserves for his researched speeches, which are good

The Bill deserves commendation, and I hope that it will pass rapidly through the House.

5.44 pm

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): As one who worked in the state banking sector and in the joint stock banking sector before coming to the House, and as one who served with a former Economic Secretary to the Treasury and the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) in the Committee and other stages of what became the Trustee Savings Bank Act 1976, I share some of the reservations that have been mentioned by hon. Members about the change that will be introduced by the Bill.

I was pleased that, in introducing the Bill, the Economic Secretary to the Treasury did not make exaggerated claims about it being a brave new venture in increasing competition in banking, although he mentioned it in passing. I was disappointed that the Bill was paraded in the Queen's Speech as a great venture in providing consumers with more competition. However, if one knows what the trustee savings banks have done during the past few years, and if one reads the White Paper, one knows that that competition began a considerable time ago. The real genesis of the Bill is the lack of clarity over the ownership of the trustee savings banks following the 1976 Act.

The Bill would not have been before us, and none of the claims that have been made would have been made, had we clarified the ownership of the banks in the 1976 Act. We can all be wise after the event, but it might have been better had we gone down the road of mutuality in 1976—some of us would prefer that now—and made it clear that that was what we intended. We all expected it to be a mutual organisation and we did not raise the question of ownership during the passage of the Bill. If we had said clearly that the trustee savings banks should be mutual organisations, they would have provided the genuine third force in banking that Page intended and many of us foresaw.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: We saw it as a third force in banking—a third force that was mutually owned. The path that we envisaged was clear.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: It has become clear that the definition of mutuality, unlike the co-operative sector and the building society sector, was not specified as clearly as it might have been. I do not blame the right hon. Gentleman for that. We were all involved in the debates in Committee and we saw no need for it at the time. We took it as read that they were mutual organisations and that they would remain so. All that I am saying, with the benefit of hindsight, is that it might have been better had that view been cast in black and white in the Act so that there was no doubt about it.

The lack of clarity created the desire of the trustee savings banks and the Government to introduce the Bill, which may force the former to develop in a remarkable way. Since the 1976 Act, the trustee savings banks have developed a competitive edge and have been responsible for developments in banking that have been of great benefit to consumers. They have a proud tradition of including within their commercial objectives clear social purposes. Those social purposes—helping less well-off people to have banking facilities, even though they got only low rates of interests on their deposits—formed a desirable role and many of us would like to see it retained.

Although I shall not oppose the Bill, I hope that some of the propositions that the trustee savings banks have made, and which the Minister referred to, can be set more firmly and that we can be given stronger guarantees about some of the undertakings that have been provided. I hope that some of the proposals, such as those on share ownership, will not be mere gestures.

I also hope that the banks will not follow the example of the polytechnics that want to become universities. I hope that they will pay more than lip service to their character and traditions and, while being fully commercial and successful, will seek to continue with their traditions.

I have a number of questions for the Economic Secretary and I hope that I shall be able to pursue them in Committee so that we can amend the legislation to set more firmly the undertakings given by the chairman and by the Economic Secretary.

I hope that the Economic Secretary will tell us more about how the flotation of the shares will be organised and controlled. He has given us little information about that and he should not expect hon. Members to be satisfied until further details are made available.

We have had an undertaking that shares will be given to staff and customers. What proportion is it intended should go to the staff and what proportion to the customers? May we have undertakings on those figures? I should like to have the details laid down in the statute, so that they cannot be changed in the memorandum and articles of association at a subsequent EGM.

Regional charitable foundations are to be established. That is a good idea, but may we be told how many shares will be vested in the foundations, how large they will be, what sort of work they will do, who will control them, whether they will have a relationship with the regional boards and what will be their relationship with the whole banking movement? Will they simply be independent charities doing the same sort of work as many other charities? If they are to have an impact and to carry on the traditions of the TSBs, they will have to retain links with the banks—not just a shareholding in the banks, but a closer involvement. Can the Economic Secretary give us some assurances on those matters?

Such undertakings will reduce the fears of some hon. Members. There is unease about the direction that the banks will take once the Bill becomes an Act. The Economic Secretary will ease the passage of the legislation through Parliament if he will give us firm guarantees and will consider amendments in Committee to enshrine undertakings in the statute. If that happens, all hon. Members will wish the legislation well and will hope that the TSBs succeed in their new form.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): I welcome the Bill. It is not a privatisation measure, but a technical Bill, which is required because of an omission from the 1976 Act, which made a practical contribution to the development of the TSBs.

I acknowledge the view expressed in 1976 about how the Trustee Savings bank should develop, but it is inevitable that the status and constitution of the bank now have to be made clear. It is important to establish in legislative form the future ownership of the TSB. It is important that there should be shareholders and accountability, and that will be provided by the Bill. As every hon. Member who has spoken in the debate has made clear, it is also important to retain the character and tradition of the bank; we should not merely pay lip service to its tradition and character.

I have absolute confidence in the managers of the bank and in the boards, which include members such as my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) and many other people in public life. Their continuing association with the TSB will ensure that its character and traditions are retained.

I have a particular affection for the Trustees Savings bank and the character of savings that it has established, particularly in the part of the country that I represent. It has brought the concept of banking to small investors and savers. It is probably agreed on both sides of the House that the TSB is an ideal bank for those who still fear the idea of having a bank account with one of the traditional banks. The TSB introduces them to banking, cheque books and banking services, which are so important to our way of life.

I am pleased that employees and depositors will be given priority in the ownership of shares, though I do not agree with the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) who believes that the pattern of share ownership needs to be established in legislative form.

If I am fortunate enough to serve on the Standing Committee on the Bill, I shall ask my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary about his proposals for ensuring that employees and depositors have a genuine opportunity to become substantial shareholders. I shall also pursue the question of the maximum shareholdings. I understand that it is envisaged that the maximum initial shareholding should be 5 per cent. and that eventually the maximum could increase to 15 per cent. I have slight misgivings about the figure of 15 per cent. Fears have been expressed about that proportion; they may be groundless, but 15 per cent. seems a little high.

It is important that we take on board the point made by the hon. Member for Stockton, South to reassure the outside world. It would probably be helpful if, in Committee, we were fairly specific about how the floatation takes place. The Government's record with regard to share flotations of other newly privatised companies is very honourable. However, the Trustee Savings bank is a unique institution and it is probably not quite right to use the word "privatised". Nevertheless, it is important to ensure that the country as a whole has confidence in the way in which the flotation takes place. It would therefore be helpful if my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary could give us some idea about that in Committee.

On the whole, I think that the measure is inevitable and, indeed, very important. I note the remarks of, I believe, the chairman of the Trustee Savings bank, which were echoed by my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate. The chairman said that the Bill, which is welcomed by the Trustee Savings bank, would not in any way make changes to the important contribution that it makes in maintaining its traditions as a personal bank. He also said that the bank was proud of its achievements in the communities which it was established to serve. I acknowledge the point that my hon. Friend made and see no reason why the legislation should alter that important community relationship.

However, in this modern world of complex and complicated banking it is right and proper that depositors with the Trustee Savings bank should be able to share in the advantages that accrue to those who use the traditional banking system. There is no doubt that in the past the TSB's depositors have to some extent been second-class banking citizens. However, I acknowledge that during the past few years the TSB and the House, through the contribution of the 1976 Act, have done much to ensure that the TSB's depositors are not second-class citizens.

The TSB is a very fine institution and I wish it well. The Bill can only strengthen the important contribution that it makes to banking to this country.

6.2 pm

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) hopes to retain the character and tradition of the TSB movement, but that hope is somewhat inconsistent with this Bill's objectives. The Bill effectively throws out of the window any concept of the TSB as a third banking force in the United Kingdom.

The Government should be embarrassed by the Bill on three main grounds. The first concerns the issue of ownership. The Bill seeks to authorise the selling of an unowned business. Ministers say that the TSB wants shareholders. The TSB's managers, or at least some of them—the ones that count—say that the Page report presaged the Bill. But, as my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) pointed out, the committee, which reported in 1973, clearly said that the trustee savings banks should not be "hived off". Indeed, the review body of the late Sir Harry Page went out of its way to say that the need for shareholders was "neither practical nor desirable". Therefore, we are changing the whole concept of the TSB movement.

I agree with some of the points made by the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Cockeram) about the fact that the TSB has been improving its services, has gained a better image and has improved its marketing during the past decade, but that has been without the benefit of shareholders. If a Labour Government had proposed nationalising the TSB, all hell would have been let loose. My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock says that the Bill does not mean privatisation. I suggest that it is closet privatisation. A Conservative Government propose to sell an £8 billion-plus business and expect hon. Members to jump up and down with joy.

The second major ground of embarrassment for the Government concerns, ironically, the decision that the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced today about the reintroduction of the minimum lending rate. The White Paper says that the Government attach great importance to competition in the banking sector. Last week we had the undignified spectacle of the Prime Minister being dragged by the hair by the banks over the setting of interest rates. Last week it was not the Chancellor of the Exchequer who decided that the interest rate should increase to 10·5 per cent. but the National Westminster bank, and that started the ball rolling. Now the Government have done a U-turn over the free operation of market forces. That is the message that the Chancellor of the Exchequer signalled this afternoon. I have never heard the Chancellor give such brief replies to each and every question. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I did not catch your eye then, although I had a question that I wanted to put to the right hon. Gentleman on that very point.

I just wonder why the Government have been such a willing partner in the conversion of the TSB into A.N. Other plc. If the Government really wanted more competition in the banking sector, why did they not say to themselves, "Let us have a bank that is different and a bank that is not going to follow the leadership over higher interest rates"? Higher interest rates will affect not only those with mortgages but local authorities, which will have to pay more for the borrowing that the Government have authorised.

I am disappointed that a reasoned amendment was not tabled. The Government have given insufficient consideration to the concept of a mutual bank that is set up for the benefit of customers and staff and holds out the prospect of lower interest rates and improved customer services.

I entirely agree with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock about the staff's opportunity for greater participation in the running of the trustee savings banks. However, I have noted some press comment that people in certain quarters feel that perhaps the staff union is too strong in the TSB. Once these new faceless shareholders come into being there can be no guarantees about what will happen in connection with anything to do with the TSB, never mind the customers or staff. The trustee savings banks will be under first-time ownership. Shareholders will expect dividends. My goodness, what an inviting prospect they face. Look at the reserves of the TSB. It did not get involved in the debt-ridden problems of Latin America or elsewhere. Perhaps its constitution saved it from such follies.

Some managers say that their accountability should be clarified. It will be clarified when the shareholders tell them, "Your responsibility is to us boys, not to the customers." Misgivings have been expressed about the restraints imposed on the percentage of shares that can be taken up. The shareholders of today may not be the shareholders of tomorrow. Much will depend on the price of shares.

The Government should be shamefaced over the involvement of the TSBs in the community. The White Paper acknowledges the developments of TSBs over the generations. In Scotland and the north-east of England they have developed particularly well. In Scotland, one fifth of the adult population—I am included—has a TSB account. The reason for that is historical. Many of our grandparents and parents believed in thrift and opened an account with the TSB.

I declare an interest as a TSB depositor. Historical significances have been brushed aside. Traditionally, in Scotland, people invested in the TSB, whereas in the south of England and elsewhere they invested in building societies. Imperceptible differences in house purchase have occurred which are not always recognised.

Industrial and commercial development in Scotland and elsewhere depend upon savings deposits being used for the regeneration of areas in which people invest their money. I fear that those priorities will be changed.

The TSB has an extensive retail network of branches in many parts of the country, but there is an underlying weakness in the south of England. Money is spent on opening branches in the south of England in the hope that the new TSBs will muscle in on the other banks. Do the Government think that the other banks will sit back and allow that to happen without challenge?

Charity foundations put patronage into the new board's hands. Which charities will be involved and what choices will be made about the good works that they want? The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) talked about the Channel Islands. Why cannot there be a similar guarantee for the Scottish TSB on the allocation of shares?

The Minister does not flannel me by saying that the TSB in Scotland will be able to issue its own bank notes when the rest of the realm is moving to coin. More than the sentimental sop of a bank is involved. I want to know from where it will be controlled. That is significant for the depositors and staff.

The Bill is an open sesame — a mouth-watering prospect of shares in an £8 billion-plus financial and banking network. It is a great temptation. Shall I decide to buy shares now and sell them later?

Mr. Wilson: Will the hon. Gentleman do so?

Mr. Craigen: I am thinking about that.

The Bill involves more than that which is contained in it or the White Paper on which it is based. It is an amber light which leads to a green light for the building societies. I suspect that there will be an almighty gold rush by the building societies. They will all want to become plcs. At least they will be urged in that direction by those who see a substantial profit in the transformation of such organisations.

Protections against takeovers, which are not in the Bill, are insufficient. As the White Paper says, a 170-year-old savings movement, which has had a "special statutory relationship" with the Government, will be transformed so that it is on all fours with any joint stock bank.

Competition will be stiff. No one will get his own way. The managers might look for bigger salaries in line with managers of joint stock companies, but the shareholders might have different ideas. Despite the bland assurances this afternoon about takeovers being unlikely, the TSB could become the Trojan horse for a foreign bank entry into the country.

There is a prospect of a cartel. There are multiples of 5 per cent. or 15 per cent., and an annual general meeting might decide that it does not like a particular agreement.

This Bill is not good. In some ways it is sinister. I am in favour of improving the services provided by the TSB to its depositors and customers, but the imposition of shareholders is another matter. There is no guarantee from any quarter that the shareholders to come will be the depositors of the present.

It is claimed that there has been a rush in demanding the pink forms needed to buy shares. I am reminded of the parable of the labourers in the vineyard, when all the latecomers expected to take the advantages and assets of a movement built up over generations by depositors past and present.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): Like the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) I shall have to think carefully when the time comes about whether I want to be a shareholder in an incorporated TSB. I have to declare an interest, as others have, in that I am a depositor with the Trustees Savings bank. The professional firm in which I am a partner uses some of the very good, progressive and commendable banking facilities which the TSB provides these days.

I draw two conclusions. As many hon. Members have said, incorporation of the TSB seems to be desirable, not least to clarify the TSB's status—which is complex if not confused — and to clarify the ownership and proprietorship of the TSB.

The hon. Member for Maryhill made some interesting points, as did other hon. Members, about whether there should be a bank among our financial institutions that was different. That interesting question certainly does not answer itself, but the fact remains, which is particularly poignant today, that in the end the banks cannot determine to be different simply for the sake of being different.

If the advanced services that people require in an increasingly complex fast-moving and computerised banking world can be provided by other banks, the TSB must provide them too. Therefore, the TSB is driven by its perfectly worthy need and ambition to stay in the banking game to provide modern services. The corporate basis for the TSB will facilitate that.

Secondly, interest attaches to the sheer number of the depositors with the TSB. That number is so great that the potential spread of equity on the far side of incorporation and the allocation of shares is such that the membership and the interest and participation in that bank will be wide. That is likely to be extremely healthy for the TSB in terms of public ownership, using that phrase in its best sense. It will mean that there will be a wide and general participation in a major institution which affects our daily lives and contributes to the services that we all want

We shall have to wait and see what the share take-up turns out to be. The British Telecom share take-up was refreshing. I doubt whether the experience of BT employees will in any way discourage TSB depositors. Some people are doubtless both TSB depositors and BT employees and I am sure that they will be looking forward to their second opportunity to participate in a major national asset with their own assets.

Since we are all talking about the TSB, I should in fairness declare that I have nothing against the big four banks, but neither am I against them being kept on their toes. The TSB, with its large number of depositors, can play a part in ensuring that we all get the best terms because we are free to move our business elsewhere if we want to do so.

Several interesting historical views have been offered to the House in the debate, on the different parentage of the different branches of the TSB. In my part of England, near Birmingham, the origins of nearly all the TSB branches can be traced to the Birmingham Municipal bank which played an important role in the life of Birmingham and its suburbs and served its citizens well. For many of them, it was their kind of bank. I take note of the number of hon. Members who have said that that atmosphere of the bank is worth preserving for that reason and I am in sympathy with that view. Not only was it for many their kind of bank but for some it became a point of first entry to other financial institutions.

I feel sure that the founding fathers of the Birmingham Municipal bank would be fascinated if they knew how their original idea had grown, matured and succeeded, and had come to this day and this measure that we are debating. I support the Bill enthusiastically.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): Before I develop my main remarks on the Bill, it is worth while putting on record my admiration for the energy and initiative that has led to the rejuvenation of the trustee savings banks. There is no doubt that over a period of years and with a long history they have built up strong local associations and not only perform a useful purpose but provide a service and a loyalty in a locality that is much appreciated.

It is from that point that I should express the unease that has developed in me as the debate has progressed. That was not allayed by the exchanges I had with the Minister earlier. We are about to pass the point of no return in relation to the trustee savings bank. It has been argued that the main change was occasioned in 1976 under the Act of that year. But the changes that were made then, which were largely useful and gave additional powers and discretion to the management of the trustees savings banks and led to the amalgamations and mergers, are in danger of being wiped out by a complete change in the composition of the bank, which will lead in turn to centralisation.

When the Minister told me, as if it might be a blandishment that would be of some help, that there would be no diminution in the degree of centalisation if the Bill were passed, my worries were not relieved because there is a great danger of centralisation as a consequence. Prior to the Bill there was a confederal structure, with a central board with autonomous units which co-operated and worked together to make the changes and the image and provide the service to customers that was remarked upon earlier. That will now be encompassed in a new central board with shareholders who, with the directors of the main board, will call the tune in future.

Several years ago we had a great debate on the Royal Bank of Scotland, to which reference has been made. It is probably worth while to put into context some of the points that were made in that debate. It was argued by the Government, among others, that there were advantages in the royal bank being taken over by or merged with other institutions. The argument was set out plainly in The Scotsman on 16 December 1980 in a statement by Mr. Peter Balfour, chairman of the Scottish Council (Development and Industry) who was then a member of the royal bank's board. In an address to the company's annual general meeting he said:

> "In Scotland we are paying the price of the massive and increasing centralisation in London and the South East of the real decision-takers in industry, politics and the trade unions. As a result, the real needs and concerns we all feel in Scotland are becoming more and more remote from the understanding and the thinking of these people."

A year later in the Financial Times is the statement:

> "The existence of banks controlled in Scotland is possibly one of the factors which has enabled Edinburgh to survive as an important financial centre, with a set of traditions and a financial community independent of those in London."

It was against that background that we heard assurances from the Minister that there would be no diminution in centralised control——

Mr. Ian Stewart: I do not recall my exact words when replying to the hon. Gentleman's intervention earlier—I shall say more on the subject when replying to the debate —but to avoid doubt at this stage, I hope that he will appreciate that I was endeavouring to explain that there was already central control. I said that I did not believe that there would be any diminution of local management and independence resulting from the change. It was not the other way round.

Mr. Wilson: I am grateful for that clarification. Although we have assurances, including ministerial assurances, the reality is that when financial control is expressed in any company it is the majority shareholding that counts. Only if assurances are encompassed in legislation can they achieve any material change. The necessary power must be sought from Parliament.

The company that was after the royal bank, Standard Chartered bank, through its managing director gave assurances along the lines of those given by the Minister. He said:

> "It is absolutely not our intention" to detract from the role of the royal bank

> "but I must add the rider that overall group constraints have to be subject to overall group policy."

It is clear from the charts on page 7 of the White Paper that what was an effective confederal structure is to be replaced by seven subsidiary companies all under the control of the group company, TSB Group plc. As I said, once the shares have been issued by TSB Group plc, it will become the master.

Who will have control of the bank's investment policy when it has been restructured? Will it be TSB Group plc or TSB in Scotland? In other words, if there is disagreement within the management structure — for example, about where investment should take place— who will make the final decision? It seems that control will remain with the new board, which will be answerable not to its regional boards, as it might be under a federal structure, but to the shareholders.

In that context, the letter from Sir John Read on page 13 of the White Paper makes it clear in paragraph 10 where power will lie. He writes:

[Mr. Wilson]

"The shareholders will then have the responsibility of electing the directors at the Group's Annual General Meetings. The individual banks and other companies in the Group will have their own boards, appointed"— an important word—

"by the main board of TSB Group plc, and will include"— generously—

"regional bank representatives, executive directors, and independent directors as at present."

The qualifications for service will be decided not by the regional boards or communities served by the subsidiary companies but by the main board in London, be it at Milk street or elsewhere. In other words, a bank with a substantial penetration of the Scottish banking market will be removed from discretionary decision-taking in Scotland, and that brings home some of the remarks of Mr. Peter Balfour, to which reference has been made.

Who will be in charge of marketing, advertising and investment policy? Under the unitary structure which is being imposed on the depositors of the bank, without their consent—their views have not been taken into account, although they may be deemed to be the owners of the reserves and assets of the bank—the decisions will be taken at the centre.

The structure of the new group is not intended to be completely uniform. As the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) said, and as I pointed out in an intervention, special arrangements are being made for the Channel Islands and Isle of Man by which the local subsidiary will have 49 per cent. of its shareholding locally, and thus will have a different structure from the other subsidiaries.

The reason given for the difference is that different taxation laws exist. I agree that different tax regimes exist in those places—they are sometimes debatable, but they exist—and to a degree they have their own laws, though the Isle of Man legal system is based largely on English common law.

In Scotland, on the other hand, we have a legal system which has many differences from that in the rest of the United Kingdom. That applies to banking and other civil obligations. As the Government have conceded, in consultation with the TSB, that there should be special arrangements for the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, special arrangements should be made to safeguard the autonomy of the TSB in Scotland. Indeed, if people in the streets of Scotland were told today that the TSB was at present a United Kingdom bank, many of them would disbelieve it. The TSB in Scotland is marketed in those terms, yet the Scottish people will find that it is a figment of their imagination, because the final power will not reside in Scotland.

A significant change is being made because the Bill provides not just for a new structure but for the transfer of assets. Liabilities and obligations are also mentioned. Assets are to be transferred out of a Scottish environment and into the London investment scheme. We in Scotland must face the problem that, although we have a vigorous banking set-up, big brother exists in London, and, unless we are careful, assets in Scotland will be snapped up. We have seen the way in which the joint stock insurance companies, which were extremely active in Scotland at one time, have largely been absorbed by their competitors in the south. Only the mutual insurance companies have managed to remain healthy, and they might be considered among the leaders in the insurance business.

I regard the Bill as dangerous and I am critical of the Labour party over it. Given the problems that the Bill is likely to create and the opposition to it that has been expressed by Labour Members, the least they should have done was table a reasoned amendment. Although the Government have a 140 majority in this House, I urge the Minister to take account of the real worry which I and others, including the hon. Member for Maryhill, have expressed about the autonomy and function of the TSB in Scotland. The Bill should be amended to take account of our special circumstances. In view of the decision of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission over the royal bank takeover, the Bill should be amended to ensure that the TSB's staunch reputation in Scotland is safeguarded, for the bank has a valuable role to play if given a chance.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I do not intend to take up the detailed arguments of the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) but I shall share with him a recognition of the historical origins of the TSB movement. I hope that in future the new organisation will recollect its associations with Scotland. Short of naming local directors, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman and I can make a few valuable suggestions.

I am hardly a regular member of the group of Finance Committee pundits who talk on these matters and it may seem odd that I am about to say a few words on the Bill. I do so for only one reason, and that is historical. The savings bank movement began in my constituency of Dumfries in 1810. It would be wrong to pass the Bill without a word of tribute to Dr. Henry Duncan, minister of the parish of Ruthwell near Dumfries. Besides being a doctor of divinity, he had some commercial experience as a young man. He began the savings bank movement in 1810 in a small house in the village of Ruthwell. He accepted deposits of a shilling and upwards at a time when the banks would not take less than £10. It should be borne in mind that at that time the average farm worker earned less than £10 a year. They could hardly deposit their savings with other banks in the tiny amounts that Dr. Duncan thought would be valuable in future. The new bank was vital to those who earned especially low wages but who wished to begin saving.

Dr. Duncan's savings bank began its operations in 1810 and in the first year deposits totalled £151. After four years, they had reached over £1,000. All the deposits were put into a locked box with three padlocks. The box could be opened only if all the three trustees were present with their individual keys. The cash was sent to the British Linen bank at Dumfries, where it earned a rate of interest of 4 per cent. From this humble beginning, the movement spread rapidly to Dumfries. In 1875, it inherited the bank of Ruthwell and only a few weeks ago it joined the royal bank group as the last but one of the independent savings banks in Scotland, leaving only Airdrie on its own. The Annan bank has served the community well in agriculture and commerce over a long period.

Dr. Duncan masterminded the 1819 Act and assisted in the development of savings banks everywhere. Because of his thrift and foresight itis right to call him a father of the savings bank movement. Besides his restoration of the seventh century Ruthwell cross and his authorship of many books, he was the moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. Shortly after that, at the time of the disruption, he fell out with his colleagues and was one of the original members of the free church.

Moving on many years, to last year, we should recall the death of Andrew Rintoul, who lived near Newtonstewart and who was chairman of the Glasgow savings bank for many years. He was the first chairman of the trustee saving banks central board, the body which was recommended by the Page report. He had a fine record of service to the TSB movement. It is only right on this occasion to recall that my hon. Friend the Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Lang) served as a trustee for many years.

I am glad to know that the TSB movement has taken a close interest in Dr. Duncan. It purchased the old cottage in Ruthwell in 1951 and established a museum there. In 1974 we celebrated the bicentenary of Dr. Duncan's birth. The ceremony was attended by the great-great-grandson of Dr. Duncan. I remember that it took place in the middle of the 1974 general election campaign. It was well worth a few minutes of diversion to attend that memorable commemoration. The museum has been well looked after and I hope that all the financial experts in this place will visit Ruthwell and kneel at the shrine of Dr. Duncan, who began the savings bank movement.

I wish the Bill well. I hope that Dr. Duncan will smile happily and proudly on the movement which he started, which has such good prospects in future.

6.45 pm

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helen's, South): I begin by telling the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) that I told Mr. Speaker that I would be late in contributing to the debate for personal reasons. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I ascertained carefully the content of the speeches that preceded his. I am well aware that the ownership issue is well known throughout the House and the savings bank movement. My reason for speaking in this debate is that I have a great fear about that divide. I am not worried about expanding the services of the TSB movement. Indeed, I welcome that move 100 per cent., and my support for that part of the Bill is wholehearted.

I have a number of reservations about the way in which the Bill has been brought to the House and they lead me to ask the House to reject it tonight. I have made known my feelings to my colleagues on the Opposition Front Bench. I am aware that the Bill has been considered carefully by the Examiners of the House and that the legality of the Bill has been questioned. If I am treading on ground that has already been covered by others, I make no apology for doing so.

No one knows where true ownership of the movement lies. We are all aware of the 1817 Act and the Scottish legislation that was introduced in 1835. I am not proposing to enter into a history lesson, but it is clear that those who started the savings movement created a form of banking in which money was put out for certain specific purposes, and as such they became trustees. A trustee is someone who holds on behalf of someone else and not on his own behalf.

The Treasury has said openly, frankly and rightly that it does not own the trustee savings banks and that this is not a privatisation measure. One is forced to ask who wants the Bill in the form in which it appears before us. It is not necessary to ask who wants the services of the trustee savings banks to be expanded, because the answer to that is, "Everybody." Who wants the new TSB group to be a plc? Is that what the depositors want? The fact is that they have not been asked. Do those who will use the expanded services want the new group to be a plc? Again, they have not been asked.

Who wants the new group to be a plc? Apparently this is the wish of the managers. Why is this? Why do they want to sell off something which they do not own? Why do they want to create a limited company? There has been much argument about neutrality and perhaps that is the only reasonable solution. However, there is a problem. If I am thinking along these lines, and I am merely a lawyer, many more of my kind who are outside this place will be asking the same question. I tempt fortune when I say that the Bill might run into a little trouble with the English courts. If anyone tests the right to sell or to float the trustee savings banks as a public company, I shall not guarantee what the result of the test will be.

Secondly, why does the management want to sell off the trustee savings banks? Why does it want to raise funds by the sale of shares? If the shares are bought, the management will be on a Telecom-Amersham type of deal. We are talking about assets of £8 billion. There are 6 million depositors and 13 million accounts. The banks are not trapped and bedevilled by many of the problems that face other commercial banks. How will a flotation price be pitched? We have been given no idea about that. How will that be done so that a massive profit is not reaped on the day of flotation for those who are lucky enough to get in on the deal?

The ordinary citizens will not be the people to get in on this deal. We have seen what happened with British Telecom and Jaguar. We have had the placings, as the City so nicely puts it, and the agreed numbers. We will have that type of change again. We do not even know what the memorandum and articles of association will say. I say to the Economic Secretary in the kindest possible way that all the assurances in the world from him will not be worth anything if they are not written into the legislation. That is the only way in which the provisions can be made to stick. I have sufficient experience as a lawyer to know that memoranda and articles of association can be changed. One need only have the agreement of 51 per cent. of the shareholders and their views can be judged by a show of hands or a written poll. I foresee a time when limitations will be written into the memorandum and articles of association restricting a shareholder to 5 per cent. of the equity. It does not take much thought to work out that 11 institutions holding 5 per cent. each of the shares will be able to change the memorandum and articles of association.

After five years, a shareholder will be able to hold up to 15 per cent. of the shares. We know that shares change hands. Already we have noted that BT shares have moved from the personal sector to institutions. We have seen what happened with Jaguar and Amersham. I foresee that, shortly after flotation, the shares will begin to move.

The institutions may not need to wait five years before building up to their 15 per cent. stake. Let us face it: a valuable asset will come on to the market. I know that it is to be written into the legislation that priority must be given to depositors and to employees, and that is well and good. What statement will be made stipulating that a certain percentage must not go abroad? We have already had the flotation of British Telecom shares in Japan and New York, so we know that this new idea is accepted. What guarantee do we have that the flotation of shares will be limited to this country and that a percentage of shares will not be floated abroad? Flotation provides one of the easiest and quickest ways of enabling a company to enter the English banking sector. Shareholders are thereby able to join a bank that does not have the commercial worries of other major joint stock banks.

Who has the right to sell shares? Would it not have been much better to create a mutual association? There would then not have been any problems with shareholders and fears of what might happen during the five-year period or afterwards. The Government with their built-in majority may overwhelm the views of my hon. Friends who will support me in opposing the legislation and the Bill may be considered in Committee. I must warn the Government that it is not good enough to introduce a Bill that does not contain a schedule setting out the memorandum and articles of association. It is not good enough to have legislation that does not state that the 5 per cent. and 15 per cent. shareholdings cannot be altered, that the majority of shares must remain in the United Kingdom and that certain factors apply to charitable donations and foundations. I shall not repeat the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) on those points. I am always suspicious when I read the throwaway lines in Government papers—for example, the reference in paragraph 14 of Mr. Read's letter to charitable foundations that will hold special shares. We are not told about the terms and conditions applying to that new class of shareholder.

This badly drafted Bill is based upon a false premise —that one can sell what one does not own. The Bill is unnecessary, because there is no need for this new statutory form of TSB. There is the much better, more acceptable and carefully thought through form—that of mutual foundations. That form should, perhaps have been written in to the 1976 legislation. That was the road we should have taken.

It is not too late for the Government to think again. For once, the Bill contains nothing for the Government's coffers. The Government can therefore stand back, reappraise the subject in the light of the arguments advanced in the House and return with an expansion of the TSB which is in the TSB's interests. That action would receive the support of the whole House, because all hon. Members are for the enhancement of the service, improvement of its functions and development of the bank. I am sure that the whole country does not support the idea that some people should make a profit from the banks and institutions that belonged to our forefathers.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): The debate has given rise to certain points. Is this the right way to proceed with the TSBs? That question involves whether the TSBs should have gone mutual or, as the Government have proposed, should have become a public limited company. If the TSB public limited company is the right route to follow, it can be said that we are debating Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark. The vital issues associated with a public limited company concern the allocation of shares and protection from takeovers. Neither of those issues is dealt with in the Bill. We have only assurances contained in the letter from Sir John Read to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which are not binding. It is important to establish the terms of the argument. Are the Government saying, "This is what we always wanted for the TSBs and this is the culmination of that process."? Are they saying, "I know that we want the TSBs to follow a different route but I am afraid that the commercial realities dictate that we cannot do that."? The Government seem to have been saying the latter.

Undoubtedly, the last 10 years have seen an enormous and extraordinary transformation of the Trustee Savings bank. It has been stated that the Bill is the end of that process of change. That the trustee savings banks should change has never been an issue. The clarification of ownership could provide a sufficient reason for that change to occur. That clarification obviously had to occur. That substantial change has taken place without controversy between the two main parties. It was recognised at all times that a balance had to be maintained between making the Trustee Savings bank able to hold its own and grow in a modern commercial world and preserving the special traditions and character of the trustee savings bank movement. That character involves particularly the strong regional and local participation in and identification with the Trustee Savings bank. The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) pointed out how people in Scotland regard the Trustee Savings bank as a Scottish institution. My relations, who have had the good fortune to come from Glasgow, were heavily involved in the Trustee Savings bank. They always regarded that bank as an institution that differed from the ordinary joint stock bank.

The question is whether that balance between commercial reality and the special traditions of the TSB has been kept. It is not doubted that the Bill will enable the TSB to live comfortably in the real world. The anxiety expressed during the debate is whether its special character will be lost in the process. If it is, we shall not merely have abandoned the legacy of the past, we shall have failed to take an opportunity to provide a different vision for our banking system in future. We value the TSBs for sentimental reasons and because, at best, they have symbolised the notion of community banking.

Two parallel movements have taken place during the past 10 years. First is the extension of the services of the TSBs and the second is the reorganisation of the TSBs, which was partly a centralisation process and partly an attempt to allow the TSBs to function more efficiently and without Government constraints. It is extraordinary to think that when the Page committee reported there were still about 70 different associations.

The Page committee acknowledged the need for the TSB to become tighter as an organisation and progress to a range of banking services for customers, especially lending. It is true, however, that the Page committee envisaged that lending should be to the ordinary public rather than corporate lending.

I must inform the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Cockeram) that the movement from the Page committee was not initiated by the Labour party. It is best illustrated by the Bill. It is right to say that the Bill is inconsistent with the Page committee in its original intentions.

Mr. Cockeram: Will the hon. Gentleman accept my point that although the Page committee was set up by and reported to a Conservative Chancellor, it fell to the subsequent Labour Chancellor to announce the then Government's decision because of the short lapse of time between the two events? The then Chancellor, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), accepted the recommendations of the Committee. To that extent, does the hon. Gentleman not agree that there was a bipartisan approach to the reform of the national savings movement, which was the core of the issue put to the Page committee?

Mr. Blair: That is right. However, it is worth emphasising that the Page committee and the Labour Government believed that if the TSB was to develop, it should be in the direction of mutual banking. That was made plain.

My point is that, although the 1976 legislation was introduced without opposition, the consensus on all sides of the House was that the TSB would develop along the lines of a mutual bank. The importance of developing in that way was put clearly by both the Paymaster General in 1976, who moved the Second Reading of the Trustee Savings Banks Bill, and by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon). The TSB was to become what was called a third force in banking and was to be a different form of banking from that of the clearing banks.

The concept of the TSB as a third force in banking survived much of the structural, economic and commercial changes that took place in the TSB during the 1970s and early 1980s. The Government's view is that at one time there was a consensus that the TSB should progress through mutual banking, but that changes in commercial reality make that no longer a sensible option. There were significant changes in the commercial operations of the TSB, yet the concept of mutual banking survived.

The attitude of the management of the TSB changed in mid-1928. Until 1982 the TSB was always supposed to be in favour of moving in the direction of mutual banking. On Second Reading of the Trustee Savings Banks Bill in 1976 the Economic Secretary made it clear that corporate lending would create great dangers and that the personal customer service was ideal for trustee savings banks.

In 1978, when the TSB management submitted evidence to the Wilson committee, which was set up to review the function of financial institutions, it continually stressed the need for a third force in banking. The idea was alive then. It is clear from press reports between 1979 and 1981 that the idea then was that the TSB would become the third force in banking and a mutual bank.

For many reasons, the desire was to preserve the special traditions and character of the TSBs. I wish to emphasise the reasons why it was thought so important for the TSB to become the third force in banking and to be a mutual bank. First, the banks catered for the small depositor and the family—those who were otherwise unbanked within the system. That was true when it was established in the early 19th century and it remains true today. That feeling was reinforced by the fact that for many years, and to an extent today, the TSB has been an arm of national savings. The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) pointed out that successive Governments took a lot from the TSBs. The case for the TSB being kept under the control of its depositors is strengthened by that degree of Government involvement and by the slightly parasitic relationship between the Government and the TSBs.

Although I agree that it is clear that depositors do not own the TSB, their rights are quasi-proprietorial because of the traditions, and the relationship with the national savings movement. A point that has not been made, and should be made by the Conservative party, is that if the Government were truly committed to a wide share ownership or to wide participation of people in our institutions, the mutual banking route would be better than the plc route. In a mutual bank there would not be ownership of shares but there would be participation in accordance with the traditions of the TSBs.

The responsibilities to the traditions of the TSB are still acknowledged by its management today. It makes it clear in advocating the plc route that it realises that the traditions must be upheld. It has been put to the TSB that it is better to become a public limited company because it can raise money more easily and is accountable to shareholders. I understand that there has been no process of formal or informal consultations between depositors and the TSB management about the right route for the TSB. That is a weakness. A curiosity arising from the uncertainty of ownership is that it makes it more difficult to say who should be involved in what happens to the TSB. It would be wrong if the uncertainty resulted in depriving depositors of the right to participate in the consultation process.

The concept of the TSB as a third force in banking has been all but dropped from either the White Paper or the Bill, and the only protection that depositors have—this worries us considerably—is not in the Bill but in the letter from the chairman of the TSB to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Indeed, the Bill in a sense is really an enabling measure; it vests the property in the plc and allows it to float shares, but it does not itself deal with the requirements that are necessary to ensure that the character of the TSB is observed. As far as I can see, that is left exclusively to the TSB management to determine.

Two essential points arise. First, there is the question of share allocation. There is absolutely no way at this stage of judging what allocation of shares there will be to the depositors or to the employees. The hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) spoke of the need for wide ownership. We simply do not know how many shares depositors will have. There is no indication — the Minister may say that there is—whether any thought has been given to the number of shares that depositors or employees can expect.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate suggested that my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) was wrong in saying that as many as 40 per cent. would not be able to take up shares. He made the point—it is a fair one in a sense—that there are many people who may not have much money in the TSB but may have money in other accounts. But that is to say that there may be fewer than 40 per cent. who cannot take up shares; in other words, there may be a very high proportion of depositors who want to take up shares. If we are to judge the measure properly, we should be told what figure is in mind for depositors. That is crucial to the spreading of share ownership.

With regard to takeovers, 5 per cent. for five years is the greatest amount permitted, but that is still considerable. It could still mean that large numbers of depositors could not get the opportunity to own shares. After five years the figure is to be fixed at 15 per cent., but that is only in the articles of association, and there would be no great difficulty about changing it.

[Mr. Blair]

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) eloquently explained the attractiveness of TSB, and I doubt whether many people will wrestle with their consciences, in the way that he did, about buying. The plain fact is that there is no guarantee that, after a five-year period, there could not be a substantial change in the nature of the TSB.

The Minister should tell us the basis upon which the matter is being put. If it is being said that it is no longer possible to have the notion of a third force in banking, or to go down the road of mutuality, we can judge the argument on those terms. But it is wrong for the Government to protest that this is merely the end of a foreseeable process when what has taken place is a considerable change of course. I should like to know specifically from the Minister why the Bill, even if it goes down the plc route, cannot contain adequate safeguards to ensure that the tradition and character of the TSB is observed. If that does not happen, whatever the rhetoric from Government or management, the reality will be substantially different.

Mr. Ian Stewart: By leave of the House, Mr. Speaker, I hope that I may have an opportunity of responding to the debate.

Before dealing with the general questions which have been raised, I should like to mention quickly one or two practical questions which were put to me. The hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) referred to the memorandum and articles. They are available in the Library. I do not at this stage want to enter into a debate with him about company law, but my understanding is that special resolutions, which are usually required for changes in articles, are likely to need a higher percentage of support than he suggested.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) raised with me in an intervention, and also in his speech, the question of possible direct shareholding in TSB (Scotland). I said that I would come back to that. It embodies a principle as well as the point that the hon. Gentleman raised. The local shareholding which it is proposed to make available in TSB (Channel Islands) is not provided for in the Bill. It is a proposal which the TSBs have put forward under their own powers. It would not be appropriate to insert a statutory requirement in the Bill itself either for or against such a thing. It would have been possible, if TSB (Scotland) had wanted to have such an arrangement — I imagine after discussion with other members of the TSB group — to put forward a suggestion that TSB (Scotland), or any of the other TSBs, should have that degree of independent shareholding. That is not the way in which the proposals have come forward, and far be if from me to suggest that they should do so in that way.

The hon. Gentleman also spoke about control. The structure of the group will be different. The holding company will be at the top rather than in the middle, as shown by page 7 of the White Paper. The top company will be a holding company and not a banking company. The banking, as I understand it, will be controlled by the boards of the four main banks, and the other business within the group will be controlled by the boards of the companies which do that particular business.

Mr. Gordon Wilson: I do not see any reason why, in the public interest, we should not insert certain provisions, whether the TSBs like it or not. The Minister says that the banking operations will be carried out by the subsidiary companies. Who will have control of the assets of those subsidiary companies? At the end of the day, will it not be the holding company, comprising the shareholders, which will have the right to say yea or nay with regard to disposal of the assets?

Mr. Stewart: The technical position would be the same as with any holding company and group, but in the case of the TSB group, as with many other quoted companies, the operating subsidiaries generally run their business, and not the holding companies which happen to be parent companies of the group. Clearly, the TSBs themselves have seen the need for a form of co-ordination of their activities, and that is reflected in the existing structure. I tried to explain earlier that there is a change in the structure, but it is not as if there is no central function as things now stand. The proposals have been worked out both by the individual TSBs and by the centre.

The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) asked me at the outset of her speech about the timing of the flotation. I understand that the TSBs hope that it can take place by about next winter. It is not for the Government to determine. The vesting is a formality which must take place before the decision for the issue itself. That depends on several factors such as market conditions, the date of publication of accounts for quotation in a prospectus, and so on. Those are matters that the TSBs themselves will be able to settle.

I should like to refer briefly to the main issues that have been developed during the debate, because they are fundamental. I shall try to cover the main points that were raised by Opposition Members as well as my hon. Friends.

There is an oddity about the Bill, which presents some difficulties to me and the House. I readily admit that, because it is inherent in the situation. If the TSBs were already Companies Act companies in the private sector, if they were part of the banking group in that form, and wanted such a reorganisation, they would come to the House with a private Bill. They would be answerable for the way in which they had approached the House, and it would not be a Minister standing at the Dispatch Box who would tell them how to do it. At the other end of the reorganisation are the Government's existing responsibilities, laid down by a century and more of legislation on the statutory structure and powers of the TSB movement. Apart from the vexed question of ownership, to which I shall refer, the Government have responsibility for supervision, taxation and constraints — in this case, the removal of constraints on the ability of the TSBs to undertake an increased range of business.

Therefore, there is a Government interest. It is not, as has been frequently said during the debate, a Government financial interest. The Government are disinterested in that respect. They are disinterested in the issue, in that aspect of the future of the TSBs — and properly so. It was suggested that the Government might consider taking the resources of the TSBs into their own hands. That has never been the intention of the Government or of any of the proposals that have been considered. The idea is to allow the TSBs to develop in the way that those responsible for them have come to the conclusion is the best way forward in today's conditions.

Clearly, that raises several points of principle. I have been asked by many hon. Members about the Government's attitude to the recommendations in the Page report on the third force in banking. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) and other hon. Members referred to the local commitment and regional identity of the TSBs. Whatever may have been the position in 1973 or even when the 1976 Act was before the House, the Government and I and the TSBs do not believe that the mutual structure would be appropriate, either for today or for the future. It is important that we look forward and not backward in making our provisions for the TSBs in future.

I mentioned immediate practical considerations that have weighed substantially with the TSBs and the Government in considering the matter. Direct accountability is very important for those who are competing in the commercial environment of the retail banking sector today. Direct accountability to shareholders will be given through boards of directors and the holding company structure in a clear-cut way that will allow decisions to be taken that are in the commercial interests of the TSBs, and, in that sense, in the commercial interests of the depositors.

I have a strong personal concern that the depositors with the TSBs should feel that there is a continuing identity with the TSBs between themselves and the banks they use. I support the proposals by the TSBs that regional boards should continue and that there should be charitable foundations with favourable proposals for local interests. I support the idea that the depositors and the staff, who are by definition depositors, should have substantial priority.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) raised a fair question when he asked about the Government's attitude to that. He asked about the Government's choice. A pattern has been worked out through discussion between the Government and the TSBs as to what is best for their own future. I do not come to the Dispatch Box to propose legislation for the TSBs that is not in their best interest. I hope and believe that a large number of depositors will apply successfully for shares.

I have been asked about the number of shares, the scale of priority, the terms of the issue and so on. Those are not matters that the Government can resolve or decide. I realise that that presents a dilemma. It is an enabling Bill. It allows a process to continue and be completed that has been fully explained in Sir John Read's letter, which is in the White Paper. However, if hon. Members are anxious to learn more specifically about the proposals that it will be the responsibility of the TSBs to carry through, through the TSB parliamentary group or another means of communication, Sir John Read, members of the central board and other representatives of the TSBs may want to take into account what has been said during the debate and in Committee and respond so far as they can to the questions that have been raised.

I have considered carefully what my position would be if I were asked such questions, because it has occurred to me that the House might be interested in some of those details, as I am, but I cannot take such decisions for the TSBs. The details of the flotation will have to be worked out by the TSBs with their advisers, the Stock Exchange and so on. It should not be Parliament that makes those decisions. It should not be Ministers, even a Minister as well disposed to the TSBs as I am. Parliament must provide the framework in which the change can take place, and the matters must then be resolved by the TSBs themselves.

Mr. Blair: Is not this the problem? Because of the uncertainty of ownership, when one talks about the TSBs advocating a certain course of action, all that one can refer to is the TSB management. In a sense, the depositors are a casualty of the uncertainty of ownership. The question that the Minister must answer to satisfy people is this. Why was not some attempt made to ascertain the views of the depositors? Unless the Government stand up for the depositors, they have no one else to turn to.

Mr. Stewart: I was going to refer to ownership. I shall do so now. Rather than answering the hon. Gentleman's specific question, I shall make some comments that cover the points that he made.

There is not just uncertain ownership; there is a lack of ownership of the TSBs. Parliament must resolve that problem. It is true that a mutual ownership could have been chosen, but I do not believe that that is right, and those who are responsible for the business of the TSBs also do not believe that that is right. Then there is the question of consultation. Again, there is a problem with the constitutional position. There is no formal means, and no easy informal means, of ascertaining the relative interests of those who are party to the TSBs in one form or another. There are trustees, managers, staff and depositors, so far as one can have access to them in this respect.

The proposals in the chairman's statement in 1982 received a good deal of publicity at the time, both generally and within the group, but I understand that there was very little reaction and that no strong case was put forward in favour of mutual ownership rather than the structure proposed. Whatever might have seemed sensible to Sir Harry Page in the early 1970s, it is simply not practical in today's conditions if one wishes this group of banks to be able to hold its own competitively with the four clearing banks.

As for the "third force", one cannot describe the market in such simple terms as one could 10 or more years ago. The barriers of function in banking, instalment credit, and so on have been considerably broken down and the financial institutions in retail banking can no longer be parcelled out into three separate groups — clearing banks, National Giro and TSB—each with a different constitution. I hope that in some respects the clearing banks will become more like the TSB rather than vice versa, because the TSB's great tradition of attention to the needs of customers is important commercially as well as historically as an element which is becoming increasingly important to customers of banking services today.

The question of consultation is thus linked with the lack of ownership. Until 1976, if a TSB closed down the surplus went into what was known as a "closed banks fund", showing that no one knew where to look in terms of ownership. The management and central board of the TSB have taken great care to consider all these matters within the movement before putting their proposals to us and I believe that those proposals constitute an appropriate way forward. We feel that we should support, as it were, the private Bill element in this by creating enabling legislation to deal with those aspects which remain the responsibility of Government.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: The Minister has not dealt with the 5 per cent. limit on ownership and the fact that after five years it will be possible to apply for and obtain, by takeover or other means, 15 per cent. of the shares. The Minister has said that the memorandum and articles of association will deal with that. Will he accept an amendment to enshrine the limit in the legislation so that it will not be possible for anyone to obtain a greater proportion in the future?

Mr. Stewart: I do not think that it would be appropriate for the legislation itself to include specific provisions about the flotation or about the subsequent conduct of the TSB as a private sector company. I take the point that the 5 per cent. limit in the memorandum will expire after five years, followed by a provision in the articles restricting any single shareholding to 15 per cent. We are talking about a time a considerable way off and we must not forget that legislation relating to the structure of financial institutions has been shown in recent years to become out of date very quickly. Enshrining in statute specific requirements on that or various other aspects, thus setting the TSBs apart from other banks for an unlimited period until Parliament decided to change it, would not in my view be in the best interests of the TSBs. I am therefore not persuaded by the right hon. Gentleman's argument.

I believe that the overall purpose of the Bill is helpful to the TSB and its depositors, and I hope that the House will give it a fair wind today.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

Water (Fluoridation) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill is seen by the Government as a valuable measure of preventive medicine of some significance for the dental health of many children in this country. On the other hand, the Bill does not break any dramatic new ground. It clarifies the law to enable the existing practice to continue in some parts of England and the former practice to be resumed in Scotland. I refer to the practice whereby fluoride is added to the water in some parts of the country at local option. The practice has proved valuable in reducing the amount of dental decay among children.

I propose, first, to explain why we need to introduce such a Bill when there has been a long-standing policy on fluoride in this country and, until recently, in Scotland. Secondly, I propose to deal with the health and safety issues connected with water fluoridation. In view of some controversy in medical and scientific circles, the concern about some of these matters is understandable. Finally, I shall refer briefly to individual liberty and the role of the Government. I know that many hon. Members, including some of my hon. Friends, are concerned about those matters.

The need for the Bill arises from Lord Jauncey's judgment, in the Strathclyde fluoridation court case, delivered on 29 June 1983. Hon. Members may recall that the case was brought by a Mrs. McColl, a lady living in Glasgow, who sought to prevent Strathclyde regional council from carrying out its intention progressively to fluoridate the water supplies for which, as the statutory water authority, it was responsible. The case lasted for over 200 days, and its length made Scottish legal history. Much of the public hearing was devoted to discussion of the safety of water fluoridation, and a large number of expert witnesses were called, including almost all the leading anti-fluoridationists.

It is my intention to cover safety issues in more detail later in my speech, but Lord Jauncey's finding on the safety issue was:

"there is no evidence to suggest that fluoride at the proposed level would have an adverse effect upon health".

Having heard a great mass of evidence and the most sustained arguments before an objective arbiter — a judge in a court of law—that there have ever been in this country, Lord Jauncey rejected all the petitioner's contentions that fluoridation was hazardous and confirmed that the fluoridation of water supplies would be likely to reduce considerably the incidence of caries — dental decay—in Strathclyde.

Lord Jauncey accepted, however, that fluoridation was legally ultra vires in Scotland, because it went beyond the legal powers of Strathclyde regional council under Scottish water legislation. The case turned on the question whether the duty of the council to provide "wholesome water" provided the legal power for fluoridation. Lord Jauncey accepted that fluoridated water was wholesome in the sense that "it is neither contaminated nor in any other way dangerous to health", but concluded that fluoridation was legally ultra vires in the narrower sense that it

[Mr. Kenneth Clarke]

"did not facilitate the supply of wholesome water, nor was it incidental to it".

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): Is it not a fact that Lord Jauncey in his judgment said that, when used for the purpose of preventing tooth decay, the addition of fluoride to the water represented a medicinal product? As such, would my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it would come within the Medicines Act?

Mr. Clarke: I do not recall that passage in Lord Jauncey's judgment. I have quoted his conclusions on the safety issue and the legal issue whether the existing statutory powers of the regional council cover the addition of fluoride. At the moment, fluoride is not regarded as a medicinal product by the licensing authority. Fluoride is a mineral that, when added to water, has these particular consequences; and it is a wholly separate issue as to whether it is a medicinal product and requires licensing under the Medicines Act. I shall pursue the point further if my hon. Friend wishes, but, on the strength of the evidence that I shall be citing in the course of my speech and of the body of evidence looked at by Lord Jauncey, there would not be any difficulty in obtaining a licence if it were established that fluoride is a medicine and requires a licence.

Following Lord Jauncey's opinion, the Government took immediate action to comply, and fluoridation ceased in Scotland. Fluoridation has, however, continued elsewhere in the United Kingdom, as Lord Jauncey's judgment is not binding outside Scotland. Although the Water Acts, as they apply in England and Wales, are similarly worded to the Scottish Acts, it does not follow that Lord Jauncey's view would necessarily be upheld by the courts south of the border. Unfortunately, doubt is now established because of the Scottish judgment.

The Government announced on 6 December 1983 that it was our intention, when the parliamentary timetable permitted, to bring forward legislation which could clarify the power of water authorities in Scotland to add fluoride to the water supply on the recommendation of the appropriate health boards. Since there was doubt over the legal powers of water authorities elsewhere in the United Kingdom to fluoridate, we announced that we also proposed that the legislation should cover all statutory water undertakers in England and Wales and that corresponding legislation should be enacted for Northern Ireland. That is still our intention, and the Bill reflects this.

I shall now address the basic question of the need and the case for water fluoridation as a measure of preventive medicine, which I began by describing. I hope that the House will be prepared to accept that dental decay constitutes a serious health problem which needs to be addressed. Although there has been a welcome reduction in dental decay over the past 10 years, it remains a significant and costly form of disease, which is particularly subject to regional variation. To illustrate this I shall quote from the 1983 child dental health survey, which showed that, for example, among 13-year-olds, 64 per cent. of children from Northern Ireland had active decay of the permanent dentition, 51 per cent. from Scotland, 40 per cent. from Wales and 31 per cent. from England.

Water fluoridation is not, of course, the only means of reducing dental decay, but it does have particular advantages over other methods, which I shall briefly explain. Improvements in dental health can undoubtedly be brought about by improvements in diet and oral hygiene, and it is our policy as a Government to encourage dental health education through the Health Education Council and the community dental services. At the same time, we have to recognise that there are limits to what can be achieved by this method alone. For this reason, we believe that it is important to encourage other forms of preventive dental treatment involving the use of fluoride supplements. There are a number of means of providing fluoride supplementation, such as toothpaste, tablets and what is called topical application directly on to the tooth. These are certainly valuable methods of preventing tooth decay, and much of the recent general reduction in dental decay is thought to be related to the use of fluoridated toothpaste.

Fluoride tablets and topical application of fluoride are of value, particularly in those areas where fluoride is not added to water, but they are a relatively expensive means of reducing dental decay. The use of fluoride tablets also requires the following of a regular regime, and experience has shown that that is not always easy for parents to maintain. Topical fluoride requires administration by trained staff. All the other methods—better diet, oral hygiene and tablets—are followed by only a certain proportion of the population, and by no means all.

Water flurodiation has advantages over all these methods in that it is highly cost-effective, does not require the use of trained personnel or conscious effort by the recipient and confers a benefit on the whole of a given community.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): I am in favour of what the right hon. and learned Gentleman is saying about the advantages of fluoride added to water. However, to complete the record, will he also mention the fact that fluoride can be and is being added to milk by an organisation run by a philanthropist in the south of England? That shows that there is another way to introduce fluoride into the system, although it is not as good a method as fluoride in the water.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for adding that example of another way in which fluoride can be given in the appropiate quantities to those who want it. I am glad that he agrees with me that all these specific methods do not reach all the population, and water fluoridation has advantages over all of them and is much more comprehensive in its effects.

I am aware that doubts have been raised in some quarters as to the effectiveness of water fluoridation. Lord Jauncey, in the Strathclyde case, considered the main studies that had been carried out on the effectiveness of fluoridation and concluded that, whatever inperfections individual studies might have,

"the message is nevertheless loud and clear from many different parts of the world. Water fluoridated to one part per million substantially reduces the incidence of caries. With evidence such as this available it is not surprising that the majority of the dental profession in the United Kingdom favours the fluoridation of water supplies".

Lord Jauncey also considered and rejected the theories that fluoridation only delays the incidence of caries and can lead to the delayed eruption of teeth.

In this country, that evidence about the effectiveness and safety of fluoride has been followed for years in some areas. About 5 million people, including my family, drink water where the fluoride content has been artificially increased to the optimum recommended level of one part per million. Successive surveys have shown that dental decay levels among children who have had lifelong exposure to fluoridation are consistently lower than among children in comparable non-fluoridation areas. There is ample evidence that the fluoridation of water results in a markedly greater reduction in dental decay than simply the use of fluoridated toothpaste or other dental health measures.

The House may be interested to know, to add to my point about the experience that we now have, that fluoridation is carried out in more han 40 countries in five continents, and that more than 200 million people worldwide receive artificially fluoridated water.

Mrs. Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Am I right in assuming that the water that my right hon. and learned Friend spoke of his family drinking is in the Birmingham area? Is he aware that the Birmingham dental hospital has no cases of caries among children and that when students are required to look at caries in children, as a result of the fluoridation programme, children from outside the Birmingham area have to be brought in.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that information. Comparisons of the incidence of dental caries among children in my hon. Friend's part of the country — Birmingham — and in other comparable areas have shown that the incidence of dental caries is lower among children in Birmingham. There might be some reaction in Birmingham if people were told that fluoridation had to be withdrawn from the water because the House had failed to pass the necessary legislation. I accept, as I am sure my hon. Friend does, that it is not sufficient simply to prove that fluoridation reduces dental decay for it to be accepted as a public health measure.

All those who advocate the adding of fluoride to water are just as concerned as the opponents about public safety, and safety always has been, and will remain, a primary concern. During the 1970s the safety of fluoridation was reviewed repeatedly by national and international bodies, such as the World Health Organisation, the Canadian Public Health Association, the United States National Academy of Sciences, the Australian Health and Medical Research Council, and in this country by the Royal College of Physicians. All those bodies concluded in published reports that fluoridation represents a safe means of reducing dental decay.

Therefore, I hope that the House will forgive me if I do not today go through all the arguments that have been made about all the ailments which at some time or another have been attributed to fluoride, and seek to set out the scientific case that has refuted those claims. Fluoride has been blamed for the increased incidence of many ailments, ranging from cot deaths to AIDS. The House will perhaps understand how curious some of the more fringe claims have been when I say that the evidence on AIDS appeared to derive solely from the fact that water in San Francisco has fluoride added to it as a dental measure. It now appears that other causes exist for AIDS being prevalent in that city.

However, I accept that serious people have challenged the use of fluoride. Where detailed, assessable evidence is put forward that fluoridation is unsafe, it is extremely important that the Government and my Department should examine carefully all the evidence and make known their conclusions. For that reason, I wish to address tonight in more detail some of the more serious problems that have been raised, especially the allegations that have been made for some years that fluoridation can cause cancer in man, together with recent reports from a laboratory in Japan concerning short-term tests of fluoride for mutagenicity.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Is the Minister aware that, even if one accepted that fluoride is entirely safe, some of us would still be opposed to it on the principle that we cannot accept compulsory medication?

Mr. Clarke: I shall deal with that point at the end of my speech. There are doubts — it would clarify the debate if we narrowed the issue to that — about the effectiveness of fluoride, but the scientific case is overwhelmingly against them. Some silly claims, and some serious ones, have been made about the safety of fluoride. It is important to set out all the evidence to reassure the public that the overwhelming balance of evidence is that fluoride is safe. Then we are left with the serious issue which I know worries the right hon. Gentleman and some others, and which I hope to address at the end of my speech. I must first try to dispose of the safety arguments.

To take first the alleged link with cancer, the principal evidence for such a link has been presented by two American scientists, Dr. Burk and Dr. Yiamouyiannis, who since 1975 have claimed repeatedly that cancer mortality in the United States has increased as a result of fluoridation. Their claim is based on statistical comparisons of cancer death rates in fluoridated and non-fluoridated cities. The data in support of the allegation have been considered by other scientists here and elsewhere and have by no means received general credence, with many criticisms being levelled at the methodology employed by those two doctors.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan), when he was Minister for Health, established an expert committee, initially under the chairmanship of Professor Alderson, and subsequently Professor Knox, with the terms of reference:

"to reappraise the published and otherwise available data and conclusions on cancer incidence and mortality amongst populations whose drinking water is either artificially fluoridated or contains high levels of fluoride from natural sources."

The report of that committee was published today, and copies are available in the House. After detailed consideration of the many studies covering large populations, which are considered in the report, including those of Burk and Yiamouyiannis, the committee concluded:

"We have found nothing in any of the major classes of epidemiological evidence which could lead us to conclude that either fluoride occurring naturally in water, or fluoride added to water supplies, is capable of inducing cancer, or of increasing the mortality from cancer. This statement applies both to cancer as a whole and to cancer at a large number of specific sites. In this we concur with the great majority of scientific investigation and commentators in this field. The only contrary conclusions are in our view attributable to errors in data, errors in analytical technique, and errors in scientific logic."

The committee went further — hon. Members can study the report to see that these are not selective quotations—and stated:

"The evidence permits us to comment positively on the safety of fluoridated water in this respect."

The Knox inquiry was conducted entirely independently of the Strathclyde case, which by coincidence held its 200 days of hearings during the time when the Knox committee was carrying out its review of the epidemiological evidence.

Lord Jauncey came to similar conclusions after hearing all the evidence, including Drs. Burk and Yiamouiannis for the anti-fluoridationists, and he concluded:

"The fluoride/cancer argument, if I may call it so for brevity, has been shown to be based to a substantial extent on unsound principles and to have virtually ignored what may be described as the scientifically accepted facts of life about cancer and mortality."

I hope that that deals with the serious concerns raised by many campaigners about cancer. Some people will still not be satisfied, be we cannot subject it to more exhaustive scientific and judicial review than that to which it has been subjected during the past two or three years. The so-called experts who have tried to establish a link between cancer and fluoride have been forcefully rejected by scientists and those who have heard the evidence.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Were thorough studies carried out on thalidomide before it was put on the market as being utterly safe?

Mr. Clarke: Not on this scale. A problem with thalidomide was that the most exhaustive tests were carried out, but, as is always the case with a new drug, and as we discovered in a few other cases, it is only when it is used extensively in the population that one has the final and most crucial test, when one can sometimes discover unexpected side effects. I do not wish to speak too authoritatively about thalidomide off the cuff, but with hindsight it is possible to say that not enough testing was done on expectant mothers. I hope that that failing will not be repeated.

The Knox report, which considered the epidemiological evidence, was based on a massive amount of data. In such studies, the more people who have taken a substance and the longer the period during which they have been taking it, the stronger one's conclusions can be. As I said, 5 million people have taken fluoride through the water supply in Britain for many years. The figure internationally is about 200 million. Fluoride is not a rare substance. It has been added to water for years and many studies on it have been published. A review of all that evidence enabled the expert committee to come to strong conclusions. In this case, we are on strong ground compared with the usual introduction of drugs.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): I have followed my right hon. and learned Friend's argument closely, and I am trying to support him. He said that in some cases, such as thalidomide, there might be unfortunate side effects. The report from which he has given us evidence dealt with an investigation into cancer. Did it also consider unexpected or unfortunate side effects?

Mr. Clarke: Yes; but cancer is the only one that has run for a long time. We considered cancer especially because the allegations about it have been more persistent. As I said, I could rehearse all the evidence about all the side effects, diseases or poisoning that have been claimed as deriving from fluoride. Lord Jauncey heard exhaustive evidence about many of those and came to his conclusions upon them. I said that I would not review them all, but it would be fair to the anti-fluoride case to say that the allegations about cancer have been the most persistent. That is why my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East asked the committee to consider cancer.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): I confirm the Minister's recollection of the thalidomide case. The Medicines Act 1971 was passed after it was realised that there had not been sufficient evidence about thalidomide and that it had been launched too quickly. Evidence presented to the investigation in Germany revealed that that had happened worldwide.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. His recollection is the same as mine, and I am sure that he is correct. We have vastly more evidence on and experience of fluoride. There are parts of the world, a few in this country and a number in the United States, where the natural incidence of fluoride is higher than the addition proposed in this country. There is no paucity of evidence. The mass of evidence enables experts to come to the conclusions that I have outlined.

I can demonstrate how exhaustive we have been, and will continue to be, in looking at various matters by dealing with the suggestion that fluoridation gives rise to a mutagenic hazard—the ability to alter human cells in ways that might be relevant to cancer and hereditary effects.

Lord Jauncey considered that issue during the Strathclyde case and, after receiving the available evidence, concluded:

"fluoride in the quantities likely to be ingested by humans from fluoridated drinking water has been positively shown not to be mutagenic".

Since the Strathclyde case, a reputable Japanese scientist has published several papers demonstrating mutagenesis under laboratory conditions from very high concentrations of fluoride applied directly to cells. It is important to remember about that study, about which I am sure some of my hon. Friends who follow these matters closely have heard, that the authors of the work did not claim that it proved that fluoride would give rise to a mutagenic hazard at the much lower concentration of 1 mg per litre, which is standard to all British fluoridation schemes.

Nevertheless, we set in hand a programme of studies intended to replicate the Japanese work and assess its relevance to fluoridation. The research has been planned and carried out on the recommendations of our Department's committee on mutagenicity of chemicals in food, consumer products and in the environment. We continually take the best advice that we can obtain on laboratory research here and abroad and keep ourselves up to date. It is important for everyone to understand that research work is always going on somewhere on many health products.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend agrees that all that those reports can show is that, in the present state of scientific knowledge, fluoride in the quantities that are proposed to be added to drinking water does not constitute a health hazard.

However, can my right hon. and learned Friend explain what appears to be an inconsistency in Government policy? In most cases, chemicals, if ingested in particular quantities, can be toxic. In the past year or so, we have devoted considerable time to considering the effects of the ingestion of lead from exhaust emissions from cars, and so on. In that case, the Government have adopted a different test. They have said that although there is not a shred of evidence that existing levels of lead in the atmosphere arising from exhaust emissions constitute a health hazard, those who favour keeping the existing law have to prove positively that it cannot constitute a health hazard. Of course, it is inherently impossible to prove such a negative, but I wonder why the Government do not adopt the same principle on fluoridation which, in particular concentrations, can also constitute a health hazard.

Mr. Clarke: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me if I do not get drawn too far into a discussion of lead in the atmosphere. However, I do not accept his description of where we are. There was no positive evidence to establish that lead in the atmosphere had damaged the health of children, but there was an area of doubt and of scientific contention. No one said that it could be proved that existing levels of lead in the atmosphere were safe. Therefore, it was decided to err on the side of prudence and to reduce the level of lead in the air. Certainly, no one claimed that lead was doing any good to anybody.

In so far as one can establish a case to demonstrate the safety of fluoridation, the epidemiological evidence has done so. There have been exhaustive studies by many people over many years and they have not been able to demonstrate any corrolation between the addition of fluoride or the natural incidence of fluoride and any particular condition. Unless one demands an absurd level of proof, one cannot go much further in demonstrating safety. The case for fluoride is not on all fours with the lead problem.

I thought that my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) was about to concede that the health hazard argument is not valid in the fluoride debate. That is all that I am seeking to establish. I volunteer information on the latest studies to show how quickly we follow them up with our own research to check whenever doubts are raised.

We have advice from the Department's independent, expert scientific advisers from all relevant fields on all aspects of the evidence about the addition of fluoride to the drinking water of whole communities to achieve a concentration of 1 mg per litre. They have considered all the available evidence on the biological effects of fluoride in short-term tests, including the mutagenicity evidence from Japan and the United Kingdom, and animal carcinogenicity tests, as well as the direct and extensive studies of human populations reviewed in the Knox report.

All our scientific advisers, whom we use on a wide range of matters within the Department, conclude that there is no evidence leading to an expectation of hazard through the induction of heritable abnormalities, and no reliable evidence of any hazard to man in respect of cancer.

I sense that most of the hon. Members who have intervened either agree with me on the safety point or are not pressing it too strongly. I conclude my remarks about the safety of fluoridation with reassurances about safety in relation to cancer and mutagenic effects. I hope that those assurances demonstrate that the Government, the Department and our advisers keep under review all the evidence relevant to the safety of fluoridation. That is not unique in this country; international health bodies do the same, as do the Governments of countries where fluoride is added to the water supply of major cities.

The passage of the Bill will not reduce our commitment to keep up to date on research and to take seriously any new doubts expressed about fluoridation. We will continue to draw on outside professional expertise, but the evidence is more overwhelmingly in favour of the safety of fluoride in water in the concentrations that we suggest than it is of the safety of many other things that are willingly accepted as part of health care of all kinds in this country.

I hope that most hon. Members will now be prepared to accept that fluoridation represents a safe and effective means of reducing dental decay. There remain, however, the objections—raised by the right hon. Member for the Western Isles (Mr. Stewart)—of those who believe that, irrespective of the safety of fluoridation and its benefits, it constitutes an infringement of individual liberty and should never be carried out. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am always glad that one gets a resounding cheer of support when one mentions liberty.

Mr. Best: Only on the Government side.

Mr. Clarke: I hope that no one will launch an attack on liberty in urging the case for the Bill. Contrary to the partisan remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best), with which I might sometimes agree in other contexts, I think that, by and large, we are all in favour of liberty. However, one can take libertarian arguments to an almost absurd degree and it does not always strengthen them.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon) rose——

Dr. M. S. Miller rose——

Mr. Clarke: May I begin before I give way? I hope that I do not have to stress my own commitment to liberty. It is not a challenge to the principle of individual liberty to say that in making judgments about cases, it is relevant to look at the degree to which one is infringing individual liberty. It sounds a dangerous argument, but it is not. The principle is not necessarily undermined by our looking at the degree to which individual liberty is affronted.

If anyone suggested the introduction of imprisonment without trial, the vast majority of hon. Members would probably be only too ready to go to the barricades to defend our present system with vigour. But we are talking about a circumstance in which people will find that harmless quantities of a harmless product are, unknown to them, being added to their drinking water, with no harm to them, but with considerable benefits to their children and many other people.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Clarke: That does not dispose of the individual liberty argument, but I must put those libertarian arguments into perspective before my hon. Friends leap to the barricades. When I have put them into perspective, I shall give way.

Let us consider what the threat to individual liberty is if we put into drinking water harmless quantities of this effective product in reducing dental decay. Hon. Members should consider the extent to which we all consume fluoride in other forms and the extent to which it already occurs naturally. First, I must point out that fluoride is present in most items of the diet, notably in tea. Indeed, heavy tea drinkers living in a fluoridated area will consume more fluoride from tea than from consumption of fluoridated water. It is therefore somewhat ironic that Mrs. McColl was shown celebrating her victory after the Strathclyde judgment by drinking a "fluoride-free cup of tea". There is no such thing.

Thus, I hope that I have put the issue into perspective. I have already pointed out that in many parts of the world people consume fluoride in their diets in far larger quantities than is proposed for our water supply. The exercise of individual freedom by those members of the community who feel so sensitive about our water supplies has an impact on the individual freedom of other members of the community. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Mrs. Knight) mentioned Birmingham. But the individual freedom of some people in Birmingham to refuse to allow fluoride to be put into the water is probably an infringement of the individual freedom of other inhabitants of Birmingham, who think that it will do them and their families good if fluoride is put into it—[Interruption.]

Mr. Wigley: I have followed the Minister's argument in balancing the interests of one group against those of another. I accept that those groups may have different opinions and different opinions also from those of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. After all, none of us has a monopoly of wisdom, and hindsight may teach us severe lessons. But will he not at least concede that at the very minimum there should be a democratic decision, area by area, as the measure can be implemented area by area? When fluoride was introduced in some areas many years ago, it was introduced by elected local authorities. Since health authorities are non-elected, I believe that there should be local referendums so that people can decide for themselves on the very basis outlined by the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

Mr. Clarke: I think that it should be a local decision and that is what we propose. A referendum on fluoride might not give rise to the consuming interest in the issue that is apparent in today's debate. However, I quite accept that it is a personal judgment. Indeed, the Government have accepted that by the way in which they have presented the Bill. Nevertheless, before we get a passionate argument about personal freedom, it is only fair to put the issue into perspective. Some of us believe that the benefits that the measure contains in terms of preventive health care are important. It is not a terrible affront to the freedom of an Englishman, a Scotsman, an Irishman or a Welshman to say, "You will have in your water some harmless substance of which you are not aware, which benefits the teeth of your family and of others."

Mr. Andrew Bowden (Brighton, Kemptown) rose——

Mr. Clarke: I shall answer the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), because he has touched on a very valid point, given the public sensitivities on this issue, which will no doubt be warmly expressed this evening. We believe, as he does, that it is right to continue to allow decisions to be taken locally after consultation of local opinion by the responsible local health and water authorities. That has been the policy of successive Administrations for nearly 30 years. Much though we no doubt all look forward to an animated debate this evening on personal freedom, the Bill does not break any dramatic new ground. It restates the policy of successive Governments for the past 30 years.

Responsibility for preventive health measures has been vested by Parliament in the Secretary of State and through him in health authorities or, in Scotland, health boards.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): I welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's statement about a decision being taken on a local basis, presumably to reflect the differences either in local variations of fluoride or in local opinion. But does he really think that health or water authorities are the appropriate bodies to judge local opinion?

Mr. Clarke: There are genuine local variations in, for example, the incidence of natural fluoride in the water. There are also sometimes practical problems in adding fluoride to the water in some localities. Thus, there are those reasons for local decisions. The health authorities are charged with a wide range of responsibilities for local health and are, therefore, the bodies most competent to determine the health needs of the local population. We charge them with doing that over a wide range of extremely serious issues. Similarly, the water authorities are obviously charged with the responsibility for dealing with the water. If we added to the number of local bodies to be involved in all of those things, no decision would be taken on anything. We are placing the local decision in the hands of those bodies that take dramatically more important decisions in their respective fields for their localities.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Clarke: I should like to explain the local position with care so that everyone understands it. At present it is for the health authorities to decide, having consulted local opinion, whether to apply for water fluoridation, and then to negotiate with the water authorities over the detailed contractual arrangements. Financial responsibility rests with the health authorities, and the water authorities act as agents for them under the terms laid down in the contract.

I emphasise that it is our intention in the Bill to leave those basic arrangements undisturbed. The Government thought about the issue, and we took a positive decision that we were not going to change our policy, the policy of previous Governments, or the practice of previous years. We are leaving the present basic arrangements undisturbed. The result is that the House may be assured that enactment of the Bill will not force any health or water authority to undertake fluoridation against its wishes. We rule out a national policy of compulsory fluoridation, which people will no doubt urge upon us. The Government thought about that and rejected it, because of the strong feelings that have been expressed.

The Bill does not reflect the beginning of any major campaign to put authorities under pressure to fluoridate, where they or their populations are unwilling to do so. Again, I think that it is important to get these main issues of principle into perspective. The Bill is simply a measure to restore in Scotland and to confirm elsewhere the powers to make local choices about fluoridation that had been assumed to exist for more than a quarter of a century. In future, those decisions will reflect—as they have done over the past 25 years—the undoubted effectiveness of water fluoridation in promoting dental health, and the different circumstances and views of various localities.

Enactment of the Bill will simply mean that those authorities in England and Wales that have chosen to have schemes will not have to abandon them because of continued uncertainty about the law. Water fluoridation has been implemented on the whole rather slowly in Britain over the past 25 to 30 years, to the frustration of some of its enthusiasts. Enactment of the Bill will not necessarily change the pace at which it occurs, but it will confirm and clarify the basis on which individual authorities can look at the issues concerned and make their own choices. We are simply resolving a legal doubt which should not cloud the issue. In summary, we are alive to the case for fluoridation in dental health promotion and to local sensitivities. We do not see ourselves as breaking dramatic new ground.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): I think that we are all in favour of reducing the incidence of dental decay. If the Government brought forward legislation to reduce the sugar content in many of our foodstuffs and soft drinks, would not that have a significant effect in reducing the incidence of caries?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with both those propositions. We engage in campaigns of health education through the Health Education Council and others, pointing out the effects of sugar on dental decay and inviting people to adjust their diets. But for the reasons which I gave earlier, fluoride in the water goes way beyond that. The two are not mutually exclusive. However much one may try, through health education, to advise people about reducing the amount of sugar in their diet, one will not reach more than a certain proportion of the population. Placing fluoride in the water has proved to be more effective.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Clarke: I should like to answer one hon. Member at a time.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) began by saying that he shared the view, which I am sure we all share, that we should reduce the incidence of dental decay. But if the Bill fails, it will not be open in any locality for local people and their authorities to decide that they want to introduce what has been proved to be the most effective single measure for reducing the incidence of dental decay in this country. If hon. Members vote against the Bill, they may have profound reasons—and some of my hon. Friends obviously think that they have—for doing so. However, they must not run away from the fact that in voting against it they will be rendering illegal a safe measure for reducing the incidence of dental decay which has proved to be extremely effective.

I have explained the Government's position. We have taken a cautious step. We should not have taken any new step had it not been for the recent judgment. Without that we should not have altered previous law or practice. Faced with the Strathclyde judgment, the Government had three choices. The first was to leave the law in England, Wales and Northern Ireland in the uncertain state that would result from Government inaction. The second was to introduce a different law relating to pressure or compulsion to spread fluoridation. The third was to restore the law to what it had always been assumed to be. By doing that we restore the power of the local decision, which has been assumed to exist for over a quarter of a century, so that localities which want fluoride can continue to have it. We chose the last course, which is sensible and reasonable. I hope that the House will give effect to it and give the Bill a Second Reading.

8.30 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): The Minister began by saying that this was a modest Bill. He will be the first to agree that modesty is no guide to hon. Members being readily able to accept a measure. Some people may have thought that health and the National Health Service were simple matters. Frankly, although we are for it, fluoridation follows hard on the heels of Warnock, surrogacy and experimentation on embryos and hon. Members are disabused. We recognise the element of genuine and sincere controversy. Strong views are taken about some aspects of the proposals and so we recommend a free vote on the Bill.

That does not mean that the majority of us have serious doubts about the beneficial health consequences of fluoridation. In many parts of the world it has been shown that the incidence of dental caries varies inversely with the fluoride in drinking water. The higher the level, in water, the lower the level of caries in the community.

The Bill proposes fluoride at the level of one part per million—the optimum level. Since only 500,000 people here drink water containing natural fluoride at that level, the potential exists for a substantial gain in reducing dental caries throughout the country. Only 10 per cent of people here drink water artificially fluoridated to that level.

Such a gain would not be trivial and it should not be underestimated. Caries is common and unspectacular, but it should never be regarded as inevitable and it is certainly not trivial. The 1983 child dental survey shows that by the age of 15 years, on average six of the 28 permanent teeth of children are either decayed, missing or filled. Caries is the principal reason for dental extraction. It is a disturbing comment on the nation's health that a recent survey found that about one third of a sample of people over the age of 16 in England and Wales had had all their teeth extracted.

The economic cost to the nation must not be ignored. Dental caries is one of the most costly diseases. The treatment requires expenditure by the National Health Service of over £200 million each year in England alone. That is a substantial sum. It is also estimated to be responsible for the loss of over 2 million working days a year. Its prevention or reduction in terms of the individual's health and to the nation as a whole is a prize worth striving for. That is generally agreed.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Expenditure of £200 million is dramatic. What proportion would be affected by fluoridation, since it affects only children up to the age of 12 years?

Mr. Meacher: Fluoride affects young children, so the impact on adults will not be felt immediately. However in the long and medium terms the effect will be dramatic. As the Minister said, this is by far the most cost-effective means of reducing caries in the community in the medium term. Fluoridation is justified for the reasons that I have given. It is the most economical means of reducing dental caries.

[Mr. Meacher]

It is sometimes said that fluoridation is unnecessary because equally effective means of attaining the same result are available. Caries would decline if people reduced their intake of sugar and refined carbohydrates. I agree that we need more aggressive campaigns to achieve that. Such campaigns are not alternatives, but additional. I doubt whether they will achieve the desired result on the scale required.

Mr. Craigen: The problem is double-edged, because it is not a question of people regulating their own diets. People have no choice about the amount of sugar in soft drinks, for instance. The sugar content is often higher than it has to be.

Mr. Meacher: That is true. There should be more parental control to discourage children from eating too much sugar and sweets, and the food industry should be more strictly regulated. Consumers should be given more information about the ill consequences of food which they buy. That could have a considerable effect, but it does not detract from the argument for fluoridation.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Does my hon. Friend accept that there is doubt about sugar being the cause of dental caries? I do not speak on behalf of the sugar lobby, but my hon. Friend might be surprised at the so-called "evidence" that sugar does not have the effect which many believe it does have on teeth?

Mr. Meacher: My hon. Friend the Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller) speaks with greater medical knowledge than I. I have been led to believe that sugar is one of the main causes of dental caries. If I am wrong, I stand corrected. That does not detract from the central force of the argument about the effectiveness of fluoridation.

As the Minister said, the most health-conscious people are most affected by such campaigns. The great advantage of fluoridation is that it benefits most the poorest and the ill-informed — those who are not reached by other initiatives, however desirable in principle they may be. For instance, motivation by parents is needed to ensure that children receive the proper dose of fluoridation tablets over the years. Topical applications are time-consuming and have only limited effect.

It is fair to say that this must surely be one of the most exhaustively researched public health measures of all time and from all the evidence it is reasonable to conclude that fluoridation is by far the most cost-effective means of reducing dental caries in children.

Out of the abundance of evidence I cite only two examples. Birmingham began its fluoridation scheme in 1964. At the start of the scheme, five-year-olds in the Northfields suburb were found to have much the same level of tooth decay as in neighbouring Dudley, which did not fluoridate. Within only six years the Northfield rate had been halved, while the Dudley rate remained much the same.

Secondly, research has shown that five-year-olds living in fluoridated Bromsgrove have three times the chance of never having tooth decay compared with children of the same age in non-fluoridated Hereford, not far away. Conversely, it was also found that a child in Hereford had 13 times more chance of having at least 10 or more teeth decayed, missing or filled. One could give many other examples, but those are telling. There is much more evidence, both nationally, as the Minister said, and internationally and such evidence seems to me at least to be conclusive.

Nor is the benefit of fluoride, as the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) seemed to suggest, entirely confined to childhood. For instance, in naturally fluoridated Hartlepool, probably the area with the highest natural fluoride rate in Britain, it has been found that there is significantly less caries than in York, not far away, which has a much lower fluoride level. That improvement is found not only at the age of five, but also at the age of 15 and for adults over 45.

However, I recognise—it would be difficult not to do so after listening to the Minister's reception—that the main objections to the Bill are not generally directed at the medical evidence but at wider considerations. Perhaps the most prominent argument is that, even if fluoridation is beneficial and safe, it still encroaches on individual liberty. The response earlier makes that clear.

That would be a lot more plausible if those who made that objection did not also accept the regular addition of several other substances to drinking water such as copper sulphate, aluminium, calcium and chlorine.

Mr. Best: To make it drinkable.

Mr. Meacher: Indeed. That has a different effect but it is equally beneficial, desirable and harmless. If 40 chemicals are put into drinking water, the addition of one further does not seem to be a cause of such tremendous controversy. Lord Avebury, a well-known and notable advocate of many civil liberties causes, has said:

> "What is at stake is not the erosion of liberty but . . . 'the erosion of millions of teeth and the resultant suffering and misery of thousands of children, which fluoridation would go far to prevent'."

Another major complaint is that fluoridation represents a form of mass medication. Frankly, it does not. One cannot emphasise too strongly that fluoride is a natural constituent of water supplies. It occurs in Britain in natural form in concentrations of up to 5·8 mg per litre—nearly six times the level proposed under the Bill.

The adjustment of the quantity to an optimum level cannot be compared with the addition to the water supply of a substance not found there ordinarily. Equally, the phrase "mass medication"—the term most often used by opponents — seems to me at least both emotive and inaccurate as it is not a means of curing disease. I will say no more than that. I should have thought that a substance which had the effect of maintaining medical or dental health is more in the nature of a food or a nutriment than a medicine. It is a public health measure not unlike the adding of iodine to salt, calcium, iron and vitamin B to flour, and vitamin D to margarine.

For those reasons, I take the view that the so-called ethical objections to fluoridation do not stand up to scrutiny. I know that that is not a view shared by everyone and I respect the force of their argument and the way in which some people regard that as decisive. But I do not think that that is a view that is widely held in the population.

Nor do the claims that there are damaging medical side effects, including the cancer scare, which the Minister has gone to some lengths to dispel, hold water, although that is perhaps not the appropriate analogy. I am very much a layman in such matters, as most hon. Members are, but I am impressed by the fact that Royal College of Physicians made a special study of all the available data in the mid-1970s and it concluded that there was no scientific or statistical basis for allegations of morbidity caused by fluoridation. A large list of conditions was discussed in depth. I know that there have been later studies, as the Minister mentioned.

I am also impressed by the fact that that view has been corrobated over and over again in similar studies by the British Medical Association, the British Dental Association, the Royal College of Surgeons of England, the Royal College of General Practitioners, the Royal Commission on the National Health Service, the British Paediatric Association and the Health Education Council. I could mention many others and they are all, by any standards, distinguished bodies in Britain.

I should be the first to recognise that those with an Athenasian inner certainty of their correctness in the face of the virtual unaminity of view of all the established bodies in Britain will not be persuaded. But in my view at least the medical evidence is overwhelmingly conclusive. Indeed, it is far more extensive than is strictly needed in order to warrant action now being taken on a wider scale to harness the preventive health potential of fluoridation.

The Royal Commission on the NHS went rather further and said:

"We are certain that it is entirely wrong to deprive the most vulnerable section of the population of such an important public health measure for the sake of the views of a small minority of adults."

In other words, how can one justify not giving the child who lives in Wolverhampton or Salford the same protection against tooth decay as the child who lives in Birmingham or Watford already enjoys?

Mr. Best: May I accept, ex hypothesi, that the addition of fluoride to the water is not mass medication but preventive medicine? The hon. Gentleman's faith in the medical profession is touching, but will he say which other substance of preventive medicine is administered by doctors not knowing the number or identity of the recipients or the total quantity to be ingested?

Mr. Meacher: There are many. Salt is one. I am trying to think of the answer. It is only fair to say that one needs notice of such questions. It certainly can be answered and I should be glad to write to the hon. Member after the debate. But even if there were no immediate comparison to be made with any other product it would not prevent the application of fluoride up to a given optimum level if it has beneficial results. We do not need a precedent. We can take a view on the merits in their own right and that is what we should do.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Is it not a matter of fact that we, by regulation, add vitamins to flour, and that one of the proposals for eradicating rickets among Asian families is to add vitamin D to chapati flour? Are those not examples in exactly the terms suggested?

Mr. Meacher: There is indeed, the important precedent of the bread and flour regulations. Iron and vitamin B are added to flour.

I do not wish to rest entirely on the view of doctors, although they have some right to special expertise in this area. The view is also held by over two in every three persons in the country. A National Opinion Polls nationwide survey in 1980 found that 67 per cent. of the people interviewed thought that fluoride should be added to water if doing so could reduce tooth decay. Only 16 per cent. opposed adding it. In other words, four times as many support fluoridation as are against it.

Hon. Members will be the first to say that we do not make policy on the basis of the vagaries of opinion polls, and I accept that—they in no way indicate rightness or otherwise on this issue — but the results of that poll showed decisively that what is now proposed by the Government commands widespread public support. Significantly, for the purposes of the Bill, this general view, so widely shared by doctors and the population at large, was also accepted by Lord Jauncey in his Strathclyde judgement in June of last year, as the Minister said.

The judge unequivocally repudiated the medical evidence against fluoridation. He categorically asserted that it was safe and effective — on the basis of a 120,000-word judgment and the examination, which had taken more than a year, and which had been one of the most thorough and comprehensive examinations of the evidence — and ruled only on a technicality that Strathclyde was acting ultra vires in adding fluoride because fluoridation had begun to be administered in Britain only in the 1950s, and it was therefore unlikely to be covered by the duty under the Scottish Water Act 1946 to provide wholesome water. The judge stated:

"An individual's right to choose how to care for his own body should only be encroached upon by statutory provisions in clear and unambiguous language."

I agree, but that is a legal comment, not a moral judgment. It is in keeping with his overall legal judgment — namely, that the law needs to be clarified if fluorides are to be added to drinking water—and I think it is fair to say that that is essentially why the Bill has been introduced tonight.

It is because I believe that the evidence is clear and conclusive that fluoride in water, either naturally or added at one part per million, substantially reduces dental caries throughout life; that water with this concentration of fluoride in a temperate climate is safe, irrespective of the hardness of the water; and that fluoridation is much more cost-effective than any of its alternative topical applications, that I support this measure, clarifying the rights of water authorities by empowering them to add fluoride up to a given optimum level at the request of health authorities. It is the least response that this House can justify.

I hope, therefore, that this modest Bill, which offers a substantial potential advance in the nation's health, will be carried overwhelmingly tonight.

8.53 pm

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): It is strange indeed for me to listen in this House to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) and the Minister taking the view that the judgment of an upper-class Right-wing Scottish judge should be the basis for legislation. Indeed, it is even more astonishing that any decision of a Scottish court should be regarded as the basis for shaking the foundations of English arrogance and altering the natural belief of the English in their statutory powers.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Go and take some fluoride.

Mr. Fairbairn: Go and take some bromide.

I do not declare an interest but, because the Minister suggested—it was an unfortunate suggestion—that those who oppose fluoridation may do so for flippant, absurd, transient or fantasised reasons, I should perhaps tell the House that before I did moral philosophy I did medicine and that after I did moral philosophy I did law. I believe that fluoridation fails massively on all three principles.

If Lord Jauncey is to be quoted—fancy having a Scottish judge quoted in support of any constitutional change—let us remember that he said:

"To use the water supply for mass medication"—

the hon. Member for Oldham, West said that it was not medication; I refer him to page 367 of Lord Jauncey's judgment—

"is without precedent or legal authority and is illegal."

Tonight the Government are seeking to make what is illegal legal—[Interruption.] It is illegal in Scotland. It is not because they believe that it is illegal in England and Wales but because they fear it may be illegal.

Fluoride is a potent catalase poison which is cumulative. Only one third of fluoride which is ingested is egested and, depending on the pH or acidity or alkalinity of the body substances, the amount excreted is vastly altered. Indeed, in acidotic conditions, the amount which is not excreted and is accumulated is vastly enlarged.

Nobody on any side of the argument denies that it is toxic. Indeed, in the United States pharmacopoeia, it is linked and bracketed with arsenic, lead and cyanide as a poison. There are innumerable papers on the adverse effects at the volume proposed of one part per million, although in clause 1(5) the concentration is to be contained at that level only

"so far as is reasonably practicable."

As I say, there are innumerable papers by the most distinguished scientists, many of them Nobel prize winners, on the toxic effects of fluoride, and I will give a few examples, although it is not on the medical and scientific matter that I rest my case. Indeed, if there were no medical and scientific case against it, I should still oppose it totally.

In India, Srikanha and Susheela have identified the characteristics of skeletal fluorosis such as calcification of the ligaments, joints and deformation of the bones and so on in many states where the level of fluoride is less than one part per million in the water. Of course, one of the variables is what else is in the water. In this country, there happen to be in most parts of the country where there is fluoride to that level large deposits of calcium and other minerals which are beneficial for the teeth and which to some extent lack fluoride.

In Turkey, the Hacettepe university has undertaken enormous research into the fact that fluoride at that level delays and prevents the healing and fracture of bones. In Sweden, at the Karolinska institute, it has been demonstrated that less than the level of 1 ppm of fluoride in the blood causes a surge of fluoride retention in many subjects. In 1976, Albert Schatz related the incidence of fluoride to the infant death rate in Chile. In Grand Rapids, where they had fluoridation, dental fluorosis, or discolouring and mottling of the teeth, occurred in 19 per cent. of the white population and 39 per cent. of the black population, which relates to the other ingested compounds. There are many variables.

In West Hartlepool, which the hon. Member for Oldham, West quoted with such approbation, there is a natural proportion of 1·5 parts of fluoride per million in the water. There is mottling of the teeth of 85 per cent. of the population and mottling or dental fluorosis to the distress point of 25 per cent. of the population. In osteoarthritis, the microcrystals of apatite are promoted and aggravated by fluoride. Even Dr. Donald Taves, who is such a promoter of the concept of fluoride, acknowledges its major effects on kidney malfunction. In general it affects hormones and thyrotoxine, locks up calcium, affects bone structure and affects the heart. It eventually causes a brittleness in the teeth which is far more expensive in the adult than any benefit that there may be in the delay of caries in a few children.

There are variables. There are some who are exquisitely sensitive to fluoride and show all the symptoms of nausea, diarrhoea, ulceration, internal skin lesions, fatigue and pruritis. If the hon. Member for Oldham, West is concerned about health, he should listen to arguments that suggest that members of the public may be put at risk.

There is the concept of variable thirst. There are conditions such as diabetes myelitis, diabetes incipitus, in which there will be different drinking patterns. One of the characteristics of fluoride toxication is increased thirst. This means that the variables result in different doses for different people and in different patients having different reactions to those doses.

In his judgment, Lord Jauncey said that it was not proved that fluoride was harmful, but he said that he could not exclude that it caused cancer. He held that it would cause dental fluorosis in some children. I do not take the view that judges are the best arbiters of scientific evidence in cases where for about 200 days and more some of the most experienced and dedicated men, unmotivated by any interest or prejudice, take opposite scientific views on the effect of fluoride. That, to me, leaves the case thoroughly not proven.

And all for what—so that we may reduce by 50 per cent. tooth decay, or delay it, in some children under 12 years of age. That is contradicted entirely by John Colquhoun, the retired chief dental officer of New Zealand. He stated last year that fluoridation had no effect on caries in children. In Birmingham, where there is fluoridation, there were 30 fillings per 100 teeth in 1964 and 40 per 100 in 1976, and an increase in milk teeth of 100 per cent.

Tooth decay is caused by many reasons, such as chemically adulterated food. As the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) has said, it is caused by false chemical additives, be they sugar or otherwise. It is caused by neglect of the teeth or by excessive sweet eating.

Tooth decay, whatever its discomfort, is no worse than alopecia. It is no worse than athlete's foot. It is a nuisance, but it is never fatal. I know of no hon. Member, whether he has his own teeth, false teeth, filled or missing teeth who is thereby at any disadvantage.

Mrs. Currie: Will my hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Fairbairn: No; I shall not give way. I was relieved to discover that my hon. Friend was in favour of fluoridation because that confirmed my conviction against it. [HON. MEMBERS: "Give way".]

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Fairbairn: I shall give way now.

Mrs. Currie: Is my hon. and learned Friend seriously saying that no one has ever died under general anaesthetic for dental treatment? If he says that, my hon. Friends who live in or who represent Birmingham can correct him immediately.

Mr. Fairbairn: I am sure that many people suffering from piles, myopia or other ailments have died under anaesthetic, but that has nothing to do with tooth decay. It is to do with bad anaesthetics. If that is the basis of my hon. Friend's argument, I can say only that I hope she will take a general anaesthetic frequently. It is not for those who are against fluoridation to prove our case—great though the evidence is from most distinguished scientists. It is for the Government to prove their case. They must prove their case not on the balance of probabilities or possibilities or beyond reasonable doubt, but beyond all doubt, because so many distinguished scientists cannot be wrong.

I base my argument not on science but on principle. If the case for fluoride were proved, I would still object to it on principle. As Lord Jauncey said,

"To use the water supply for mass medication is without precedent or legal authority, and is illegal."

As the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security — my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten) — said, when the Government were introducing a plan to advise people what to eat:

"Our job is to do no more than inform the public about the consequences of their actions for their health. Of course it is for individuals themselves to decide what to eat"—

I assume that he also meant what the individual decides to drink—

"and what risks to run."

We have a Conservative Government trying to legalise compulsory force-feeding—in other words, to legalise assault. I doubt that that action would stand up in the European Court of Human Rights. Never has any remedial or preventive measure been made legitimate, far less compulsory, except in the interest of the person concerned. Force-feeding of the insane is exceptional, but all medical treatment of the sane requires the consent of the patient or, if he is comatose, of those who are able to give that consent. No patient in this country has ever been treated without consent. This measure suggests that every citizen should be compelled to be medicated—not for his own benefit but for the possible benefit of some other citizens who form a minute proportion of the population.

Vaccination is in the interests of the person who is vaccinated. Seat belts are in the interests of the person who drives. No measure of compulsion forces a person to undergo any measure that benefits someone else, and certainly no medicinal measure does so. The legislation proposes that we should all be compelled to ingest a substance—whether it is harmless does not matter—so that some people may obtain benefit for a complaint which is never fatal and which is, at most, irritating.

The medical profession recently predicted that 1·25 million homosexuals will die of AIDS by the end of the century. If the medical profession discovered a water-soluble substance which could render that disease not fatal —caries is merely an irritant—is it to be suggested that it should be added to our drinking water? If a vaccine were to be found which reduced the affects of schizophrenia, should we all drink it? If the world population or rape crises were considered to be equally critical, should something be added to the water to alleviate those threats?

There are four substances in the atomic scale of elements which attract a common club—the halogens. They are fluorine, chlorine, iodine and bromide. Iodine appears in traces in water. It is harmless and tasteless.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Salt.

Mr. Fairbairn: Salt is not a halogen, and it is not an element either.

Chlorine is added so that every member of the public can drink the water provided in safety. It is now proposed that fluorine should be added so that some people will benefit. Hon. Members who were in the Army will remember that the fourth halogen, bromide, was added to tea, called No. 9, to reduce the sex urge.

Mr. Craigen: It didn't do the hon. and learned Gentleman any good.

Mr. Fairbairn: In the Army one could choose not to drink tea, but one cannot not drink water because of this legislation. It is important to remember that because fluorine is tasteless, citizens have no way of telling whether it has been added, and the Bill has no method of preventing the dosage ingested from causing fluorosis.

I cannot but be amazed that the Government, who are dedicated to freedom and hostile to totalitarianism — [Interruption.] The fact that the hon. Member for Oldham, West supports the measure suggests that it is totalitarian, — who are suspicious of bureaucracy and hateful of tyranny and assault should be the author of a proposition to compel the public to swallow something which will be of no benefit to the vast majority of those who swallow it and may do great harm. A Government who object to local authority expenditure are compelling local authorities to add to that expenditure. The measure is contrary to the simple freedom of being allowed to drink potable water and of not being compelled to swallow anything which has no possible purpose for oneself.

The Minister said that we were not breaking new ground. We are breaking new ground in principle in saying that everyone must ingest what might be good for a few people, and that everyone must undergo medication for the sake of a minute proportion of the population.

If the measure passes tonight it will be because the payroll vote is as unfree to vote against it as we shall be unfree to drink water which is free of a substance which will do none of us good and may do all of us harm. It is not a matter of scientific argument; it is a matter of great principle. The Bill breaches a principle of freedom which has never been breached in this country before.

9.15 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): It has been a profoundly evocative and moving experience for me to attend the introduction of the Bill in the House tonight as the second motion on the Order Paper on a rather dull day. Perhaps the House will bear with me for a few minutes to permit me to put on the record the reasons why that is particularly so.

It came to pass many years ago that the scribes in the Ministry of Health gathered together. They came to me and said, "O Minister, behold, it is the season of private Members' Bills. Go, therefore, to hon. Members who have been successful in the ballot and persuade them to introduce a Bill to legalise fluoridation of the water supply, for there is an exceedingly learned Attorney-General who has given his opinion that such a procedure requires statutory authority." I answered, "Not so, for if there should arise contention or tumult in that House, then the Bill may not pass, and the last state will be worse than the first. Wait, therefore, and possess yourselves in patience." They waited and they possessed themselves in patience. And it came to pass, after many days, that that Attorney-General went elsewhere and was succeeded by another Attorney-General.

Then I called to me the scribes from the Ministry of Health and said, "Go now to the new Attorney-General and consult him on the question whether it be required that there be statutory authority for fluoridation of water supplies and omit not to tell him the opinion of his predecessor, for I have observed that the men of the law, the more eminent they are, the more they do rejoice in disagreeing with each other." So the scribes went and asked as they were bidden and, behold, the second Attorney-General gave an opinion which was adverse to the opinion of the first Attorney-General. And they came and told it to me. I said, "Take up your pens and write quickly unto all the health authorities that are in the kingdom, and tell them that if they consider it to be in the interests of health in their respective areas, they may enter into agreements with the water authorities to fluoridate the water supplies."

I do not repent of that episode in my ministerial past. On the contrary, I am convinced that the decision that Ministers have had to take since the judgment in a Scottish court has been rightly taken by them, as the procedure brought into action some 25 years ago in the manner which I have described was also justified on grounds which a layman might rationally establish.

First, there is overwhelming evidence that the presence of fluoride in drinking water avoids a great mass of dental caries in young persons. It does not avoid dental caries in all persons, but it is beyond doubt demonstrated to be beneficial to all persons in their younger years in respect of their dental health. It is also, in my view, overwhelmingly and crushingly demonstrated that the presence of fluoride in water—indeed in proportions considerably higher than are proposed to be artificially produced—has no morbid consequences whatsoever.

I found most impressive, in arriving at that conclusion, the fact that in very substantial areas here in this country fluoride up to six times the proportion of one part per million has been drunk for generation after generation without it having proved possible to indicate any disadvantage in terms of health or any special or unusual morbidity amongst the populations which had drunk that water. I must admit that I found that demonstration even more impressive than the mass statistical experiment which has been carried out, of course more massively than ever in the past 25 years, in the artificial fluoridation of the water supply.

Dr. M. S. Miller: To do justice to the views of the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn), does the right hon. Gentleman agree that there is one side effect——

Mr. Powell: Yes, the mottling effect.

Dr. Miller: Indeed, and it is not dangerous.

Mr. Powell: I am much obliged to the hon. Gentleman for crossing that "t". However, the massive extent of fluoridation that has taken place makes the fact that there is no demonstrated correlation of morbidity with fluoridation so impressive as to be virtually irresistible.

I am brought, therefore, as was the Minister, in conclusion to the proposition that fluoridation of the water supply is compulsory medication of the population. I must confess that I have been unable, despite the term having apparently been used by a learned judge, to understand how the term "medication" can in any proper sense be applied in this context. There is, of course, no choice which any one of us exercises over the public water supply in the areas where we live. In the areas where fluoride is present naturally, there is no choice available to any member of the population as to the fluoride which he ingests from the water supply. It is in the very nature of a public supply that there cannot be personal choice, except by extreme contrivance. That applies, for example, to all measures such as those related to the purity of the air, the removal of noxious fumes and so on, that are adopted in the cause of public health. They are measures of which the consequences, by their very nature, and by the very nature of the vector medium, are bound to apply to all members of the community.

Fluoride is not a substance introduced into water to produce a specific medical effect upon certain individuals. It is not, as I understand it, medication in any natural sense. It is rather—I think that the word was used by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher)—a rectification of the content of the water supply, so that all areas can enjoy the same advantages as are enjoyed automatically in those areas where fluoride is present naturally in the water. I must therefore tell the House I have had to conclude that I, at any rate, can find no moral or libertarian reason why the advantages to be obtained from a water supply with a one part per million element of fluoride should not be made available to the people of this country at the discretion of the democratically elected local health authorities.

Sir John Page (Harrow, West): Never before have I had the opportunity to follow the most famous prophet of Westminster. Being neither scribe nor Pharisee, I may not do justice to the speech of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), although I think that on the whole the Pharisees have acquired a reputation that they did not really deserve. Of the many speeches that the right hon. Gentleman has made, I think that I enjoyed his contribution today the most.

It is not always my role in the House to pour oil on wholesome but troubled waters, but today I shall seek to be moderate, modest and uncontroversial. First, I declare an interest as a director of a water company. My short argument will be devoted exclusively to the technical and administrative aspects of the Bill. I shall make no argument for or against fluoridation. I wish to remain entirely neutral on that, although I intend to vote for the Bill as it goes some way to clarify the legal uncertainties which currently face the water supply industry, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health so honourably admitted in his speech.

For slightly more than 25 years, according to the right hon. Member for South Down, water authorities have added fluoride to water supplies at the request of health authorities and under the umbrella of an indemnity provided initially by the Ministry of Health, and that rather loose arrangement has continued to this day. The Bill goes some way towards formalising the existing scheme.

Three aspects of the Bill—one major and two minor—are causing considerable worry and the industry will be most disappointed that my right hon. and learned Friend's speech today ignored the serious arguments and representations that it has put to him.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It may have been drowned in the excitement caused by one aspect of my speech, but I certainly tried to answer the representations made by the industry — albeit en passant, as they were essentially technical matters. For instance, I explicitly stated that health authorities would meet all the costs. That was included in my speech as the result of the water authorities' representations. I hope, therefore, that my hon. Friend will not take the view that the Government have ignored the arguments put by the water authorities.

Sir John Page: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend. I listened to his speech with great dedication, but I must have missed his comments about costs, to which I shall return shortly.

Representations were made to the Minister by the Water Companies Association, the president of which is our distinguished ex-colleague, Sir William Elliott, as well as from the water authorities. I quote just one paragraph, which clearly summarises the worries of the industry. The Water Companies Association states:

"Our most serious concern arises over the fact that, as drawn, the Bill places the responsibility for the decision to fluoridate both on health authorities and water undertakers. In our view, this is quite wrong. Not only will this give rise to the difficulties which always occur whenever responsibilities are 'split' but it is quite inappropriate that water companies should be required to involve themselves in a decision which is essentially political, medical and ethical. Water companies have no wish to involve themselves in these issues and certainly they are not medically competent to do so. The decision as to whether fluoridation is appropriate should be left entirely to health authorities" or, in the water authorities' view, to the Government as well as the health authorities.

"A water company should be required to comply with a request to fluoridate from a health authority subject only to the proviso that the water company could refuse to comply with such a request on the grounds of technical feasibility."

The Bill puts on water companies and water authorities a burden that they should not be asked to carry. It is the statutory duty of water undertakings to supply wholesome water. To add or not to add—that is a question that they should not be required to answer.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It would be more difficult for me to deal with these points if I waited until later on. My hon. Friend's point is perfectly valid. The answer to it is that the Government took a conscious decision merely to seek to reinstate the existing policy and practice. Had we conceded the case of the water companies that they should have no discretionary power and that the responsibility should rest with the health authorities alone, the Government would have been attacked by a number of my hon. Friends for making fluoridation easier and removing an existing element of local discretion. The only reason why we have not been able in the Bill to meet the requests of the water undertakers is that we have been, if anything, over-scrupulous in meeting the concerns of my hon. Friends that we should not make it any easier than it is now to add fluoride to the water.

The decision of two local bodies will therefore be required—the health authority and the water authority—before fluoride can be added. It will be up to the water authority to decide to what extent it wishes to be guided by the health authority.

Sir John Page: I am disappointed by that explanation. The vague messages previously sent down from the Elephant and Castle are now to be inscribed in the tablets of the law. We have an opportunity sensibly to place the responsibility where it should rest—either on the area health authority or on central or local government. I had hoped for a different reply from my right hon. and learned Friend. Perhaps he will think about the matter again, during the passage of the Bill.

My right hon. and learned Friend says that he mentioned in his speech the question of cost. I understand that the question of cost is not covered in the Bill, and that the responsibility would remain with the area health authority. If that is so, I am extremely grateful.

I should like my right hon. and learned Friend, or the Under-Secretary who is to reply to the debate, to clarify one more point. If the Bill were rejected tonight—I hope that it will not be—what would be the status of the existing agreements between the health authorities and the water authorities? I presume that they would not be affected.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary is anxious that I should reply to this point now as he expects to have other matters on his hands when he replies to the debate. If the Bill were rejected tonight, the position of England would remain in doubt, as it is now, and would await litigation. In Scotland, a Mrs. McColl has challenged the satisfactory arrangement described by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) and fluoridation has been declared ultra vires. There are actions pending in England and presumably sooner or later someone would force such an action through and obtain a judgment for or against the existing arrangements. Water authorities could either carry on with their present arrangements until such time as they were challenged in court or they might decide, because of the continuing legal doubt and the refusal of Parliament to resolve it, to err on the side of caution and end the present arrangements. That is not satisfactory, and that is the main reason why we felt compelled to legislate, and commend the Bill to the House.

Sir John Page: I have never had so many wise responses from a Minister and I have one more question for my right hon. and learned Friend. Why does clause 3(2) allow a period of two months from the time that the Act is passed before it comes into force? Is that period to allow companies to renegotiate existing agreements—if that is the case it is not long enough—or is to give those involved a short breathing space after the Bill has been passed? Will my right hon. and learned Friend say that during this two month period, after the Bill is passed and before it comes into operation, existing agreements will remain as they are at the present time?

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My hon. Friend is obviously anxious to investigate this question. I am a little uncertain about the two-month period. I think that the answer will be that it is the usual practice in drafting, and if a better argument is produced in Committee, no doubt it will be changed. On the important question of what happens in that two months, I am sure that the existing indemnities would carry through existing agreements, and there is no prospect of anybody litigating and getting the agreements declared illegal. In practice, there would be no threat to the existing arrangements and water authorities can be untroubled while waiting for the Act to come into force.

Sir John Page: Again, I am extremely grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend.

Although the points I have made are undramatic and unemotional, which will perhaps be unusual in the course of this debate, they are of vital importance to the authorities and companies that are doing their best to supply wholesome water to the community.

9.37 pm

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): I am sure that the problems of water authorities are important, but I shall return to issues of principle in the Bill. As the debate has progressed, it has become clear that this is one of those issues—fortunately for politicians, these are very few—in which there is a genuine clash of principle behind the different arguments. I appreciated the peroration of the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn), although I did not accept all the points that he made earlier in his speech.

Quite rightly, there is a genuine fear of mass medication among the public. I cannot concede that someone would enter lightly into proceeding with a Bill such as this if they were not convinced about it. Those who vote in favour of the Bill must also be convinced that the arguments have been thoroughly tested and the balance of advantage lies with those who wish to see a particular form of prevention of dental decay being utilised in this form. Therefore, I am prepared to put on one side as being the worst of arguments the crucial principle that we must not lightly consider giving a substance to everybody in general in the community without being sure that we can do them good.

The hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross appeared to accept that the compulsory wearing of seat belts was legitimate, because it did good to oneself rather than to other people. However, there was a paradox in what he said, because it was accepted even by those such as myself who were advocates of compulsory seat belts that in a minority of cases, the wearing of seat belts may be harmful to a person. For example, the car might catch fire and the person might be unconscious. The argument always lay on the balance of advantage, which might come from statistical sources, of wearing a seat belt. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman's argument is defective.

Some members of the Liberal party, not only in the House but in the country, believe fervently in the arguments put forward by the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross. The argument has two bases: one is the fear that this is a dangerous precedent—that is a legitimate fear—and the other is a fear of the unknown. Many people believe that fluoridised water may cause some side effects about which we know nothing now, but which could emerge in generations to come and which would cause us to wish that we had not done it.

However—no doubt this has happened to all right hon. and hon. Members — many of my political colleagues in the Health Service have urged me passionately to support the Bill, because they believe strongly, having studied all the arguments and the research, that the balance of argument lies with their case. The most telling fact is that during the 20 years or more since the argument has been contested in and out of the public arena—I have been involved with it since 1962 or 1963—with the continual stream of material being circulated in opposition to the fluoridation of water, and even in the light of the terrible tragedy of thalidomide and the side effects of other drugs, which have increased considerably the sensitivity and awareness of people in the medical profession of the possible problems of drugs, no professional health body has changed its mind about the efficacy of fluoridating water. That is extremely significant, because people have become much more sensitive to the effects of drugs, and have become much more concerned with the labelling and contents of food and health in general.

My responsibility in the House is for health, and the Minister will recall that I have belaboured him for not giving as much attention as I believe he should to prevention. I have urged him to maintain the inclusion of thiamin and calcium in flour and bread; I cannot now say, "But I do not wish you to assist people by fluoridating water." I would not wish it to be thought that the fluoridation of water is a panacea that will solve all the problems of dental health. If the Government are seriously worried about tooth decay I hope that they will consider the adverse effects of sugar in the diet, and look to the better prevention of dental decay by the better labelling of food and by educating people about the contents of foods.

There was a suggestion that the statistics may not be as powerful as has been suggested because other substances in the water in some places where fluoride has been added may have assisted in reducing dental decay. However, the evidence of Birmingham during the past 20 years must counter that suggestion. It is not suggested that dental decay was already low or that in controlled neighbouring towns and cities the level of decay was similar, because those other substances were also present in the water. During those 20 years, dental decay has been reduced dramatically. For example, the number of children attending clinics for the relief of toothache dropped from over 10,000 in 1965 to under 2,000 in 1977. Only 62 Birmingham children were supplied with false teeth in 1983—about one in 3,500 of the school population. In neighbouring Wolverhampton, the corresponding figure is one in 280—about 12 times higher.

The protection offered by fluoride has to begin at birth to do the most good. If fluoride is put into school milk or into toothpaste, it is too late to have the maximum effect. Fluoride occurs naturally in many areas and it is significant that people living in those areas have never suggested that they wished fluoride to be removed from their water supply. None of the studies and evidence, even from opponents of fluoridation, have suggested that fluoride should be removed from water supplies.

The one weak point in the Government's case is that the authorities that are to have power to implement the Bill when it becomes an Act are not directly elected. The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) said that it would be better if fluoridation were introduced by democratic authorities. Sadly, neither health authorities nor water authorities are accountable to the electorate and it is a shame that that weakness in the system cannot be rectified in a short Bill.

If the whole population turned against those who have the authority to introduce fluoride, they would not have to resign, face the electorate or ask any outside body for support or approval. With that caveat, I shall support the Bill.

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): As my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health explained, the Bill attempts to confirm the legality of a situation whose legality was not in doubt before the Strathclyde judgment.

The Bill enables the decision to introduce fluoride to be made where it should be made—not at Westminster or in Whitehall, but by those whom we appoint to health authorities because of their special interest in health or their professional expertise. We believe those people to be the best to take into account local opinion, priorities and needs and to do so more objectively than any politician or civil servant could do. I am sorry that several of my hon. Friends want to deny their local health authorities the right to take that decision on behalf of their constituents.

Before health was removed from the responsibilities of local councils, I sat on a county borough council that took a decision on fluoridation. I believe that we took that decision as well as any decision could be taken. All the members were personally briefed by those representing both sides of the argument, we listened to various deputations and we read a wealth of documentation and research relating to experience at home and abroad.

We decided not to introduce fluoride because there was already a high fluoride content in our local water and it did not justify any addition. We took the decision in the best interests of the area that we served and we would have resented Parliament denying us the right to make that decision. Unfortunately, a number of hon. Members are suggesting that local authorities should be denied that right.

Health authorities are not directly elected. The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) and the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) advocated a return to directly elected health authorities, and we have some sympathy with that view. But I see no reason why those who have been appointed to local or area health authorities cannot make an objective decision. Indeed, my local health authority plans to do so if the Bill is approved, after taking into account a local working party report with recommendations, as well as the views of the local community health council.

I have every confidence in the ability of those who have been appointed to serve on my local health authority, the east Dorset health authority. I shall list the representation: those appointed by the Wessex regional health authority include one hospital consultant, one general practitioner, one nurse, one Southampton university representative, one TUC nominee, seven "generalist members", including voluntary organisation representatives, and five members appointed by local authorities including two from Dorset county council and three from the district councils. That is a pretty representative list, notwithstanding the fact that they are not directly elected.

Very soon, those representatives will have before them a recent dental survey for the area of my constituency which shows that nearly half of Bournemouth's five-year-olds and two thirds of our 12-year-olds suffer from tooth decay. Those figures are very similar to those from national surveys covering non-fluoridated areas. Moreover, we know from national surveys that nearly half the population will have lost at least half their teeth by the age of 40, and in so doing will undoubtedly have suffered great pain, great inconvenience in having to go to the dentist and heavy expenses for dental treatment. That is the sort of information that will come before my local area health authority.

It would be irresponsible to deny the authority those facts in asking it to make decisions on behalf of my constituents. I admit that it is rather tempting to use the free vote tonight to vote against the Bill. Most of the letters that I have received from my constituents urge me to vote against it. Many of them refer to the fact that fluoride is a poison. Much evidence has been referred to tonight, but we have the assurance of my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister that it is not a poison. Obviously, the Government would not introduce such a measure and respected organisations such as the World Health Organisation would not approve of any measure that remotely related to poison.

But of course no one wants to be unpopular. One has to think very deeply before voting against the advice of many of my constituents who have urged me to reject the Bill. However, I would be a party to a sad and retrogressive step if I voted against giving the Bill a Second Reading. It would be sad for present and future generations of my constituents who would never then have the opportunity of enjoying a level of dental health that it has been proved beyond all reasonable doubt would be available to them. They would then be condemned to suffer needlessly the consequences and cost of tooth decay for the rest of their lives. I would not want to be a party to that.

It would also be retrogressive to vote against the Bill because it would mean that future generations in those areas — including many of our big cities — that have benefited from fluoride in their water supplies for many years would no longer enjoy the same level of dental health — until, that is, a future Government decided to introduce a national policy. If, through the introduction of fluoride into our water supplies, dental decay can be avoided, we will do our constituents no service by denying their health authorities the right to decide — which is what we are talking about—to introduce a proven, safe, economic and effective way of dramatically reducing the incidence of tooth decay.

Therefore, I hope that the House will show its good sense by giving the Bill a Second Reading.

9.55 pm

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): The hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) effectively underlined the way in which the Bill has been drawn to enable a legal muddle to be cleared up and so that the local people can decide. I reassure him about pressures from his constituents. He is experienced enough to know that the people who take the trouble to write to him do not necessarily represent all his constituents. When "Mr. Clavell-Blount" and his fluoridation lobby are at work, letters will not necessarily be in line with his judgment.

I spent last year attacking Tory Health Ministers, but now I congratulate the Minister on this measure. He will recall that in the debate on the Gracious Speech I chided him for being a coward and running away from the issue.

[Mr. Laurie Pavitt]

I asked him why the measure was not mentioned in the Gracious Speech. Fortunately, he has had second thoughts.

I spend most of my time considering health issues and crossing swords with Tory Ministers. I was pleased by the contribution by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), because I cut my political teeth on NHS matters when he was Minister responsible for health. The right hon. Gentleman made an important decision after Prime Minister Macmillan ordered three years of extensive research in three areas — Kilmarnock, Anglesey and Watford. That followed five years of research in the United States. The results proved beyond peradventure that one of the greatest moves towards the prevention of unnecessary pain and suffering was at hand in the fluoridation of water. That impeccable precedent is being followed tonight.

We have heard platitudes from all Ministers responsible for health about prevention. An example is smoking, and the 100,000 deaths that occur prematurely every year. At least we now have an enabling Bill so that something can be done about a serious problem.

Most hon. Members have concentrated tonight on the effects of fluoridation on children, but one must remember that we are talking about the teeth of children who will one day be 40 or 60 years of age. We try to stop young people from becoming addicted to cigarette smoking, but we are not worried so much about the older generation. In this measure we are also concerned about health care and prevention. Such measures apply to children because they have a life ahead of them.

Caries and the consequential toothaches, fillings and extractions could, within 20 years, be as unknown as the Charles Dickens' workhouse of the last century. Hon. Members have referred to the Royal Commission's findings. Fluoridation and a number of other factors could ensure that in the next century toothache, dental caries and extractions never occur. A number of measures are required to achieve that, but fluoridation is the first step.

The main objective is to establish a healthy body for the young and to maintain it during growth and later life. The House has heard about the number of people of 40 and 60 years who have mouths filled with china and porcelain instead of natural teeth. A recent Army survey of 18-year-old recruits shows that a staggering number suffer decay and need dentures.

The arguments for fluoridation rest upon thorough medically qualified research in many countries. The arguments against rest mainly on fairly dogmatic assertions. As the Minister has already said, 200 million people in the world are already benefiting from the prophylactic of fluoridation to prevent dental caries.

The phrase "mass medication" is a slogan. Those hon. Members who are worried about it should not drink anything in the House of Commons, because the Thames water authority adds 33 different medical substances as a prophylactic against illness——

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Water (Fluoridation) Bill and the National Heritage (Scotland) Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Water (Fluoridation) Bill

Question again proposed.

Mr. Pavitt: As hon. Members will know from previous debates on the subject, every drop of water that is drunk in the House, including tea and coffee made with it, has already been through the human body six times. If hon. Members feel that there is some way in which their individual liberty is being threatened by having that water cleaned before they drink it for the sixth time, I cannot follow that line of argument.

Hartlepool, Derbyshire and a number of other areas where there is a high concentration of naturally occurring fluoride in the water have been discussed. The anti-fluoridation lobby has never suggested that the Government should take action to remove that fluoride content.

Let us consider the economic basis of the Government's policy towards the NHS in trying to get the best value for public expenditure. There has been a great increase in the amount of public expenditure on the treatment of dental disease. In 1975, 27·2 million treatments were paid for by the NHS. There have been, of course, the unfortunate charges that Governments have imposed upon patients since that time. By 1982 that had risen to 31·7 million. In 1975 £169 million was spent on dental services out of the total Health Service budget and in 1982 that had risen to £401 million.

A good deal of evidence has emerged from recent research being undertaken, particularly in the London hospital and by the dental working party established by the Labour party. It shows the way in which Coca Cola, ice cream and so on are injurious to children's health. But the fact remains that fluoridation is the most effective first step in dental care, despite the possibility for further action by Government.

The Royal Commission has already been quoted. Its recommendation 5.31 on page 49 says:

"There are major areas where Government action could produce rapid and certain results: a much tougher attitude towards smoking, towards preventing road accidents and mitigating their results, a clear commitment to fluoridation".

That clear commitment is not coming from the Government tonight, but at least the Government have made it possible for local health and water authorities to proceed without being threatened with an injunction or High Court action which would prevent them from taking the necessary steps.

We are in favour of topical applications where fluoridation does not exist. We are in favour of the use of fluoride in milk, as happens in some southern counties in Britain. Nevertheless, everybody drinks water. There is no way in which one millionth of a part of fluoride added can in any way be injurious to health, and that has been proved time and again. This is a first step. I urge the Government to follow it through by accepting the other recommendations of the Royal Commission most of which were adopted as part of Labour party policy at the 1978 annual conference. The Government must, apart from this enablement, look into what is being done for school dentistry, examine the whole question of oral hygiene and consider the amount of expenditure that can be made so as to improve prevention rather than treatment.

We appreciate the difficulty faced by the Minister in that no Chancellor of the Exchequer is prepared to spend a penny today to save £10 in 10 years' time. Nevertheless, if the Minister will carry out a follow-through policy of prevention, not only in this but in other spheres, we shall enter the next century with more healthy people and with fewer claimants on the National Health Service, enabling us to speak of the number of people who no longer need to be treated. It will mean people being able to go through their lives without oral diseases, without dental caries and without suffering the disastrous pain of toothache, so enabling the dental profession to concentrate on other areas. I pay tribute to the dentists, who are strongly in favour of the measure, although it might eventually put them out of work.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I support the Bill, which is both fair and proper. From 1975 I was privileged to be a member of the Birmingham area health authority and subsequently, on reorganisation, to be chairman of the central Birmingham health authority. I was, therefore, close to and ultimately responsible for Birmingham dental hospital, the main teaching hospital outside the London area and a hospital of great renown; I was also a patient of that hospital for three years; and, like others, I am a parent, having two young children.

I tried during those years to come to this question with a completely open mind. Birmingham fluoridated its water more than 20 years ago and the results have proved extremely interesting. I will not quote the statistics because they have been mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Mrs. Knight) and the hon. Members for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) and for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft).

We also had some interesting statistics from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn). His seemed to be the opposite way round to most other statistics produced in the debate, suggesting that he was quoting from the wrong years. If he will do me the courtesy of sending me a copy of the figures he has, I shall examine them.

All other figures have shown that there has been a sharp drop in the number of dental caries; a great drop in the number of children without teeth or with dentures; a great reduction in the number of children who have had to be treated under general anaethesia, so enabling us in Birmingham to close a clinic; a sharp drop in expenditure on the removal of teeth; and an increase in expenditure on orthodentistry and conservation.

Those improvements have affected not just children, but adults, too. Indeed, we had problems with students because we ran out of people on whom they could practise and had to bus in children who were in need of treatment from other parts of the country. We were thereby able to pay much more attention to the dental care of the elderly, an area which had been greatly neglected.

If I had any doubts on this issue, the care of my two girls has proved to me the rightness of what the Government propose. My elder daughter was the result of a pregnancy carried in London, where the water is unfluoridated, although she was born in Birmingham. She had no end of trouble with her baby teeth, though her adult teeth are fine. My younger daughter, who was carried and born in Birmingham, where the water was fluoridated, has needed no dental treatment of any kind and has no fillings, even though she is coming up to her eighth birthday and eats sweets at a rate that makes me envious and, more important, eats them at the same rate as her sister.

Anyone who puts forward the argument that dental disease is trivial has never sat time and again in a dentist's waiting room with a terrified child. For children, fluoridation has been nothing but good.

Dr. M. S. Miller: I accept what the hon. Lady says. Does she accept, however, that sepsis in teeth, when it develops as the result of caries, can produce all sorts of conditions? The fluoride does not produce the conditions, but the septic organisms can cause rheumatic fever and many other diseases in children?

Mrs. Currie: I accept the hon. Gentleman's professional opinion on that.

The arguments on medical grounds that I have heard will not wash—the argument, for example, that fluoride is a poison. Anything is a poison if we take enough of it. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross has rejoined us in the Chamber. Were we to spreadeagle him on the Floor of the House and pour absolutely pure H_2O into him, it would kill him or anyone else subjected to that treatment in hours. That would be the result of ingesting any commodity, be it a vitamin, good food, bad food, fluoride sodium chloride or anything else. Anything is poisonous if we subject ourselves to enough of it. No one is suggesting that we do any more than put one part per million of fluoride in the water.

Mr. Fairbairn rose——

Mrs. Currie: I shall give way to my hon. and learned Friend in a moment.

Most of the medical issues which have been raised have been introduced by those who have other objections to the adding of fluoride to our water. That does not absolve us from continuing to be vigilant when dealing with health matters. We must not be complacent.

Mr. Fairbairn: All the poison that my hon. Friend suggested I would happily take rather than be spreadeagled on the Floor of the House by her.

Mr. Michael McGuire (Makerfield) rose——

Mrs. Currie: We have heard other arguments that are much more serious—for example that people can obtain fluoride in other ways. The trouble is that they do not. The families who need help most, whose diet is the most deficient and who take no notice of health education, are exactly those who need the assistance of passive medication, such as the fluoridation of water. It is the simplest, cheapest and safest method that is available to us. It is certainly the cheapest when we take into account the cost of doing nothing. It is the safest when we take into account that we know that there is control and we know how much fluoride is in the water. We do not know, of course, how much is being taken in other forms.

It is argued that we should not add flouride to our water and that we should drink it in its natural state. My home is on a hill in Derbyshire and there are many pure spring waters in the area. I would not touch any of the water that comes out of the ground in my area with a barge pole. I would not touch it in its natural state. The water is cleaned and purified, especially that from the Trent, which passes through all the local power stations, which have been working overtime recently. We chlorinate the water and we would be remiss if we did not. In London we would all have died of dysentery and cholera a long time ago if we had not treated the water effectively all the time. To fluoridate our water provided that the local people want it, seems to me an extension of public responsibilities.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Is my hon. Friend saying that fluoride should be introduced only if the local people, who will drink it, are given the opportunity of saying whether they want it, as opposed to the non-elected water authority meeting in secret without the presence of the press? Is that her proposition? That is what she is saying.

Mrs. Currie: As I understand it, the main recommendations and decisions will come from the health authority as well as from the water authority. I was a member of a health authority, and I am aware that the authorities are represented by a number of local representatives, who take their duties extremely seriously. They are councillors, who are elected representatives. When I was a member of a health authority, one of its representatives was a member of this place, and that was Miss Sheila Wright, who represented Birmingham, Handsworth.

It is said that we should not go in for mass medication because it is not morally justified. That is the most powerful of all the arguments and I would much rather we did not need to medicate our water. However, it seems that it is necessary to balance two undersirable events. First, there is the undesirable event of attacking people's freedom by medicating for everybody. The alternative is to risk lives, especially the lives of children. Children used to die under general anaesthetic, but it is now generally unknown for a child to die under dental treatment in fluoridated areas. That applies to adults and children. My right hon. and hon. Friends who represent Birmingham constituencies will recall that not long ago there was a scandal in Birmingham when two patients of a dentist died under anaesthetic. I accept that they needed better treatment, but they would not have died if they had not had bad teeth.

Every attempt at medical and dental intervention carries a risk for people. For some it is a high risk. We have a responsibility to reduce that risk, if possible, in much the same way as the House did previously when it agreed to compulsory inoculation against smallpox, which resulted in the eradication of that disease. We can eradicate dental caries as a disease.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross said that a medication should benefit a particular individual. We must balance the cost of treating dental disease, and that cost bears down on all of us. If it is undesirable to reduce freedom, it is undesirable also to spend public money in large quantities unnecessarily. Our freedom is reduced when large amounts of tax are lifted from our pockets and those of our constituents to pay for the treatment of dental disease in other people which is readily avoidable through fluoridation. For those reasons, we should support my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) speaks with great passion on this subject, as she does on all matters. Although some of those who are against the artificial fluoridation of water supplies are sometimes accused of being emotive in their arguments, I am confident that that criticism will not be levelled exclusively at them but will be levelled against some who are in favour of artificial fluoridation. My hon. Friend is so vivacious an advocate that I am sure would never be in danger of dying under a general anaesthetic or of being rendered unconscious under one.

Unfortunately, I cannot agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South. My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health rightly said that in this Bill the Government propose to do no more than to restore the position to the status quo. He said also that he is perfectly satisfied that artificial fluoridation of water supplies inhibits dental caries and benefits the general population. I do not doubt that my right hon. and learned Friend generally believes that that is so. I have little doubt that fluoridation of water supplies can play its part in preventing dental caries. All hon. Members would like that to occur. Just because those points are true does not mean that hon. Members are not entitled to offer their views on whether they believe it is right that there should be an artificial mass addition of fluoride to the water supplies.

I shake my head in disbelief when I hear a Conservative Government — some have said, the most Right-wing Conservative Government this century — propose legislation to add to the water supply an industrial poison, as it is described in the 1976 report of the Royal College of Physicians, which comes from industrial wastes and is said to be necessary to sustain life. I shake my head in disbelief also when I hear the Opposition support the judiciary, the Government and the medical professions. I wonder whether the House has gone topsy-turvy.

The Government are satisfied that fluoride is safe. If so, why do the Government offer an indemnity? Why would health authorities not recommend the artificial addition of fluoride to water supplies if there was no indemnity? That is a simple question, but the answer is more complicated. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security will address his mind to that problem. If the Government are certain that fluoridation is safe, there should be no need for an indemnity. If they are not, it should not be added artificially to the water supply. That proposition is wholly true and unchallengeable.

Fluoride is cumulative. What is a safe dose? I challenge any hon. Member to ask any doctor or dentist what a safe dose of fluoride is. There will be no answer because no doctor or dentist would know the total amount of fluoride ingested in a patient. Moreover, fluoride is a noxious substance.

Contrary to what many hon. Members said, fluoride does not occur naturally in water but is picked up by water in its passage through the ground, or down a river, such as the Thames. We then drink it in our tea in the House of Commons Tea Room, as the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) vividly explained. We are told that fluoride is beneficial to the population. I hope it is, because everyone in a fluoridated area must drink it. They have no choice. However, I am not aware that it does a great deal of good to pensioners with false teeth — perhaps I shall be told differently — or to patients suffering from a renal complaint. They are told in a cavalier way that it does not matter if they live in a fluoridated area because they can put a filter on the tap.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I have listened to my hon. Friend's remarks with great care, and I am anxious not to cause unnecessary alarm among the many patients who receive renal dialysis. Does my hon. Friend accept that we offer standard advice through the National Health Service to all those charged with maintaining renal dialysis units, which is that they should screen the water for products which would harm those with renal failure, including aluminium, fluoride and other substances? There is a great range of substances in water. My hon. Friend must accept that we ensure that substances which would adversely affect dialysis patients are not present.

Mr. Best: I accept unreservedly what my hon. Friend said. He confirms my point that fluoride should not be taken by those who suffer from renal complaints.

Lord Jauncey, in his judgment, said that the addition of fluoride would "necessarily involve a restriction on the freedom of choice of the individual, who would have little alternative but to consume the fluoridated water whether he likes it or not."

If hon. Members are so concerned about compelling people to take preventive medicine—I use that term because it seems to be the most neutral term in use during the debate—why do we not ban smoking? Smoking undoubtedly causes lung cancer. No hon. Member would disagree with that. Yet for some extraordinary reason we allow people to go on killing themselves and to die of lung cancer at great cost to the NHS, by not banning smoking. What is the reason for not banning smoking?

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): People like it.

Mr. Best: My hon. Friend says that people like it. It may not be wholly dissociated from the fact that people should be allowed to smoke if they wish, having had the dangers of it pointed out to them. The alternative is to say that nobody should make a conscious decision about whether to do or not to do something which may be harmful to health. I do not think that anyone in this House would want to live in a society where that choice was removed altogether.

I do not wish to introduce a note of levity into the debate, but many people suffer from indigestion and we do not add antacids to the water supply. It would be wrong to do so, for not everyone suffers from indigestion. But it is also true that not everyone in an artificially fluoridated water area suffers from dental caries. What about the people who do not suffer from dental caries and are not likely to do so?

What are the criteria for the addition of a substance to the water supply which is designed not to make it potable, not to remove poisons which would otherwise be harmful to the body, but deliberately and positively for the purpose of preventive medicine? We are entitled to ask what are the criteria for adding any such substance to the water supply.

Let us restrict the argument to water, as that is the one substance that we must drink to sustain life. I do not believe that the House has addressed itself to that question tonight. I do not believe, with respect, that the Government have addressed their mind to it. I am not for one moment saying that this might be regarded as the thin edge of the wedge, so that someone might suggest that if a tranquilliser could be added to the water supply it would be highly beneficial to society because it would reduce the incidence of violence and other anti-social behaviour. I am not suggesting that that might be regarded as a precedent.

Mr. Fairbairn: Why not?

Mr. Best: I suppose some might regard it as a precedent. That brings me to the point that hon. Members have not yet addressed their minds to the criteria for the addition of some substance to the water supply.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): Surely the answer is that fluoride already exists in water. If my hon. Friend is saying that it should not exist to the extent of more than or up to 1 mg, is he also suggesting that the Government should legislate to take natural fluoride out of the water supply in order to conform with his wishes?

Mr. Best: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his question, because it seems now that the proposition is that anything that exists already in substances that we take must be left in because it is accepted as a matter of history. I do not regard that as either a laudable or a responsible view for this House to take.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Is not the inference that just because a substance occurs naturally somewhere, it should be imposed on everyone everywhere? Can that be right?

Mr. Best: My hon. Friend knows my answer to that question, and he must address it to those who wish the Bill to get a Second Reading.

Much has been said about local choice. An opinion survey in Anglesey, the area that I have the privilege to represent, made on 30 November 1983 by the Gwynedd technical college, demonstrated that 26·5 per cent. of persons questioned were in favour of the artificial addition of fluoride to the water supply, and that 53·6 per cent. were against. My own survey of my constituency showed that 30 per cent. were in favour, but 45 per cent. were against.

I am not a populist. I do not believe that it is the function of hon. Members merely to reflect the whims of the local population, because our job must be to exercise our judgment, but I hope that all hon. Members will understand the sense of frustration that is experienced by the people living in my constituency who, time and again, demonstrate their opposition to having fluoride artificially added to their water supply but who can make no democratic decision about it. That is because there is no capacity within existing legislation for such a decision to be taken.

There is, of course, the referendum. I suggested the idea of a referendum on 21 December 1981. If this is to be a matter of genuine local choice, should not the people of the area make that decision and speak their mind—or, if not them, the directly elected borough or district council? That is no good to those who want fluoride added to the water supply of Anglesey because the local borough council is against the artificial fluoridation of water supplies. What, then, of the consumer watchdog of the National Health Service, set up by legislation to watch over matters in the NHS — the community health council? That is no good, because the community health council is against the artificial fluoridation of water supplies as well.

[Mr. Best]

My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health recognises that this is an ethical question. It is not the same as the death penalty, on which I am opposed to a referendum because I believe that the punishment of offenders must remain the prerogative of representatives in the House. I am not sure that even a referendum, which would be binding on a dissenting minority, is the right answer. Ultimately, surely the proposition comes down to this. Preventive medicine must remain a matter of individual choice, of encouragement and exhortation perhaps, but of individual choice, and not compulsion.

Mr. Michael McGuire (Makerfield): I apologise for the fact that I have not heard many of the speeches that have been made.

I am opposed to the Bill. I hope that those who spoke in favour and who want to intervene in what I hope will be a short speech will make the points that they think will convince me. Sometimes we come into the Chamber in one frame of mind and listen to a speech, and it changes our point of view. I am not saying that I have such a tremendous command of language and oratory as would make those in favour of the Bill change their mind, but I hope that those who want to will intervene, and briefly. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) did not give way to me in her speech. I hope that hon. Members will intervene to try to convince me that the Bill should go through. I believe that it should not. It is thoroughly bad, and on one sound principle alone.

I cannot pronounce the new name for the constituency that used to be called Anglesey. The fixed points in the House have gone since we changed so many old and well-loved names. I am sorry that I cannot refer to the hon. Gentleman's constituency by name. He dwelt at length on preventive medicine and whether it is the duty of the State to take certain decisions that it believes will make the citizens healthier—in this case, we are concerned with their teeth. I would be in favour if it could be proved that, if fluoride was put in water people who ingested it, especially children, would have a magnificent set of teeth. Nobody is suggesting that, however. The proponents of the Bill say that if flouride is added to water in the suggested proportions young people's teeth will be saved from decay, to the extent that one or two teeth will be saved in their lifetime, and they will not need to have three or four fillings.

Dr. M. S. Miller: It is not a matter of one or two teeth. Depending on the age at which it begins to be given, which should preferably be during the mother's pregnancy, 60 per cent. or more of fillings will be avoided and in some instances it will save the person's teeth throughout life.

Mr. McGuire: I am interested to hear that, as none of the proponents sending out literature about this has ever made that claim. But even if my hon. Friend's claim were proved, I should still oppose compulsory fluoridation because it is not for the State to take that decision. Vaccination is not compulsory, although the benefits are far greater. There are advertising campaigns to persuade people to have their children inoculated, but there is still freedom of choice.

Is my hon. Friend suggesting that if people take fluoride they will not have to take care of their teeth?

Dr. Miller: No.

Mr. McGuire: Of course not. If people take fluoride but neglect their teeth, they may delay the onset of caries for a short time, but it will not prevent it. Whether the water is fluoridised naturally, artificially or not at all, if people do not pay attention to dental hygiene they will have bad teeth and they will need fillings and extractions. It is convenient to argue that in some areas fluoride occurs naturally in the water, but has anyone analysed all the other naturally occurring constituents in the water?

I sense that many Conservative Members intend to oppose the Bill and they are right to do so. The soundest principle on which to oppose it is the fact that it is compulsory mass medication. Anyone who argues that that is not so is guilty of sophistry of the worst kind. People are given no choice in the matter.

On a lighter note, if we wished to try to eradicate common complaints by compulsory mass medication we should consider ailments such as constipation. No one has seriously suggested that that should be dealt with nationally, although it affects far more people. The same could be applied to smoking, dieting, and so on. The State would end up acting as nanny to all of us. Nobody wants that.

No case has been made for compulsory fluoridation beyond the fact that it will delay the onset of caries and the extraction of teeth for a short time. No one has suggested that if people do not pay proper attention to dental hygiene they will not suffer the consequences, whether there is fluoride in the water or not.

It is no part of the duties of the House of Commons to give the green light—which is what the Bill will do—to a proposal that makes it appear necessary to add fluoride to water and to suggest that neglect of the people is involved if it is not added. We should oppose the Bill on the sound principle of opposing mass medication and that it will not help the majority of people. Once past the age when second teeth are formed in childhood, fluoridation will not help. The case for it has not been made. We should oppose the Bill, and in doing so we shall do a very good job indeed.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): There are two points to the Bill—one of principle and the other of detail. On the point of detail, no one seriously challenges the fact that the presence of fluoride in water has a beneficial effect on dental caries. However, that is not the point at issue.

Certain contraceptive pills were withdrawn not because they were inefficient contraceptives but because they had side-effects that were wholly unexpected by those who originally passed them as safe and recommended them for general use. The reason that Dalkon intra-uterine devices are now not only withdrawn but the manufacturers are desperately trying to find people who still have them in —some women do not know that they still have them— is not because they are inefficient contraceptives but because they have been shown to have harmful side-effects that were not anticipated by those who recommended them. Let us think of the position if they had been fitted —or, with contraceptive pills, administered—compulsorily, because that is the analogy.

The question is not whether fluoride—either naturally in the water as it percolates through the ground, or artificially added — is an instrument in delaying or preventing caries. The technical issue is unanswerable except over a much longer period of time than has been allowed to date. What are the side-effects? That is the large question mark. No amount of evidence about the prevention of dental caries gets rid of that question mark.

Arguments about whether elected local bodies should have the right to impose this medication are not ones of substance because the public water supply system is not conterminous with local authority boundaries. Therefore, that is not a practical consideration. It is the right of the individual to know what is being administered to him or her or to their children, and to have the right to control that.

There are peripheral questions. I put my vote where my mouth was when I took the view that water authorities should meet with the press present, but the water authorities that are party to the proposal meet in secret. They are not elected bodies. My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), who has now left the Chamber, pretended that because she was a member of an elected body and seconded by it to the health authority, in some way she was elected to the health authority. Of course she was not. Nor are people elected to health authorities today. But, even if they were, it does not overcome the point of principle. I am the first to admit that I have changed my stand on this matter during the past 15 years.

When I was first contacted by members of the dental and medical professions, about 15 years ago, I became convinced of the efficacy of fluoride as an anti-caries agent, and it was on that that I focused. Because I thought that it would be an excellent thing if people did ingest this substance, to reduce dental caries, I took, without conscious decision, the further step of thinking that it should be administered to them by the public supply system. I did so without focusing on the question of principle, which concerns the right of some exterior body to administer in a necessary substance something that may have demonstrated beneficial effects in one sphere, but the full effects of which cannot be known over a limited period. Why in the water? Why not in the air or in trains, now that in many trains one cannot open a window? Why not in public places of many kinds, such as shops and offices? Why not administer gaseous substances in the air?

Dr. M. S. Miller: Do not be silly.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Why it is silly?

Dr. Miller: Does the hon. Gentleman understand what it is all about? Fluoride cannot be administered in the air. It cannot be controlled in the air. It can be controlled in water to the extent of one part per million. Can you get that into your head? [HON. MEMBERS: "Order."] I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Gentleman cannot understand that one cannot do this in the air.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: I am referring not to fluoride but to other substances.

Dr. Miller: We are not talking about other substances.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Perhaps it is a substance that would assist the hon. Gentleman with his hearing, which should be voluntarily taken by him, but I would not recommend that it should be compulsorily administered, whatever public good might follow from such a course of treatment.

Both the chairman and the chief executive of the South-West water authority have assured me, not only verbally but in writing, that there is no conceivable known way by which they can restrict the administration to one part per million. There are so many different sources of water in the south-west — bore holes, extractions from rivers, springs and reservoirs — which feed at different speeds into common mains and sometimes into local mains, that there is no way in which the authority can ensure a low limit such as this.

The explanatory memorandum says:

"Effects of the Bill on Public Sector Manpower

The Bill has no effect on public sector manpower."

Are water authorities not public services? They must be, because their borrowing is being restricted because it counts against the public sector borrowing requirement. Is it suggested that the fluoride administered from 20 or 30 different sources in one water authority should not be monitored? It will have to be monitored, but it is suggested that it will not take extra manpower to do this and to control and correct the level when the intensity gets too high. How can the Bill have no effect on public sector manpower, unless it be that the words on page 2—are they sinister or benign?

have the answer. Does that mean that ensuring that the level does not go over 1 mg per litre will happen only as long as no extra manpower is involved?

Sir John Page: I have listened with great patience to my hon. Friend trying to make an enormous soufflé from one bad egg. I do not wish to go into this in too much detail, but the reason is that already so many chemicals and processes happen to water before it comes out of the tap that one more tiny drop would be of infinitesimal importance.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: My hon. Friend has missed the point. We are talking here about fluoride. Why does the Bill say, only of fluoride, that it must be maintained at 1 mg per litre if it does not matter if it is much more?

Sir John Page: It does not say that.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: It does say that. Clause 1(5) states:

"Any health authority making arrangements with a statutory water undertaker in pursuance of an application shall ensure that those arrangements include provisions designed to secure that the concentration of fluoride in the water supplied to consumers in the area in question is, so far as is reasonably practicable, maintained at 1 mg per litre."

Perhaps my hon. Friend has not read the Bill. Why does it say that if it does not matter whether the level is maintained there?

Sir John Page: I know that it was a mistake for me to have interrupted my hon. Friend. I was answering his question about manpower. As to the phrase,

"so far as is reasonably practicable",

there will be pluses and minuses. Control can be maintained, but there must be a tiny plus or minus on either side — [Hon. Members: "How much?"] Perhaps 0·1 per cent. or something like that.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: But it does not say 0·1 per cent. It says nothing except for the meaningless phrase,

"so far as is reasonably practicable".

That is a point of substance, not of trivia. If

"so far as is reasonably practicable"

means without addition to public service manpower, that is a much wider margin than if one takes on, as one does for many statutory purposes, additional enforcement staff to ensure that the new conditions imposed by statute are adhered to. But when the explanatory memorandum says that there will be no expansion to public service manpower, how does one then read the qualification, except as meaning so far as is reasonably practicable without taking on additional manpower to check the concentration, to ensure that water supplies with too high a concentration are cut off, and to take corrective action on the input? Where there are many sources of water supply, especially in conditions of drought, when water is turned off for some hours in a day, which causes many different concentrations in pipes, this is not just a theoretical consideration but a highly practical one.

"so far as is reasonably practicable",

The point of principle has nothing to do with whether it is a small or large baby—with whether it is 1 mg per litre, one part per million or 100 parts per million. The argument also falls on the point of detail that it cannot be enforced at the level declared in the Bill without a considerable increase in manpower to monitor it and to take corrective action if it goes over the permitted limit, even though the amount by which it can go over the permitted limit is not stated in the Bill, because of the woolly phrase.

On the point of principle and on the point of practicality, the Bill ought not to proceed. The Second Reading of a Bill is not about its detail, but about its principle.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: The hon. Gentleman did not listen previously and, as he has not taken medication since then, I have no reason to believe that his hearing has improved.

Dr. Miller: The hon. Gentleman must realise that no attempt has been made to mislead the public or the House. The Bill recommends 1 mg per litre, but one can be sure that 2 mg, 3 mg, 5 mg or 10 mg would not do any harm. There is a vast margin of safety. The reason why 1 mg is suggested is that it is sufficient. The substance costs money, and there is no point in adding 10 mg per litre if 1 mg does the job.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Were that the real reason, rather than a spurious reason thought up by the hon. Gentleman on the spur of the moment, the Bill would refer to a minimum of 1 mg. The hon. Gentleman does argue that it does not matter if there is much more, but there must be 1 mg per litre to do what is intended. The principle is unaffected by whether it is 1 mg or 10 mg. The practice is certain: to monitor and enforce limits will require manpower, and it should not be stated that it does not. As it has been stated that no manpower is required, we must read the phrase as meaning that the stated quantity is not to be adhered to in practice and is not to be monitored in such a manner that corrective action can be taken to prevent people from receiving excessive doses, as opposed to our knowing that people have taken excessive doses after they have done so.

The point of principle remains and it is as true of air as it is of water. If this is permissible with water, it is permissible with air, and with other things that people necessarily and without choice ingest. That is the point of principle.

Let there be as much health education as would satisfy the most exacting hon. Member; let there be as much exhortation; let supplies of preventive or therapeutic substances be made available at public expense. All that is different from administering compulsorily substances that people do not wish to ingest—for reasons that may be good or bad, but which are decisions that they are at liberty to make about their own bodies and persons.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop), who is a master of detail in these matters. I am pleased to have him as an ally rather than as a foe.

We all agree that the Government were right to allow a free vote. We have had an interesting, stimulating and informed debate—at least, the opponents of the Bill have been informed. It has been an interesting debate on the other side too.

This is a matter of great concern to my constituents. The Cannock Chase district council is an elected body, although there are regrettably not too many Conservatives on it at present. It has declared itself hostile to the compulsory fluoridation of the water supply. I share its concern. I also have a particular interest in this subject, as a sufferer. I have been a patient at the Eastman dental hospital for the past two years, as I suffer from periodontitis. It is not caries, but is a dental disease. Therefore, I may have more interest than usual in this issue, and can speak with some authority on it.

If the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McGuire) did not regard his speech as an oration, many of us certainly did, and we look forward to hearing more from him in the spirit in which he has approached this subject. He rightly identified the question of principle involved, or the philosophical arguments, but there are also medical arguments. I shall deal with them first. Medical opinion has differed for years over whether the addition of fluoride to water supplies is a good way of reducing the incidence of dental decay, particularly among children. I understand that the idea of giving children supplementary fluoride to prevent dental caries dates from the 19th century, and was conceived after the discovery of fluoride in a mammoth tooth in 1803.

Sadly, history does not relate which toothpaste the mammoth used or whether it was alive when it was discovered. But since then medical opinion has remained divided on how best to emulate the mammoth. Fluoride, as has been mentioned, is a poison, and we are talking about adding a poison to the water supply in quantities that exceed those already existing. Although many scientists and dentists believe that it can help to reduce dental decay, there are clearly those who do not agree with them.

It is argued that although fluoride may help children for a limited period of their growth, it is injurious to the body and is a possible contributory cause of certain diseases, including—it has been suggested in some quarters—cancer. Indeed, dentists warn that there are positive dangers to young children from the excessive use of fluoride toothpaste. I think that those dangers will be exacerbated if fluoride is also to be added to the water supply.

Mr. Winter, of the department of children's dentistry at the Eastman dental hospital, has made the following point:

"Recent concern has been expressed about the possibility of young children ingesting sufficient fluoride toothpaste to result in dental mottling"— which we have already heard is a disease in itself—

"This could happen by over-enthusiastic loading of the toothbrush by parents, or by young children gaining access to toothpaste which they eat freely. While there is no direct evidence of dental fluorosis from the ingestion of fluoride toothpaste alone, it may contribute to the problem, especially if children have been given fluoride supplements since infancy."

Mr. Winter goes on to say:

"Further research is certainly required to clarify this matter."

That is at the heart of the point made by those of us who oppose the measure. Further research is still required. We do not believe that the subject has been fully explored.

In this debate Lord Jauncey seems to have been used much like the Bible. He has been quoted by all sides. But among other things, on page 79 he said:

"Counsel for the Petitioner submitted that I could only reject the epidemiological case if I were satisfied that there was no possibility of fluoride causing cancer. I could not be so satisfied on the evidence in this case, and indeed proof of such a negative would be very difficult if not impossible."

Another argument which he advanced was that fluoridation would probably cause dental fluorosis and mottling of the teeth, the first sign of fluoride poisoning. This is a medical opinion and proves that the weight of evidence is not wholly on one side.

Fluoridation can also render water too impure for use in kidney machines. On that Lord Jauncey said:

"I am not going so far as to state that no chronic renal failure patients with a kidney function reduced to 20 per cent. or less will ever suffer any harm from drinking fluoridated water. This is a possibility."

He did not say that it was likely, but he did say that it was a possibility.

"I consider that the Petitioner is well-founded in submitting that drinking water fluoridated to one part per million can, in some circumstances, cause enzyme inhibition."

Enzymes are vital to life's process, particularly for young children and the unborn. The inhibition of enzymes can cause birth defects, infant mortality and genetic damage. One of the major causes of cot deaths is a deficiency of oxygen-carrying enzymes. These are inhibited by fluoride. This is a possibility and no one knows definitely whether it is not so. The highest incidence of cot deaths in the world is in Australia, which is completely fluoridated. There is a possible connection.

I do not argue that evidence exists that fluoride causes damage. I argue that there is evidence that the case is not proven, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) said.

In 1977, Chile ceased fluoridation because of the clear increase in infant mortality in areas subjected to fluoride in the water. Sir Arthur Amies, emeritus professor of dental medicine and surgery at the University of Melbourne, said:

"The case against fluoridation medically requires only such evidence as is necessary to support a reasonable doubt. Where the public is concerned, no reasonable doubt can be ignored, and the doubt about fluoridation is more than reasonable, it is considerable."

I am not a medical expert in these matters. I might benefit from further advances in dental medicine. However, the duty of the House is to examine the evidence worldwide. I do not believe that the case is proven. I do not believe that we have reached total certainty in medicine.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): The law of Scotland would have allowed Lord Jauncey to return a verdict of not proven, but he did not do that. I shall not bore my hon. Friend by reading out his conclusions, but there is no doubt about them. My hon. Friend does Lord Jauncey a disservice in relation to his judgment.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The House will be grateful for the fact that he does not intend to read out the whole judgment by Lord Jauncey. I am aware of Lord Jauncey's conclusions, but we must take cognisance of the points that emerge from those conclusions. The case is not 100 per cent. proven.

Mr. John Patten: My hon. Friend has drawn heavily on supposed evidence from Australia. Will he recognise that the supposed link between cot deaths and fluoride was closely examined by the health and medical research council in Australia, which in 1979 definitely found that there was no such link? Secondly, will my hon. Friend recognise that Sydney, which has had fluoridated water since 1968, has the lowest incidence of cot deaths anywhere in that continent?

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The fact is that Australia does have the highest incidence of cot deaths. However, I accept my hon. Friend's point and I am sure that the House will appreciate his having taken that opportunity to make it.

My principal point is that made by the hon. Member for Makerfield and several of my hon. Friends. Even if the medical evidence were completely in favour of the addition of fluoride, there remains a deep-seated philosophical argument against it, as advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best). That argument is akin to the seat belts argument, which has also been mentioned. If I had been a Member of the House at the time it considered whether to make the wearing of seat belts compulsory I would have voted resolutely against it. I wear seat belts everywhere I go in a car, but I am resolutely opposed to making people wear them against their wish. That is not part of Conservative philosophy, nor is it part of Conservative philosophy to put medicines in the water supply.

I shall not go further into the arguments about the addition of chlorine, and so on, which is to make water pure, and the addition of something which has been added for one specific purpose only, which is to resolve the problem of dental decay.

Mention has been made already, somewhat unfairly I am sorry to say, of the confirmation that was given some years ago by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State; no doubt he will refer to that when he replies.

Dr. M. S. Miller: If, at some time in the future, a group of scientists were to say that for the past 20 or 30 years they had been working on a substance which, if added to water in small quantities, reduced the incidence of coronary thrombosis by 10, 20 or 50 per cent. but which many experiments had shown did not produce any ill-effects, would the hon. Gentleman look favourably on introducing that substance into the water?

Mr. Howarth: That is a hypothetical question. It would depend on whether there were other means of treating the ailment or whether the treatment could be taken in some other form.

The fundamental point of principle is that if something were added to the water supply which helped 10 per cent. of those who suffer from coronary thrombosis, one would have to examine the other options. If there were none, I should have to consider that. I hope that I do not have a closed mind on such matters. However, a fundamental principle is about to be breached, and I do not wish to be a party to that.

If the measure goes through, people will not be able to decide for themselves. Henceforth, they will have no choice but to take fluoride in the drinking water and with their cooking.

Moreover, fluoride has side effects, or at least some feel that it does. We do not know how many suffer from side effects caused by fluoride in the water supply. All I know is that one of my constituents feels that he has suffered from fluoridated, contaminated water in Wales. He was ill as a consequence. Others have had similar experiences. I suppose the advice to him would be to move his holiday home from Wales to Northern Ireland which is excluded from the Bill and continues to enjoy a water supply unfettered by the compulsory addition of fluoride.

Those who believe that fluoride helps to reduce caries have plenty of alternative options open to them. They can use a mouth rinse, or toothpaste, 98 per cent. of which contains fluoride. People have a choice. I can still buy toothpaste that does not contain fluoride if I wish. Or they can take the tablets which I have here in my hand. My wife and I gave those to our children because we believed that that was the right thing to do although we have stopped doing so because we now have doubts about the matter. But that decision was up to us as parents with an informed view. Incidentally, if a child took all the tablets in one go, serious danger could result. [Interruption.] Whatever is said, this is a medicament being put in the water supply.

There is the possibility that milk can carry fluoride. The Borro Foundation provides that service, and when I asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he thought there was a case for making that service available to school children—from choice, not compulsorily—he replied that he did not have that in mind.

We must not lose sight of the cost. It will cost £500,000 in the west Midlands to fluoridate the water supply. That money could be better spent increasing the amount of money available to dental hygienists. Indeed, a dental hygienist has done more for my teeth than fluoride tablets or any other medicament.

Trouble with children's teeth results from the fact that parents are not teaching them how to brush their teeth and what to eat. Too many parents buy off their children in the supermarket, giving them too many sweets, and we know how bad sweets are for teeth. The hon. Member for Makerfield pointed out that dental hygiene can resolve the problem. If people take all the fluoride in the world—in the appropriate doses, of course—but do not properly maintain their teeth, we shall still have a nation suffering from dental decay.

In my view, the medical case has not been proven beyond all doubt for a gigantic step of this nature, which will result in every person being obliged to consume fluoride, unless the water is taken out of a bottle. This is the thin end of the wedge. We shall be setting a dangerous precedent which we shall rue in the future. I hope, therefore, that hon. Members in all parts of the House will join me in voting against the Second Reading.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea West): Even if fluoridation were proved to be absolutely safe and even if it were claimed to be a treatment for complaints far more serious, I should still insist that the House must address two major issues which overwhelm the poor arguments we have heard in favour of fluoridation.

The first is that of compulsory mass medication versus individual choice. The second is that of democratic decision versus bureaucratic imposition. I am surprised that the occupants of the Government Front Bench, unlike many of those sitting behind them, can have the effrontery to suggest that there is even a question to be answered on the issue of democratic versus quango decision, as they, after all, occupy their present elevated status after fighting two general elections on manifestos opposing quangos, insisting on the need to cut back on them and to diminish their authority. I assume, therefore, that the democratic argument is established.

We come to the argument of democratic choice. There is a major difference between adding substances to water to make it drinkable and adding substances for any other reason. It is difficult to explain why teeth complaints should be treated differently from any other form of medical hazard that faces us. A person can discharge himself from hospital——

Dr. M. S. Miller: I ask my right hon. Friend to be more careful about definitions. He has talked about drinking water, but any water is drinkable. He was referring to water that is safe to drink. Any water that is not fluoridated is not safe to drink.

Mr. Williams: We are talking about the compulsory and unnecessary adding of fluoride to drinkable water in areas where it is not added now, one of which I represent. I have opposed, successfully until now, the introduction of fluoridation in my constituency. As others have said, we no longer insist on vaccination, even against killer diseases. We do not force feed those who decide that they will allow themselves to die through starvation. We do not impose medication in any form on others unless a special legal process has been undertaken through the courts.

The hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) made a legitimate point when he asked why we had not banned smoking. It was suggested that we have not banned it because people like to smoke. I ask my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) to pass me a glass of water.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I pass my right hon. Friend a glass of water that is guaranteed fluoride-free—but I have spat in it.

Mr. Williams: It has been said that we should not ban smoking because people like to smoke. We have said to those who like to smoke marijuana that we shall not allow them to do so. We have recently imprisoned someone who liked taking cocaine. It seems that it was not his intention to peddle it to others but to take it himself, and we said that he should not do so. That argument is not tenable.

The hon. Member for Ynys Mon advanced legitimate and worrying arguments about precedent. If I had not been worried about the arguments before I heard what he had to say, and if I had not been convinced by his remarks, I would have been convinced of his case by the interjections that he had to face from those who disagreed with him. There were those who referred to antacids and said that we cannot add antacids to water. That is not the issue. The question is whether we would do so if we could. The imputation is that some hon. Members would. Should we accept additives to water for certain heart conditions? There are those who say that they would if it were possible to do so. The list is lengthening.

The hon. Member for Ynys Mon asked about the possibility of adding tranquilisers and there was the interjection "Why not?". When it was suggested that there could be the introduction of certain chemicals via the air, the argument was raised that that would not be controllable. That means by implication that if it were controllable it would be acceptable.

What makes the avoidance of minor problems of the teeth——

Dr. M. S. Miller: Minor?

Mr. Williams: Yes, minor problems. What makes them more important in health terms than any other health consideration? If fluoride is so effective, the duty in a democracy is not to impose it on people but to make people aware of the benefits available to them by using fluoride in some other form. The duty is not to impose fluoride but to allow people to make a choice. I am opposed to the Government's proposal because it does not give people that choice.

Sir Ian Percival (Southport): I have listened to almost the whole of the debate and with great interest, and on occasions I have been impressed by some of the arguments of those in favour of the Bill. However, having listened to it all, I come to the opposite conclusion, and shall vote against this legislation.

The subject with which we are dealing can be reduced to simple propositions. My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health rightly described the process of adding fluoride to water as "preventive medicine" and "a public health measure". The purpose is to prevent damage to health which might be suffered by some people, and it is no good anyone seeking to put that any other way.

It is equally clear that fluoridation is compulsory mass medication. We must all drink water, so if the water in our area is medicated, we must drink it—whether or not it will do us any good and, indeed, in the knowledge that many people cannot possibly obtain any benefit from it. The question we have to face is whether any arm of authority should be given the right to subject all the people in a given area to that medication so that those who might benefit do so?

On the face of it, the most powerful argument was that unless we do fluoridate the water, young people might be denied the opportunity of having less trouble with their teeth. My hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) demolished most of that argument, so that I need refer to it only briefly. There are other ways of obtaining for our young people the benefit of fluoride's value — toothpaste, tablets, and so on. What is really being said is: "Because we do not trust parents or health authorities to do the right thing, we must step in and wet nurse them to ensure that the young people get that fluoride although millions of other people who do not receive any benefit will have to drink the fluoridated water as well." The House must face that issue in deciding whether to pass this legislation.

I have been a Member long enough to pay great attention to the views of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). I was impressed by the fact that, although the points I made are well known to him, he came to a different conclusion. I respect his concern for freedom of the individual. His concern is as great as that of any one else. The right hon. Gentleman nearly, but not quite, persuaded me.

Further, even if the arguments of the right hon. Member for South Down were sufficient to overcome those hurdles, there is one more which is conclusive. If any arm of authority were to be given the right to take this action, it must be a democratically elected body to which the electors can make known their views. If that body acts contrary to the views of the electorate, they can exercise control in the next election. Nothing short of that process will do. Since it is central to the Bill that a health authority is the body to which the right is to be given—and as that is by no stretch of the imagination an "elected body" —that consideration is fatal to the Bill. I shall vote against the Bill, and I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to do so also.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): I have a few questions to ask the Minister, which I can put in literally two minutes.

First, given that every human being is largely made up of water, has not every individual a right to drink water the treatment of which has been limited to cleaning? Secondly, is the fact that fluoride occurs naturally somewhere, an argument that it should be imposed on everyone everywhere?

Thirdly, accepting that water itself does not cause decay and that people cause decay to their teeth by their eating habits, what is the logic in saying that their eating habits should be exercised according to choice, and their drinking habits according to compulsion? Fourthly, are there not ample opportunities for individuals to apply fluoride to their own teeth?

Fifthly, if it is said that the decision to administer fluoride should be made locally, is it not right that water and health authorities are appointed and not elected? Sixthly, if fluoride is considered desirable, why should not other drugs, substances or chemicals be applied? Why should the line be drawn after fluoride? Where is the logic in that?

Seventhly, is it not a fact that far from fluoride benefiting everyone, it benefits only some, that is, children? Eighthly, is it not true that some doctors and researchers still have doubts about the safety of fluoride? Is it right, therefore, to make it compulsory?

Ninthly, is it not true that whether or not fluoride is dangerous, some people still consider it to be dangerous? Some of my constituents said to me that it affects their health. Why should they be forced to take it, even if their fears are groundless? Tenthly, do not people have the right to choose?

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I sense some restlessness in the House and know that all hon. Members wish to draw the debate to a conclusion. I hope that I shall not be criticised if I do not attempt to make the definitive anti-fluoridation speech.

I hope that that is not a misjudgment, because I cannot help feeling that the Government have misjudged the debate. The first misjudgment was that the debate would achieve so little interest that it could begin at 7 o'clock and be expected to end at 10 o'clock. That may show that the Government are not with it regarding public feeling about the fluoridation issue. The second misjudgment relates to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary who, at one stage, so misjudged his prospects that he thought he would never become a Minister, still less a Minister in the Department of Health and Social Security, and committed himself to a document supporting the anti-fluoridation case.

I shall address myself to some points that have recurred during the debate. The first relates to the question of the safety of fluoridation. It is perfectly clear that some people consider fluoride to be absolutely safe. The Minister for Health told us that a massive amount of research was examined by his advisers, whose conclusion, that there is no jot or tittle of reliable evidence to show that fluoridation is safe, and can be relied on. For every expert, scientist or doctor who has committed himself to writing to say that there is no evidence to suppose that fluoridation is unsafe, I can produce a doctor, scientist or expert who has produced a report to say that it is unsafe.

Furthermore, I draw the attention of hon. Gentlemen who support the Bill and say that Lord Jauncey in a lengthy case has come to the conclusion that it is safe, to three judges who have held the contrary view. In May 1982 Judge Ferris, hearing a case in Houston, said that artificial fluoridation of public water supplies

"may cause or may contribute to the cause of cancer, genetic damage, intolerant reaction and chronic toxicity, including dental mottling in man . . . and may aggravate malnutrition and existing illnesses in man."

That is the decision of a judge who heard the same kind of evidence from the same kinds of witnesses as produced the alternative conclusion from Lord Jauncey.

In Illinois, Judge Ronald Niemann said that "the artificial addition of fluorides to the public water supply may have adverse health effects" and that it

"exposes the public to a risk, uncertain in its scope, of unhealthy side effects".

That was in February 1982, and that is contrary to the conclusion reached by Lord Jauncey.

In Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, in 1978, Judge Flaherty said that "artificial fluoridation of public water supplies is deleterious to human life and health."

He was considering precisely the same sorts of witnesses as Lord Jauncey considered.

That is not all, for at the end of a 210-page report, prepared for the Ministry of the Environment in the Province of Quebec in 1979 by an advisory committee which consisted of a number of experts, it was said of the fluoridation of water that it "poses serious dangers to health and has not proved to be a very effective deterrent to dental caries".

I draw those judgments to the attention of the House, and I shall not weary the House with a long list of research projects throughout the world which indicate that fluoridation is unsafe for all kinds of reasons. I merely make the point that it seems to me that we in this House are not fitted to make judgments of scientific detail and that, where leading scientists cannot agree that fluoridation is safe, there must be a doubt.

The chlorination of water saves people from dying of typhus or some other illness, and one assumes that everyone is in favour of chlorination, but here we are dealing only with the reduction of dental caries in children's teeth. It may be painful, but it can be reduced by a number of other means, as we have heard.

We have heard an argument about whether fluoridation is beneficial. I do not propose to go into that in any great depth, but the figures produced by scientists to show that there has been a beneficial reduction in dental caries in children's teeth since the introduction of fluoride in this, that or the other area, can usually be interpreted in two ways.

Reference has been made to the Birmingham figures. All one can say about those figures is that since fluoridation there has been a threefold increase in the number of temporary fillings, and that in permanent fillings there has been neither an increase nor a decrease, despite many years of fluoridation.

Most of the conclusions that have been drawn in favour of the beneficiality argument have been on the most fallacious of all logical inaccuracies — post hoc ergo propter hoc: that because since the introduction of fluoridation, there has been a fall in caries in children's teeth, therefore that fall is due to fluoridation. The problem with that argument is that in some parts of Britain where there has been a comparable decline in dental caries in children's teeth—I cite particularly the Isle of Wight —there has been no fluoridation of the water supply. That leads one to the conclusion that it may well be that more attention to the brushing of teeth, more attention to diet, and more attention to the consumption by children of sugary substances, may have much more to do with the reduction of dental caries in children's teeth than the fluoridation of water has ever done.

I shall not labour the point, but I do not concede the argument — whether it has been made by my hon. Friends or Opposition Members — that it is beyond peradventure that the fluoridation of the water supply benefits teeth. It is very much a question of doubt whether it does. We know that it hardens the teeth. Whether it improves them or delays the onset of dental caries for longer than two years, which is what one scientific report in Britain said, one does not know, but it has not been proved beyond doubt.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health began by telling us that he, his officials and his experts had been into the the question of fluoridation with such great care that we could rely upon them, because no stone had been left unturned and they had investigated every criticism that had been made. The trouble is that they have totally neglected to do any research into the one really important aspect of the effect of fluoridation — how much of a dose anybody will receive.

We do not all drink the same amount of water, at one part per million. We do not all drink beer or tea that has fluoridation. We do not all eat the same food that has been treated or processed with fluoridated water. There is at least one professor in this land who says that the cumulative effect of cooking and processing food in fluoridated water deposits a far higher degree of fluoride in the bones than anybody imagines. It is cumulative, and is not passed out of the system. Nobody knows how much fluoride we ingest through the air when we breathe.

Therefore, since it is conceded that fluoride ingested into the system at two, three, four or five parts per million can be highly poisonous, and since nobody knows or could possibly know how much fluoride there is in the system in any dose, which is an area of research upon which little work has been done, that gives no confidence and should not inspire any confidence in us that a great deal of work has been done on one or two other issues.

We have discussed whether the measure is democratic, undemocratic or does not matter. I can only recount some experiences from my part of the country, where the Severn-Trent water authority and the South Staffordshire water works company decided, on the demand of the area health authorities, to fluoridate the water. The Government said that they would wish it to be fluoridated only with the consent of the local people concerned, but when the democratically elected Staffordshire, Shropshire, Gloucestershire, Herefordshire and Worcestershire county councils said no, that was ignored by the water and health authorities. When the district councils of Newcastle-under-Lyme, Stafford, South Staffordshire, East Staffordshire, Lichfield, Cannock Chase, Tamworth and Stoke-on-Trent in Staffordshire all said no, that was ignored by the water and health authorities, which knew better. Oswestry, North Shropshire, South Shropshire, Shrewsbury and Atcham, The Wrekin, and Bridgnorth in Shropshire all said no. Malvern Hills, Wychavon and Worcester in Hereford all said no. Whenever a responsible public opinion poll has been taken, which refers to matters other than saving the health of people's teeth, and people have been asked whether they want the water to be fluoridated, everybody has said no. There is absolutely no doubt that the overwhelming majority is against fluoridating the water.

There have been all sorts of bogus polls. We are taking the powers away from democratically elected people and giving them to water and health authorities, which not only are not democratically elected, but are removed from the locality. That is no answer. To pretend that that is democratic is bogus. We know perfectly well that representative bodies have been appointed in the USSR, but no one on the Front Bench would call that a democratically elected state. The argument about democratic elections and the will of the people is highly significant and militates against the Bill.

Finally, there is the question of freedom. When I first came to the House I could not have cared less about fluoridation. I then sat on the Select Committee and found that witnesses who assured us that fluoridation was beneficial and safe could not answer simple questions to show that they knew what they were talking about. Only then did I begin to smell a rat and to realise that there was more to this than we had been led to suppose. People who are worried about this are concerned, above all, whether it is an infringement of their freedom. In this context, it was sad to hear the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) trying to justify a decision that he made many years ago on the ground that fluoridation was not mass medication. He and I have fought together in various battles, notably with regard to seat belts. I see no significant difference between the interference with individual' liberty in that case and in the individuals decision as to whether he or his children should take a particular medicine.

Others have argued that only a tiny bit of freedom is involved, so it does not really matter. That is exactly the argument that we had in relation to seat belts. There is no such thing as a tiny bit of freedom. There is the principle of freedom or no freedom. It is a seamless web, and degree is irrelevant. What matters is whether we are prepared to stand up for the liberty of the individual, which can so easily be eroded. If Governments are allowed to say, through the medical authorities, not "This is a medicine that we advise you to take " but "This is good for you and you must take it", who can say where that will lead? We should be saying, "This is good for children's teeth and, even though you are not a child, you will take it", and "Even though you have no teeth, you will take it, but that is only a little infringement of liberty because people without any teeth cannot possibly be harmed by it."

John Stuart Mill said that the individual is sovereign over his own body and mind, and I believe that the right hon. Member for South Down has made similar references to the importance of safeguarding small freedoms. If we infringe freedom in this way, where will the process end? Will doctors tell us that because in their view it is good for us to take vitamins — tranquillisers, stimulants, contraceptives or whatever — we shall have to take them? Once we give that kind of licence to administrators, very little of our freedom will be left in a very short time.

That is no doubt why of all the countries of Europe which might be expected to fluoridate their water, if it were as beneficial as we are told, only the United Kingdom and Eire do so. Austria, Greece, Norway, France and Spain do not. Belgium, Holland, Germany and Sweden used to do so, but have stopped, as have hundreds of cities in the United States.

I invite the House to accept the overwhelming strength of the arguments against the Bill and to vote against it. I remind my hon. Friends that it is a free vote. I hope that members of the Government will bear in mind, too, the sensitivities of those in the Government who in the past, on the question of freedom, if on no other issue, have expressed their opposition to the proposition in the Bill.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I do not intend to detain the House for long. I have listened to most of the debate and I think that most of the points at issue have been well and truly covered.

When I found myself in agreement with the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best), I thought I had better leave the Chamber and read my notes to determine whether I would be going into the right Lobby. I must say that I share the sentiments that he expressed. Indeed, many Conservative Members have expressed the right and proper view on the Government's introduction of this proposal.

A few questions have been overlooked. One is that the Bill suggests that the public water supply is maintained at 1 mg per litre. The Minister is a past Welsh water authority employee of 10 years' standing. I ask him how it is possible to measure that degree of fluoridation in a reservoir, or in the water supply at the outset, when there is a drought? Recently reservoirs in Wales dropped to 10 per cent. of their normal capacity, and there would have been great difficulty in measuring the degree of fluoridation in such a position.

Mr. John Patten: The Department of the Environment regularly checks the fluoride levels in reservoirs. I am advised that there is no danger whatever of adverse levels of fluoride creeping into water supplies either during a drought or at any other time.

Mr. Powell: That might be what the Minister says, but it is not my information from chemists within the water industry. There is great difficulty in ensuring that that can be done. The consumers will never have the guarantee that that will be the level of fluoride in the water that will come out of their taps. There are a number of reasons for that, and the matter needs further investigation.

The Bill suggests that no additional public expenditure will be involved. If we add a substance to a water supply, who pays for it? Will it come from public expenditure? If it comes from the water authority budget, that is obviously public expenditure.

The decision whether fluoride should be added to the water supply will be made either by the health authority or by the water authority. I have listened to a number of speeches, especially those of the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), the hon. Member for Ynys Môn and my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams). Most Conservative Members were opposed to quangos when the Government took power in 1979. Indeed, in 1979 the area health authorities and the water authority in Wales were far more democratic than they are today. Elected representatives of local authorities served on both bodies in 1979, but some of those positions have now been filled by appointments made by the Secretary of State for Wales. Therefore, it is not elected bodies that are making decisions. The hon. and learned Member for Burton covered a number of points when he asked how many elected councils—borough, district and county—that have opposed the adding of fluoride to the water supply have been overruled by quangos.

I shall vote against the Bill primarily because, as other hon. Members have said, it is the basic individual right of the individual, and the public in general, to determine whether or not to have fluoride in his water. Therefore, all hon. Members should be going into the No Lobby, to show the Government quite forcefully that we have no intention of allowing this measure to be passed.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I have to tell my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) that I for one will not be going into the No Lobby, because I support this limited measure.

I start by declaring an interest—I do not like going to the dentist. I never did like going to the dentist, and I do not wish the pain and suffering of going to the dentist on anyone else and, above all, on children. I am firmly of the opinion that a vote for this Bill is a vote against a child's toothache. Those hon. Members who wish to vote against it should bear that in mind.

Some hon. Members came to the debate late and said that they had not heard arguments that fluoride in water does helpfully affect children's teeth. If they had listened to the Minister, to my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), or to other right hon. and hon. Members at the beginning of the debate, they would have heard a vast and adequate array of information, which should have convinced anyone who was prepared to be convinced. Although I may be tedious, I have no intention of being repetitious, and I shall not go through points that were made at the beginning of the debate. Those points are wholly convincing, and the evidence from a place as close as Birmingham is especially convincing to me and to anyone who looks objectively at the evidence. There have been massive improvements in the health of children in Birmingham, directly and only as a result of the introduction of fluoride into the water in and around that city. Those who spoke earlier showed that in the quantities proposed, fluoride is not injurious to anyone's health.

Fluoride, it has been said, is available from other sources. It can be applied by a dental technician or a toothbrush. It can be provided by tablets, as waved at us by the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth). I note from the Times parliamentary guide that he is listed as an international banker. The well-off and well-informed international bankers of this world may have the information to lead them to give the tablets to their children to make them free from dental caries. The hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood, and every other hon. Member, has an obligation to the children of the worse-off, and worse-informed, who are likely to get fluoride only through the water system. My hon. Friends should bear in mind the condition of the teeth of the worst-off in their constituencies before they vote against this limited measure.

Mr. McGuire: Is my hon. Friend seriously suggesting that if fluoride is added to water, those poorly off children can forget about dental hygiene—[Interruption.] I am asking my hon. Friend whether he believes that there is any benefit in neglecting dental hygiene.

Mr. Pavitt: It is a first step.

Mr. Dobson: For a start, if during pregnancy their mothers drink water with fluoride added to it, their milk teeth will be in a better condition. There is no other way of getting that fluoride into the system. Secondly, we all know — even my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McGuire) knows—that the worse-off and the worst-informed members of the community have most difficulty in developing eating and cleansing regimes properly to look after their teeth. We must bear that in mind when we discuss this matter.

Some people believe that this is a trivial matter, and that because dental caries does not kill people outright—I understand that it can indirectly lead to death—it is not worth the candle. However, some hon. Members would jib even at the idea put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller): that if we discovered an element that was completely safe, and that prevented heart disease or cancer, we should put it in the water. Some hon. Members might change their minds if they heard of such an element, but others would still say that it represented terrible, compulsory mass medication.

Other hon. Members have talked about this being an invasion of civil liberties. I do not have the document with me, but I can refer hon. Members to it and they can look it up later: in the city records of Nottingham we discover that the self-same arguments that have been mounted tonight against the introduction of limited quantities of fluoride in water were used by the semi-elected lord mayor and several aldermen in the 19th century, when the first medical officer of health said that we needed a decent clean water supply to get rid of typhoid and cholera. Those people talked about it being an invasion of people's rights to provide them with something that would stop them getting sick, but it was a step forward from which we have all benefited.

Most Conservative Members would bow to the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) as an ardent champion of civil liberties from a Right-wing point of view. They were rather disappointed when he, in his prophetic mood and reminiscent vein, rose tonight. I wish to reply in kind. The prophet arose and his erstwhile admirers flocked to hear him speak, but they were cast down and sorely disappointed, for verily did he speak in favour of fluoride and made it clear that he intended to pass by on the other side. The right hon. Member for South Down did confess that he was the Minister for Health who helped introduce artificial fluoride into water; he said that he was pleased that he had done it, and he believed it to be justified. That at least is clearly not a matter that he does not wish to be revealed by the operation of the 30-year rule on Government documents.

We have also heard the argument that there is no choice for those who drink water that has had fluoride introduced into it. But in the past, as part of the system of preventive medicine, we have given people no choice. There used to be no choice with some vaccinations. It was decided, rightly, under the powers given by the House, that some diseases could be eradicated only if vaccination were compulsory. Those schemes were successful. Contrary to what was suggested by some Conservative Members, that was not done only to provide protection for the person who was vaccinated. It was also intended to ensure that he or she did not pass on a disease to someone else. Some Conservative Members have claimed that we have had no system of preventive medicine in which there was no element of choice. That has happened; society has insisted that it was right to protect everyone by compulsory vaccination.

None of the opponents of the Bill can deny that a legion of chemicals are introduced into the water supply to make it clean and to stop the water making people sick. All that we are saying is that dental caries will be coped with if limited quantities of fluoride are put in the water.

I support one aspect of the civil libertarian case. I object to the idea of someone in authority introducing a substance into the water supply without public consultation or knowledge. It would be useful if the Government agreed to accept amendments in Committee to provide that if a health authority wished to recommend to its water authority that fluoridation should be introduced, that health authority's debate should take place in public and that the same should apply to water authorities.

Mr. Best: If the Government do not do that, will the hon. Gentleman vote against the Bill?

Mr. Dobson: No. If Conservative Members are so worried about that aspect of water authorities' activities, I hope that they will vote for the Water Authorities (Meetings) Bill which has been introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham).

The Bill before us is a limited measure. Many people strongly believe in extending preventive medicine and think that the law should not merely be declared to be what everyone has thought it to be, but should be changed so that if a health authority asks a water authority to put fluoride in the water supply, the water authority should be compelled to comply.

The Bill does not go that far. It simply reasserts what everyone has thought to be the law. If it is not approved, areas such as Birmingham, where people are already benefiting from the introduction of limited quantities of fluoride, will no longer enjoy that benefit. I hope that most of my hon. Friends will join me in voting for the Bill.

12.8 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): We have had a long and interesting debate, which Ministers from the DHSS, the Scottish Office, the Welsh Office and the Department of the Environment have followed carefully.

Three threads have run through the debate — the benefits or otherwise to dental health of adding fluoride to the water supply, the safety of adding that mineral to the water supply and the important issues of personal freedom and liberty. I do not underestimate the strength of feeling of many of my hon. Friends on those issues.

I have noted with care what was said by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn), my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southport (Sir I. Percival) and my hon. Friends the Members for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best), for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop), for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) and for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh), though I doubt whether I shall be able to answer all 10 of the points put by my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle.

Last but not least I must mention the points so powerfully made in support of the arguments of personal liberty by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), who is a powerful advocate of the case against the sort of addition to the water supply that the Bill attempts to establish.

But just as I appreciate the arguments with which I do not agree, I welcome the support given to the Bill by right hon. and hon. Members from all parties, with the exception, I believe, of the SDP whose voice we have not heard. We had detailed support from the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), who wound back the clock and told us what made him, as a former Minister for Health, decide in favour of this form of addition to the water supply despite his deeply held views about the doctrines of personal liberty. I also welcome the support given by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Sir J. Page), and by the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) on behalf of the Liberal party—that party also seems to have a free vote tonight—as well as by my hon. Friends the Members for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) and for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) and by the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt).

In my brief concluding remarks, I shall deal with each argument in turn. I have not heard any hon. Member advance any argument tonight that would lead me to move one jot or iota from giving my full support to what my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister said in advancing the powerful case in support of dental health. It would be otiose to repeat the arguments that he has already put so well. Those arguments have received support from the hon. Members for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) and for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). I just hope that the general management committee in the constituency of the hon. Member for Oldham, West does not read Hansard and see that he is commended and supported by the right hon. Member for South Down. I do not know how well that would go down in Oldham, West.

I do not quite know what the oft-quoted Lord Jauncey would make of all the ways in which gobbits and bits of his opinions have been used by right hon. and hon. Members, sometimes in favour and sometimes against the Bill. But one fear consistently underlying the debate on dental health was that somehow the addition of fluoride to water—whatever benefits it might have—would lead to dental mottling. In his judgment after the longest legal case in Scottish history lasting 201 days, the learned judge said:

"there is likely to be a very small increase in the prevalence of mottling of a type which will only be noticeable at very close quarters and which is very unlikely to create any aesthetic problems for the owners of the teeth."

The learned judge was absolutely right in his judgment.

I come to the important issue of safety. Again, I stand four square behind everything that my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister had to say. The whole scientific community constantly and rightly keeps any additions to our diet or water supply, and any forms of new or old drugs that are available on the market, under surveillance. Any scientist worth his salt would move very fast to publish any damning evidence that shed light on the safety, or lack of it, of any substance freely available on the NHS, or available privately. No such evidence has been forthcoming from any quarter in this country or abroad.

However, my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn asked several detailed points, to which I shall respond. He said that Lord Jauncey had suggested in his judgment that perhaps fluoride should fall within the ambit of the Medicines Act 1968. Lord Jauncey did not accept that supply without a products licence would be in breach of the Medicines Act and rejected that part of the petitioner's case based on alleged contravention of the Act. That is made clear in his summing-up.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn also referred to the indemnity of water authority employees if safety is challenged. The indemnity offered in respect of alleged harm to health is primarily to assist water authorities, which cannot be expected to judge safety issues. That is a health question and the offer of indemnity is a clear example of the Government being prepared to put their money where their mouth is.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The Minister made an odd statement when he said that the safety aspects cannot be left to the water undertakers but must be dealt with by the health authorities. Does he recognise that the addition of fluoride to the water supply is done by water authorities at many separate sites, some of them small and unmanned and which are monitored only from time to time? Surely water authorities and statutory undertakers have a heavy responsibility. If the Minister says otherwise he will seriously mislead them.

Mr. Patten: I wish that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) had been here earlier to hear the whole argument. I gave way only to ensure that he votes with the Government this evening. The health authority is responsible for deciding whether the addition of fluoride to water is in the public interest. That is the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question.

Safety issues have been tested in courts of first resort, middle resort and last resort round the globe. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton discussed three cases of judges ruling against the safety of fluoride in the United States. None of the cases were in courts of last resort. No court of last resort in the United States has ruled against fluoride. The issue has been taken to the Supreme Court eight times and on each occasion the safety of fluoride has been advocated by the judges involved.

On safety grounds, as on the benefits to dental health, the Government's case is sound and has been carefully composed. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I would be the first to come forward if there were any doubts at all about safety.

I had doubts about the safety of fluoride in the 1970s. —[Interruption.] I think that I have been caught by the 10-year rule. That remark has caused interest among my hon. Friends, so perhaps I should attempt to explain. In the 1970s a report by the Royal College of Physicians exonerated the addition of fluoride to the water supply. I accepted that. Shortly after, the work of Burk and others cast substantial doubt on the safety of fluoride. I was very worried at the time, as were many of my right hon. and hon. Friends. I had my doubts on safety grounds. In the 1980s those doubts were laid to rest by subsequent scientific evidence. After careful consideration of the evidence on safety no hon. Member could conceivably feel that there is any genuine scientific doubt on the safety of fluoride.

That leads me to the third, the last and the most important issue that is being considered tonight, and that is freedom of choice. In that context it is important to understand that in artificially adding fluoride to the water supply we are in no way introducing a substance which is otherwise alien to us. That is the underlying factor which makes any argument against fluoride based on freedom of choice almost impossible to substantiate.

First, freedom can be seen not to be contravened when we consider that fluoride is widely and naturally present in the human diet. It occurs at particularly high levels in tea. Indeed, as has been said, a heavy tea drinker in a fluoridated area will ingest far more fluoride from his tea than he ever will from the water.

Secondly, almost every toothpaste that is on the market today contains a substantial amount of fluoride at the proper safety level and some 95 per cent. of all toothpastes that are marketed and used, I dare say, by most hon. Members, contain fluoride.

Thirdly, fluoride is naturally present in almost every water supply around the globe. In the United States it exists at levels of up to 13·6 mg per litre, in the United Kingdom, in the West Mercia water area, it exists at levels of up to 5·8 mg per litre; in Austria at up to 5·3 mg; in Italy at up to 3 mg, and so on.

Mr. Lawrence rose——

Mr. Patten: I am sorry, but my hon. and learned Friend was not able to give way to me and I am afraid that I do not have the time to give way now in attempting to wind up the debate.

We must also be wary of assuming that drinking water supplies that are not fluoridated do not have other additives. In his opinion Lord Jauncey said:

"There are some 18 different chemicals which are added to different supplies in Strathclyde and whose purpose is to achieve purity."

That helps put the argument on the addition of fluoride into perspective. Governments approve the addition of additives to a range of foodstuffs, whether it be iodine to salt or vitamins to bread. Once one looks at the number of areas in which, with Government and all-party support things are added to our diet and drinks, it is difficult on pragmatic logic to separate out fluoride from any of those other additions.

Mr. Fairbairn: All the other substances named by Lord Jauncey in his judgment are intended to help the person who ingests them. Fluoride is added not to help the person who ingests it but others. My hon. Friend has said that the Government's purpose is to advise on what is good and what is not, not to make it compulsory. Why has he changed his mind on fluoride?

Mr. Patten: I have explained that.

In order to try to erect some form of suitable philosophical background for what I have had to say I reread my distinguished constituent Sir Isaiah Berlin's important work "Two Concepts of Liberty". I came to the House tonight with an argument erected on that important book, but unfortunately my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) told me that Sir Isaiah has recently remarketed his book and increased the number of concepts of liberty from two to four. That was inconvenient from the point of view of anyone suggesting an argument based on concepts of liberty about what we do and do not consume for which it is impossible—I am trying to answer the comments made soto voce by my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn—to lay down a hard and fast barrier beyond which one cannot go before personal liberties are themselves transcended.

I simply cannot find in my mind any line to suit all places, all circumstances, all situations at all times and say, "If I cross that line, personal liberties are transcended. If I do not cross it, everything is all right." In the end one must make a judgment on the facts and evidence.

I recognise that there will always be those who genuinely feel that water fluoridation constitutes mass medication and, as such, should not be permitted. Set against that, it is the view of the Government that it is for the responsible bodies which take decisions locally to weigh any alleged interference with the liberty of the individual against the undoubted benefits which we believe future generations will gain in their dental health as a result of water fluoridation.

As with any decision which is taken on a community basis, there will inevitably be those who are disappointed whichever way the local decision goes. Nevertheless, in this strictly limited Bill we are doing no more than restoring the situation to what we understood it to be in Britain before the judgment delivered by Lord Jauncey in the Scottish courts.

As has been stressed, this is a short measure designed to give the responsible authorities the legal power to choose, if they wish, to improve dental health by the fluoridation of water supplies. Nothing new — no compulsion—is introduced by the Bill.

I hope that the House will agree, not least in view of the authoritative evidence we have heard on the safety and efficacy of fluoridation, that this choice should continue to be open to health and water authorities on the basis that has been in operation for the last 30 years.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Bill committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

National Heritage (Scotland) Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 1

SCOTTISH MUSEUM OF INDUSTRY

'There shall be a Board to be known as the Board of Trustees of the Scottish Museum of Industry which shall be appointed by the Secretary of State to establish a Museum of Industry.'.—[Mr. Craigen.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

12.39 am

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 16, in line 5, after 'Edinburgh', insert

'to establish a Board of Trustees of the Scottish Museum of Industry.'.

Mr. Craigen: It is unfortunate that the House must deal with the report stage at such an early hour of the morning, especially as we have had a hard day with the Trustee Savings Banks Bill and the Water (Fluoridation) Bill. However, we are still here.

New clause 1 relates to the establishment of a Scottish museum of industry. As the Minister knows, we did not have an opportunity in Committee properly to air this issue, although the concept of such a museum was frequently raised. We found it necessary to table the new clause because of the Government's disingenuous approach. There had been every sign that the Government fully supported the concept of establishing a museum of industry, even to the extent of the Secretary of State being on record as saying that it was in an exciting prospect. Therefore, I expected the Minister to be more positive when he replied to the Second Reading debate. Unfortunately, we were not shown how, when or where the Government planned such a museum.

The Williams report, "A Heritage for Scotland", was never debated in the House, although there was a debate in another place on 27 January 1982. Otherwise, we have had to rely on a series of written parliamentary answers from the Secretary of State. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) has been particularly diligent in pursuing these matters. The written answer he received on 22 July 1982 made no specific mention of the proposal for a museum of industry, but by 8 December 1983 the Secretary of State said that he was seeking advice on the matter.

The concept of a museum of industry for Scotland is an exciting prospect. As that was the Secretary of State's view, I was surprised on Second Reading when in reply the Under-Secretary gave the impression that the Government had changed and, indeed, positively deserted their position on the matter

In Committee we spoke about the possibility of a free-standing museum, as envisaged by the Williams committee in its report. Dr. Alwyn Williams wrote to me on 26 November 1984:

"I hope that there will be no let up in the pressure for a Museum of Industry in the West of Scotland. The image of the City of Glasgow and the Clydeside conurbation in general has been transformed even since my return in 1976. The momentum which is now compelling the rest of the world to recognise the city as a cultural centre of international standing must not be lost."

[Mr. Craigen]

Given that we are dealing with the National Heritage (Scotland) Bill, the Government should not lose sight of the recommendations of the Williams report.

If the museum of industry is to be subsumed into the new structure of the museum of Scotland, some of us fear that it may get short shrift, because the new board of trustees, unless there is a clear Government commitment, may have certain biases towards the totality of existing institutions. Ministers should make clear what they envisage by the concept of a museum of industry since, as I have said earlier, the Secretary of State found it a particularly exciting prospect.

New clause 1 is a probing clause, because it is essential at this stage for the Government to give some answers that were not given in Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) in particular tried to put a price tag on the capital cost of a museum of industry, and I think his figure was about £20 million. The Minister did not contradict him in Committee but, although I requested it, the Minister was not able to produce his own calculation.

We are dealing with a matter of principle and I want a simple yes or no from the Minister. Do the Government still believe in a museum of industry for Scotland? If the Minister says no, is he going to bury the idea in the same way as he has been burying so much of the living industry of Scotland? If he still feels that there should be a museum of industry, what vibrations is he getting from the committee under Lord Bute, and what instructions will he give the new board of trustees when it is set up?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan Stewart): I am grateful to the Hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) for giving the House the opportunity to consider this topic tonight. As he rightly said, the new clause would have the effect of setting up a free-standing board of trustees to establish a Scottish museum of industry. As he has again rightly said, that is broadly in line with what was recommended by the Williams committee. But as I explained in Committee—I thought I had made the position clear—in principle, that essential proposal runs counter to the present general thinking on the subject in museum circles. Some of that thinking was referred to by other hon. Members. It is thinking which has the endorsement of the bodies which have been consulted during the last year or so, including the Scottish Museums Council and its industrial museums advisory board.

A consensus is now emerging that the concept of a museum of industry cannot and should not be separated from that of a museum of Scotland. The story of the growth of industry in Scotland is an integral part of the general story of Scotland's history. Therefore, it is now thought to be much more appropriate to set it in its proper place in developing the museum of Scotland concept. Exactly how that is to be developed is still under discussion, but I can tell the hon. Member for Maryhill that one suggested approach is that certain core disciplines could be built up within the national museums, largely on the basis of material that they already hold, which might then point interested visitors in the direction of more specialised displays and collections in a number of venues throughout Scotland. In Committee, the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) rightly referred to several other venues in Aberdeen and Bathgate that are important in this context.

Certain developments of that type are already in being or planned. It might be one of the tasks for the new board of trustees of the national museums and of its staff to encourage the development of such specialised displays in several key centres.

The hon. Member for Maryhill asked me what the up-to-date position is. It is one of the issues to which the advisory board is giving a great deal of thought. It has already had the benefit of two major papers from Dr. Neil Cossons, the director of the national maritime museum in London and former director of the Ironbridge museum trust. The advisory board will be recommending the direction in which the national museums policy might be channelled in that area.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): The Minister has mentioned an ominous name. Dr. Cossons is the first man to have followed the lead of the Government in instituting charges at Greenwich. The hon. Gentleman is not going to rely too much on his advice, is he?

Mr. Stewart: I recall that in Committee the hon. Member for Linlithgow — I am sure that he will intervene if I am misquoting him—paid a considerable tribute to Dr. Cossons' expertise in that area. He is widely respected.

I have no doubt that the board will take careful note of the keen interest that has been expressed by hon. Members in the direction of such developments.

The hon. Member for Maryhill asked me about resources. He will know that before the board reports we cannot say precisely what resources the new structure will require. However, I hope that hon. Members will be reassured, because resources came up in Committee, by the decisions made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and announced to the House about the provision for the museums in 1985-86. My right hon. Friend announced an increase in the net provision for the two museums of 12 per cent.—an extra £700,000—through the Property Services Agency for the fabric of the museums, and an increase in the grant for the Scottish Museums Council of 41 per cent. At a time when public expenditure is rightly under restraint, those figures are a clear sign of the Government's commitment to our national museums. I hope that my explanation of the present position has been helpful to the House.

Mr. Craigen: It seems that in a most tortuous way the Minister has shown that he has gone cold on the whole issue of a museum of industry. I confirm that my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and I were at one over the prospect of a core museum with strong links with localities, industries and communities. A network depicting the industrial heritage of Scotland could have been developed.

I am worried about the Minister's reply. He told us that the decision would be left to Lord Bute and the unified board of trustees. Thus, he is effectively squeezing out the options that now they will not seek.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I thank the Minister for the three-page letter that he sent to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) and myself, because it was very helpful.

So much depends on the resources that will be available to the local museums. I do not want to reiterate too much of what was said in Committee, but is it right or wrong to suggest that if there is to be a museum of industry as such, £20 million is a minimum figure? Given the public expenditure of any Government, surely that will have reverberating ramifications on the local museums, about which we rightly said so much. Since our discussions, my impression is more and more that museums, such as Aberdeen, with fishing specialities, are worried about their own resources. Perhaps the Minister will comment on that.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): In the absence of the new clause, where will this leave the fledgling Scottish mining museum recently opened at Prestongrange in my constituency and at the former Lady Victoria colliery at Newtongrange in Midlothian? Without some funding from the new authority what will happen to that museum, the Scottish fisheries museum and many others?

Mr. Allan Stewart: I should perhaps repeat the quotation rightly given in Committee by the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) in which the Scottish Museums Council states:

"We consider that a single-site, monolithic Museum of Industry in Scotland is neither a practicable, nor a desirable option."

I think that that view of the relationship between a museum of industry and the rest of the museum world is broadly accepted.

Perhaps I did not make it sufficiently clear to the hon. Member for Linlithgow in Committee that the idea that sums of the order of £20 million are readily available is clearly unrealistic. I hope that he will accept that the sums announced, ahead of the decisions by Lord Bute's committee, in respect of net grants to the national museums and the Scottish Museums Council for 1985-86 show the Government's interest in and concern for museums.

For the same reason, I cannot give a precise answer to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) in relation to the mining museum. I hope that the House will accept that until the advisory board has reached its conclusions and submitted its advice we cannot make decisions on a number of points of detail which are of interest to hon. Members.

Question put and negatived.

New Clause 2

ORDERS FOR ADMISSION CHARGES

'Where the Boards of Trustees of the National Museum of Scotland, the Royal Botanic Garden, Edinburgh and the National Galleries of Scotland intend to institute payment for admission they will require an Order made by Statutory Instrument and subject to affirmative resolution by both Houses of Parliament.'. —[Mr. Buchan.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Buchan: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Our discussion in Committee on this was merely exploratory. It may be useful to deploy the arguments at greater length and we make no apology for returning to the matter today. In Committee the Government argued, first, that there was nothing in the Bill to enforce changes and, secondly, that the power to make charges already existed if the museums chose to use it. That was buttressed by the argument that, democratically, it should be up to the trustees of the museums to impose charges if they so wished—giving them the kind of freedom that Scottish local authorities are supposed to have on matters other than fluoridation.

We challenge that argument because we do not believe that the trustees should make that decision. On the contrary, we regard it as a matter of supreme national policy for museums and galleries. We are reinforced in that view for two reasons. First, there is the financial squeeze on authorities in Scotland. I appreciate that it is less cataclysmic and less devastatingly mean than that imposed on English authorities this year, although no doubt it will be our turn next year. Nevertheless, we fear that the general squeeze will create conditions in which museums will be tempted to introduce charges to try to help their finances.

We are concerned, because the squeeze is occurring under this Prime Minister. It is largely forgotten that she was the first person to seek to introduce charges when she was Secretary of State for Education and Science in 1971. It is worth reminding ourselves of the attitude that she adopted then. She is fairly influential within the Cabinet, if we are to believe reports. When she was Secretary of State she introduced the enabling power to make charges and to put the power to charge beyond dispute. She quoted the White Paper and said that it was

"Legislation to enable the Trustees of the" various national museums to charge—

"The enabling nature of the legislation has been made clear throughout."

One or two of us pressed the right hon. Lady on that. I said, "Explain that." My hon. Friend the Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) said:

"Will the right hon. Lady make it clear"?

She said:

"That is quite clear. The Government require charges to be made."

Therefore, within two paragraphs enabling powers meant that the Government required charges to be made. I hope that I have made that quite clear. A little rattiness was creeping in. The right hon. Lady said:

"I understood that the trustees wanted an unequivocal statement. I believe that I have now given them what they want." —[Official Report, 21 June 1974; Vol 819, c. 1012-3.]

She gave them an instruction on charges.

Since the National museum and the galleries were wholly dependent for their expenditure on Government finance through the taxpayer, once the powers were complete the decision that charges should be made was the Government's. That is the Prime Minister's attitude. Therefore, we have reason to be anxious.

We are also anxious because we do not believe that the concept involved in admission charges for museums is good for the health of a civilised community. I know the jeux d'esprit of the Minister for the Arts. We went through this in committee when he said that there was more satisfaction and pleasure to be derived from payment for services rendered. As I pointed out then, it is the philosophy of the prostitute—one that should not be advocated for our young people.

In 1971 Paul Jennings wrote a little poem, when he said that the Government were attempting to equate cash with art. It was called the site of the National Gallery—and said:

"Lines Written in Despondency in Trafalgar Square"—

[Mr. Buchan]

"Oh God, a dreadful army comes,
Of foppish hardhats, po-faced bowlered bums
Whose mealy minds, whose souls of dust and ash
Chafe for the chance of turning art to cash."

That is the philosophy of the Government, and that is why we are opposed to it.

This matter has been discussed at great length in museums. I have with me reports of discussions at an international conference about charges in 1969. One speaker said:

"if one admits the state's obligation — through national, provincial or municipal channels—to educate the population, there seems no good reason for justifying the erection of an economic barrier precisely at the level where the masses are directly involved."

It is interesting that that was said by the director of the La Plata museum—Mario Teruggi—in Buenos Aires. The Argentine was well in advance of the rulers of this country.

There is another interesting historical fact. We were told in Committee that the proposal would have little or no effect on admissions. Some of us challenged that and said that it would certainly alter the nature of those admitted—the little snotty-nosed youngster from Partick would not find it easy to dive into a gallery. Even my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) was once — unbelievable as it is — a snotty-nosed youngster. Such youngsters will no longer get the chance to dash in to press buttons on machines, and trigger off an interest. The nature of the admissions will change. The casual visitor who will get excited about a particular subject will be stifled. Only the intentional visit will take place.

We have interesting evidence about other effects of charging. I have an article from the Museums Bulletin back in 1973 when good old Edinburgh council had five museums in its care, and abolished charges at the end of 1972 in four of the museums.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): I was on the council at the time.

Mr. Buchan: Good. The four museums were Lady Stair's house, Huntly house museum, Canongate tolbooth and Lauriston castle.

Mr. Foulkes: And the Museum of Childhood.

Mr. Buchan: No, there was an intractable problem that year with the Museum of Childhood, which was privately owned, but later the charges were abolished, as my hon. Friend says.

In those four museums, the following things happened. In February 1972, Lady Stair's house had 263 admissions. After the abolition of charges, it had 898 admissions in February 1973. In May 1972 Lady Stair's had 972 visitors, and in May 1973, 2,800 — three times as many. A similar thing happened with the Huntly house museum. In May 1972, it had 1,200 visitors, and in May 1973 4,600 — nearly four times as many visitors. Canongate tolbooth had 758 visitors in May 1972, and 3,300 in May 1973 — again, nearly four times as many. Lauriston castle had 340 visitors in May 1972, and 1,309 in May 1973—again nearly four times as many.

Therefore, admission charges change the nature of admissions and the number of visitors.

Mr. Foulkes: I do not think that my hon. Friend has made the political point that between 1972 and 1973 there was a major political change in the council and the Conservative, or, as it was called at the time, quite wrongly, the Progressive, majority, was replaced by a majority of Labour and, I must admit, Liberal members, and that is why the change took place.

Mr. Buchan: I thought that that was almost understood. It was from the Labour party—and in this case the Liberal party as well—that civilisation had to come.

We reject this move on practical, economic and, above all, on philosophical grounds. It would be shameful for Britain, which has led the way in this in the past, to go back not to Victorian ideas, because it was the Victorian philanthropists who left us so much, but to the pre-Victorian, primitive ideas. We are concerned because the Prime Minister has more regard for cash than for the arts, and therefore we have proposed the solution that if the charges are to be permitted, that can only be done on the say-so of the House. If the Government wish to remove all power from local authorities in this matter, let there at least be some parliamentary control. The power should be made only after the passing of an order by the House.

Mr. Allan Stewart: As always, I have listened with great respect to the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan). I fear that I cannot emulate his example in literary quotations, but I hope that I shall be able to reassure him about the Government's intentions. As he said, this debate follows a lengthy debate in Committee on a group of amendments tabled by Labour Members. Those amendments were designed to restrict the powers of the various boards to levy admission charges for entry to their collections. As I explained, and as the hon. Gentleman repeated tonight, those amendments failed to recognise that the reference to admission charges in the Bill in respect of the national museums and galleries was included merely for the avoidance of doubt. The powers for the boards to charge admission are contained in the Museum and Galleries Admission Charges Act 1972.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that Parliament should have the right to approve any proposal that admission charges be introduced at any of our national institutions, although, as he will know, recently charges for special exhibitions have been instituted without great controversy. It was to decide on such matters, which are principally for the institutions concerned, that we are establishing independent boards of trustees with wide-ranging expertise and flexibility. The 1972 Act, which gives those powers to the independent boards for the national museums, remained on the statute book, unamended, throughout the term of office of the Labour Government, so that the approach in the Act was clearly not then believed to be contrary to the policy that the hon. Gentleman's colleagues were following.

The hon. Gentleman's major point in raising this subject is to query the Government's view. I confirm that the Government's view has not changed. It is this: in respect of the museums and galleries, the boards of trustees should be free to decide for themselves whether charges should be introduced for entry to special exhibitions or to the permanent collections. I assure him that there is no intention to force institutions to introduce general admission charges. Secondly, as far as I am aware, no proposal for general admission charges is under consideration at any of the Scottish national institutions. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be reassured by those two points.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): In the spirit of Lib-Lab agreement, which undoubtedly influenced decisions in Edinburgh city council in 1972 or 1973, I lend my support to the new clause. The Minister maintained that the boards would be free to decide for themselves and that there would be no Government direction. Of course, it is well recognised that there need not be a direct order sent from the Scottish Office to the boards to impose charges. That can be done much more subtly. If the funding to those bodies is not adequate, they will be forced indirectly to impose charges. Any imposition of charges for the general exhibitions in museums, and even in the royal botanic gardens, which are much used by the citizens of Edinburgh and by visitors to the city, would be a retrograde step.

We live at a time when it is predicted that there will be ever-increasing leisure time for people to enjoy. One aspect of that leisure time that many will wish to develop is a greater interest in our heritage and culture, and at this stage we should not put barriers, especially pecuniary ones, in their way. Although such cultural excursions are no substitute for proper jobs, it must be said that, at a time of high unemployment, many people who are on the dole take the opportunity to visit our museums.

I believe that, for some time, London zoo has had great difficulty in financing itself, because it has not been able to attract the public and because it has admission charges. We are talking not about one person visiting the zoo, but about someone taking his wife and children. It becomes a special burden, on top of travelling expenses, to undertake such a cultural expedition. Therefore, it is only right that Parliament should have the chance to debate any decision to impose charges.

1.15 am

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): One of the advantages of having served on the Committee on a Bill is that one can be brief on Report.

However, it is worth reiterating that one reason why this matter was raised in Committee was that there was suspicion of what the Government may be up to. The Government may have no direct policy of coercion of trustees—whom they appoint—but it is apparent that after this year, when they have, admittedly, been generous to the Scottish museums, they can ensure that charges are made, simply by cutting the amount of money available —it is the rack principle which the Government operate on local government; a few turns of the screw will presumably do the trick when trustees are worried about how to make ends meet.

The SNP believes that it would be a retrogressive act if payments had to be made at the door of public collections. That would reduce the number of people who could visit those collections, and the figures quoted by the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) show what could happen if charges were introduced.

If the Government had a reputation for being liberal towards the arts, there would be no need for the debate. It stands to the eternal shame of the previous Labour Government that they did not alter the 1972 Act so that there could be no doubt. The present Government would have had to legislate to reintroduce charges and would thus have given the game away.

I hope that the Government do not intend to compel trustees to impose charges. If they are sincere in what they say, there is no reason why they should not accept the new clause, which would at least allow us to have another bite if the Government change their mind or compel the trustees to change their minds.

Mr. Craigen: I wish to be clear about the Government's stance. In Committee, the Minister said that charges were nothing to do with the Government. He said: "we would expect the trustees to discuss any proposals for charges with Ministers before the charges were introduced."—[Official Report, First Scottish Standing Committee, 11 December 1984; c. 57.]

All that we are saying is that we do not trust the Government in the present economic climate. We do not want Ministers to say to trustees on the quiet, "We want you to introduce charges to increase your own resources." Before Ministers agree to the imposition of charges or bring trustees round to the realisation that they may have to introduce general admission charges, the matter should be discussed by Parliament.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): The Opposition are making desperately heavy weather of the new clause. As one of the Ministers in charge of the 1972 Act, I know that all the legal issues were cleared in relation to the trusts, and in particular to the Vaughan Bequest. I hope that all Opposition Members will go to see that this month, free, in Edinburgh and that they will see the Turner watercolours.

We are talking about relatively few national galleries and museums compared with the enormous number of other museums in Scotland, some of which charge in accordance with their local authority's decision. Thus, I cannot see why the Opposition make such an issue about the national institutions. I was charged to go to see the exhibition on Ramsay MacDonald in Lossiemouth museum. I had to pay to see it, and it was an excellent exhibition. Indeed, it was much enhanced by a large section on the fishing industry.

There is nothing wrong in charging to see some of the exquisite works of art that our national exhibitions have. For an individually very small charge, an enormous sum could be provided collectively with which to enhance the standing of our facilities and exhibitions. It would be a great help to purchase and retain in Scotland some of the things that we would like to see on exhibition.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): The national galleries of Scotland in Edinburgh have 400,000 visitors a year, which is less than a third of the number who have visited the Burrell collection. Those visiting are not unemployed and do not come from Craigmillar but are, I regret to say, members of rather a restricted social class. They do not pay charges that they could afford, but the many people whom we should like see visiting them do not do so despite the absence of charging. Thus, I do not see why charging is said to be a deterrent.

Sir Hector Monro: I quite agree with my hon. and learned Friend. I hope that my last point will reinforce the view held by my hon. Friend the Minister. We look on Edinburgh as one of the great tourist attractions of Scotland. Hopefully, we can take a lot of money from the tourists who wish to see the exhibitions available. That money from overseas could go towards improving the facilities and adding to the collections.

[Sir Hector Monro]

All in all, the Opposition have made a very feeble case, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will stick to his guns.

Mr. Buchan: I shall be brief, but I should like to deal with a few canards. We have been asked why we are making such a meal of this issue, but the answer is that we are dealing with national museums. That is why the House must pay attention to it. Indeed, above all, this measure could be a trend-setter for other museums and galleries.

As it happens the local authorities have a pretty good record, including Glasgow's courageous decision — despite being financially squeezed by the Government— to open the Burrell gallery and to make it free.

Mr. Fairbairn: A collection is made.

Mr. Buchan: Money is indeed collected, and people generously pay without being asked, because they say that the exhibition is good and that they want to contribute to it. There is a world of difference between people who have entered and seen the exhibition freely, and who wish to contribute to it and——

Mr. Foulkes: Sock it too them, Norman.

Mr. Buchan: I shall try not to do that, because the time is late. The mentality and philosophy of Government Members cause me rue.

A terrible intervention was made by the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn). He said that 400,000 people a year visited the national gallery and that 1,200,000 visited the Burrell collection. That is three times as many. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the national gallery attracted a restricted social class. I like the language of Government Members. The truth is that the Burrell collection has succeeded from the beginning because it is seen as being popular in the best sense. It belongs to and emanates from the people of Glasgow and they have responded. If the hon. and learned Gentleman went there he would see that. Yes, the unemployed go there. Yes, families go there. People from a wide social class go there. If the hon. and learned Gentleman does not know that, he has no right to participate in the debate.

The hon. and learned Gentleman is right that that does not apply to the national gallery. That is because it has not succeeded in making contact with the people of Edinburgh. The new director clearly wishes to move in that direction. Because of its nature, the national gallery has never been deployed in the same way. It has been regarded as a repository rather than a collection. That is the reason.

All the nonsense about social class is merely an argument for making those who can afford it pay. Some argue that tourists should also be made to pay. Tourists come to Britain for two important reasons. Without tourism, Britain would be bankrupt. Only oil and tourism keep Britain afloat.

Americans are attracted to Britain because we speak English and because up to now our great national institutions and galleries have been free. That is where the income comes from.

Mr. Fairbairn: The hon. Member suggests that I have not seen the Burrell collection. That was intentionally offensive. None has been more anxious than I to see the Burrell collection properly housed. It was properly housed under this Government. The Burrell collection is popular for many reasons—one of which is that people can go there by bus. That is not possible if one wants to visit the national galleries and museums in Edinburgh. That is one of the problems.

Alas, only a restricted type of person cares to go to the galleries in Edinburgh. That has nothing to do with charges.

Mr. Buchan: Most of the hon. and learned Gentleman's points are rubbish. Buses pass the national gallery every day. It is only 200 yards from Waverley station. What is the man talking about? It is rubbish.

1.30 am

Mr. Allan Stewart: The debate has touched on several points and a variety of views have been expressed. I hope that we can all agree that the Burrell has been an outstanding success. In my view, it has been an outstanding success not only for the people of Glasgow and the surrounding area but in terms of its effectiveness as a tourist attraction.

As my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) rightly pointed out to the House, it has been opened under this Government and 50 per cet. of the capital cost was supplied by the Scottish Office. I hope that hon. Members will recognise that. The decision may have been made by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan), but the money to ensure that the museum was built was found by this Government.

I want to concentrate on the new clause. I think that the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) will accept that the new clause would mean that on each occasion that an institution wished to impose charges—for example, for a special exhibition—it would need an affirmative resolution of the House. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not wish such a restriction to be imposed, because it is widely accepted that when institutions incur extra costs to lay on special exhibitions it is reasonable that charges should be imposed to raise the necessary finance.

I end by reiterating the Government's position, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept it. There is no intention to compel institutions to introduce general admission charges—I think that that is the essence of his concern—and, as I said earlier, so far as I am aware no proposal for general admission charges is under consideration at any of the Scottish national institutions.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) asked me about the Government's role in all this. I simply reiterate what I said in Committee: that, while decisions are for the trustees, I would expect them to discuss any such proposals with the Department before implementing them.

Question put and negatived.

Clause 2

THE BOARD'S GENERAL FUNCTIONS

Mr. Allan Stewart: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 13, after 'agricultural', insert 'archaeological, artistic'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 8.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The two amendments implement undertakings that I gave in Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson) suggested that knowledge or experience of archaeological matters was a quality that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State should look for in appointing members of the new board, and I agreed to consider that suggestion. We were particularly impressed by his argument that the national museum of antiquities of Scotland is of "particular significance archaeologically". We have therefore agreed that it would be appropriate to include a specific reference in the schedule as a matter to which my right hon. Friend should have regard.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Should not the word "architectural" be inserted after "archaeological"? I was not a member of the Committee, but it may be that the Minister has implicitly subsumed matters architectural under the term "environmental". If not, surely architecture is as important a human activity as the others that are mentioned?

Mr. Stewart: If there had been an amendment to that effect, I would have considered it in detail, but in fact architecture is subsumed in the other terms in the clause.

We have gone further than my hon. Friend suggested and concluded that it would be appropriate for a reference to archaeology to be included in clause 2 as one of the matters about which the new board of trustees of the national museums of Scotland must promote public awareness.

In Committee, I listened to what Opposition Members said about the word "artistic" and, as the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) will recall, he agreed to withdraw an amendment that he had moved for the inclusion of "artistic" on my assurance that the Government would introduce an amendment. At that stage I said that the only thing wrong with his amendment was that it was inadvertently proposed for the wrong place in the Bill alphabetically.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 2, line 16, after 'means', insert

', including collaboration with other institutions'.

I suggest that it would be convenient for the House to discuss at the same time amendment No. 3, in page 2, line 18, at end insert—

'(f) form and maintain recognisable links with and provide advice and assistance to local museums and similar institutions throughout Scotland.'.

In Committee we had a lengthy discussion about the powers of the new board to collaborate with local museums and other similar institutions. I explained that the powers already in the clause were sufficient to permit this. However, having listened carefully to what hon. Members said, I am aware of the strength of feeling that the pastoral role which the national museums have traditionally played in relation to the other museums in Scotland should continue and develop. Accordingly, amendment No. 2 will make it clear that in promoting the public's awareness of the matters specified in subsection 1(d), the board may collaborate with other institutions.

The Government amendment goes further than simply local museums, and that is the key difference between our amendment and amendment No. 3, which stands in the names of Opposition Members. The Government amendment makes it clear that the board may come to arrangements with bodies such as the National Trust for Scotland. This is a more satisfactory approach than that embodied in the Opposition amendment, which would be more restrictive in that respect. I confirm that the Scottish Museums Council, the position of which was referred to by Opposition Members in Committee, is happy with the proposed Government amendment.

Mr. Buchan: We do not propose to press amendment No. 3. My hon. Friends and I welcome this major concession, which goes to the heart of much of the earlier debate on the Bill. The issue was at the heart of many of the representations made by the museum authorities, and I am glad that the Government have listened to reason. It shows that there is hope even for the wicked.

We should have preferred our amendment, which would have set out the matter more clearly; it would also have been alphabetically correct in adding a new subsection (1) (f). The word "collaboration" in the Government amendment might be considered to have slightly sinister implications, but I accept its use in the spirit in which it is intended.

I appreciate that the Government did not want to make too much of a surrender, and we do not object to that. The important point is that the amendment is being made. The Scottish Museums Council is satisfied. So am I. I said that the amendment would have to be made, and I am thankful for what is a reasonably large mercy.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): I thank the Minister for fulfilling completely the undertakings he gave in Committee with regard to the previous amendment.

The subject of this matter caused a number of amendments to be tabled in Committee by hon. Members on both sides, all of which were longer than that which the Minister has introduced tonight. I congratulate him on this amendment, which is short and succinct and covers the burden of the points we made in Committee.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 3

General powers of Board

Mr. Allan Stewart: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 3, line 19, at end insert—

'(5) Fellows of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland shall be entitled to free access to the library of the National Museums at such times as the Board may reasonably determine.'.

This is another point that was raised in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson), who expressed concern about the need to recognise the special contribution that the Society of Antiquaries had made to the growth of the National Museum of Antiquities.

I agree that this historic relationship, to which hon. Members referred in Committee, should continue to be recognised by conferring on fellows of the society the right to make use of the library which it formed and which is at present housed in the Queen street building. That is one of the specifics that the society and its supporters have sought. My hon. Friend will recall that I advised him in Committee that his amendment was slightly defective. However, the Government's amendment meets his point and I hope that it will have the support of the House.

Mr. Craigen: I acknowledge that we are indebted to the hon. Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson).

[Mr. Craigen]

Since Committee, I have received a number of letters from members of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, and several of my hon. Friends, including my hon. Friends the Members for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) and for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) have sent me letters that they have received, as if I did not have enough of my own. It is apparent that there was a lack of consultation with the society before the preparation of the Bill.

I received a letter from Mr. P. R. Ritchie, a fellow and past vice-president of the society. I replied to the effect that I would have thought that the Scottish Education Department would have adequately consulted the society before the Bill was published. Only this morning I received a reply from Mr. Ritchie, in which he states:

"The first intimation from the Scottish Education Department was contained in a letter only a week or so before the Bill was announced. The letter was confined to a notification that the Society would lose its representation on the new Board of Trustees of the National Museums of Scotland. Other provisions of the Bill were not known to the Society's officers until its publication on 9th November."

The letter concludes:

"The way in which the present situation has come about gives me no grounds for optimism concerning future facilities."

The Minister might at least acknowledge that there has been a singular lack of consultation with the society before the preparation of the Bill, which has undoubtedly generated many concerns.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The society was among the bodies which were consulted in 1982 on the paper which the Department circulated on whether there should be one trustee board or two to administer the national museums. The society's views were taken into account with others that we received before the Government reached their decisions on the issue.

Subsequently, the society was informed in the autumn of 1984 of the proposed contents of the Bill as they related to the constitution of the new trustee board for the national museums, the special point of interest to the society. Following correspondence with my officials, I wrote to the society's secretary to give a detailed explanation of our reasons for wanting a board constituted on the lines which have been drafted. In addition, the board of the National Museum of Antiquities (Scotland), on which the society has a number of representatives, was consulted in advance of the Bill's publication on the general substance of the Bill as it relates to the national museums.

It is true that the society is not in agreement with the proposals in one respect which the House will be considering shortly under another group of amendments. However, I assure the House that throughout the consideration which lies behind the Bill, and in preparing the Bill, care was taken to consult the society.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 1

The Boards

Mr. Wallace: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 22, line 24, leave out from 'of' to end of line 34 and insert:

'15 members (referred to in this part of this Schedule as "trustees").

(2) The trustees shall include the following persons:

The President of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland for the time being ex-officio.

One fellow of the Society of Antiquaries appointed by the Society.

One fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh appointed by the Society.

One person appointed by the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities.

Two persons appointed jointly by the Scottish Universities for their specialist interest in Scottish Archaeology and Scottish History.

Nine persons appointed by the Secretary of State as follows:

(i) One representing the Council of British Archaeology in Scotland,

(ii) Two representing schools in Scotland;

(iii) Six representing such other public interests as the Secretary of State may think fit.

(3) The Secretary of State shall appoint a person to be chairman of the Board and the Board shall appoint one of their members to be vice-chairman.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider the following amendments:

No. 9, in page 22, line 32, after 'matters', insert 'and of the interests of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland.'.

No. 10, in page 22, line 35, leave out sub-paragraph (4) and insert—

'(4) Trustees shall be appointed for a period of four years: after the second year of coming into operation half of the membership of the Board shall be reconstituted at intervals of two years.'.

Mr. Wallace: In many respects, amendment No. 7 follows on from amendment No. 5. The Under-Secretary of State recognised the great association of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland with the National Museum of Antiquities. That association is a reason why the amendment has been moved.

One of the Bill's principal functions is to combine the Royal Scottish Museum and the Museum of Antiquities into one museum controlled by a board of trustees. That combination was recommended by the Williams committee. As the Bill stands, the connection with the Society of Antiquaries would be lost because there would be no statutory provision to include any members of the society on the board of the trustees of the new museum. That is the principal reason why the amendment has been drafted.

1.45 am

To a large extent, the amendment reflects the composition of the board as it was constituted under the National Museum of Antiquities of Scotland Act 1954. This measure includes the Royal Scottish Museum which, until now, has been under the control of the Civil Service. The present provision gives the Secretary of State, who already has enormous powers of patronage in many respects in Scotland, power to appoint all trustees. There is no reason why that patronage should be as wide as provided for in the Government's proposals. We seek to limit that patronage by allowing certain members of the Society of Antiquaries to be members of the board of trustees. This provision still allows a certain amount of discretion to the Secretary of State to nominate nine of the 15 trustees.

The amendment will give a Scottish dimension to the board of trustees. As the Under-Secretary of State has recognised, there has been a long association between the Society of Antiquaries and the National Museum of Antiquities. This measure would parallel in many respects the provision for the National Library. In the 1920s, that library was gifted to the nation by the Faculty of Advocates. I declare an interest in this subject as a member of the Faculty of Advocates. The Bill provides for a continuing relationship between the Faculty of Advocates and the National Library. The faculty is well represented on the board of the National Library. The library of the National Museum of Antiquities was donated by the Scottish Society of Antiquaries, and that is why there should be a similiar relationship between that society and the new museum.

I look forward with interest to discovering the objection of the Under-Secretary of State to curbing the patronage of the Secretary of State. I understand that one reason for the objection is that this action reflects English practice at the Victoria and Albert museum. I do not believe that that is a good reason why we should merely copy English practice.

I am led to believe that the Department has said that, in view of the wide range of interests inevitably covered by the new board of trustees, difficulties might arise in deciding between the numerous organisations invited to submit nominations to the board. It has been said that, on balance, Ministers should not be advised by Parliament in determining which body should be represented. I cannot agree. The bodies mentioned in the amendment have a direct interest in the museum. It is not unreasonable for Parliament to stipulate that that interest should continue. Those bodies would be able to contribute to the long-term well-being of the new museum.

Sir Hector Monro: I oppose the amendment because, although it is tabled with the best intentions, it does not help the Minister to achieve the best balance in the new board of the museum. To limit the Minister's choice to six of the 15 would be extremely restrictive. All hon. Members who have served in government know that one of a Minister's most difficult jobs is the appointment of major and important boards and the achievement of the right blend of appointees to work harmoniously together, who have, if possible, a specific interest in and knowledge of the subject that they have been appointed to assist. If one restricts the number available to the Minister, that blend will be hard to find.

Like the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), I have received many letters from members of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, who are keen to ensure that they will be fairly represented. The Minister is right to keep all his cards on the table. I am prepared to bet that some members of the society will be appointed to the board, but it is right that we should leave the provision as it is.

One of the outstations of the Royal Scottish museum is the aircraft museum at East Fortune. Would one therefore suggest that we should have an aircraft engineer or a pilot on the board? Should we have someone from Wigtownshire to look after the botanic garden outstation at Logan Gardens?

It is important that the Minister should have the maximum freedom of choice. I am confident that, from the immense wealth of experience in Scotland, he will appoint the right board.

Mr. Wilson: The hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) is far too generous and unsuspicious of the Minister and his Department. In Committee, I raised the matter of the vagueness of the criteria by which trustees were to be appointed. It is almost entirely at the discretion of the Minister. The point was raised, especially regarding the National Museum of Antiquities of Scotland, that there was no requirement for appointed trustees to have specific or even general knowledge of Scotland. It is patently obvious that if we adopt the selection of people mentioned in the amendment, there will be people with a genuine interest in Scottish history and the development of the museums. Indeed, the range is wide.

To develop a more general argument, one of the least attractive features of modern society is that the patronage of the Secretary of State has been built up and now extends into a wide area. We know that the Secretary of State may have the final decision, but he does not trawl for people who might fit the bill. His ministerial discretion is frequently exercised with a rubber stamp. The decisions about who is suitable are, broadly speaking, taken by civil servants. It is wrong that the Secretary of State, the omnipotent Pooh-Bah of the Scottish Office, should have such a wide range of different posts to fill.

Earlier the Government were keen to abolish quangos, but that seems to have petered out. It appears that they are still interested in making appointments wherever they can, as a sort of extension of their influence and power. I do not share the confidence of the hon. Member for Dumfries in the ability of Secretaries of State to choose. It is right for us here and now to stipulate certain categories of person who could fill the job. Therefore, I warmly support the amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), because it fulfils in a more specific way the more general approach that I adopted in an amendment in Committee.

Mr. Buchan: I hope that the Opposition's amendment No. 9 will be accepted, because it goes part of the same way that we are discussing in this group of amendments. It would at least write in the name of the body concerned, if the Government will not go further in regard to trusteeship as suggested by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace). It would be a modest declaration of the position. I hope that the Minister will not tell us that it is unnecessary. We cannot trust future Governments any more than we can trust the present Government, and it would be useful to have the provision written into the Bill.

We have also considered the nature of the operations of the trustees. We have tried to simplify the provisions. We had a long and difficult period trying to get the Government to see sense in regard to another institution, the national library. We recognised that, in the unlikely event of the Government giving proper time for debate on a Bill of this importance, it would be difficult to have a proper discussion of it. By putting on the debate late at night the Government have disguised some of their own iniquities and made it more difficult for the complete case to be deployed. It is a great pity that an important Scottish Bill of this kind should be taken after midnight rather than in the full light of day, when proper care and attention could be given to it. It was with that expectation of the behaviour of the Government that we tabled this modest amendment.

The main purpose of our amendment No. 10 is to refer to the nature of the trusteeship and to say that we would want to achieve certain elements of continuity, rather than having a continual turnover. The interesting aspect is the comparison between the schedule, which determines the trusteeship of the museums, and the clause, which determines the board and the trusteeship of the national library.

It cannot make sense that one major national institution should be appointed entirely by the Secretary of State and that another one should be appointed on the say-so of a number of listed bodies. What is good for one should be good for the other. In one case almost as many people are appointed by the advocates of Scotland as there are appointed in the other case by the Secretary of State for Scotland. If the Secretary of State appoints nine trustees, that is almost the same as the seven or eight that the advocates have in their gift. That cannot make sense. One or the other must be wrong and I hope that their Lordships, when they look at it, will refuse to have such an intellectual inconsistency in the Bill.

The listing of the trustees in clause 17, the other relevant clause, makes no sense of any kind. One can only regard it as an historical vestige that the advocates have a certain relationship with the origins of the library. We all accept that and would like to retain it. But if we are to have the form of list given in clause 17, the Secretary of State should adopt some relevant kind of list in the schedule in regard to the museums. I hope that attention will be paid to that aspect when the Bill goes to another place, so that the two provisions may be brought into some kind of harmony. There might then be an opportunity in the other place to have a more leisurely examination of the matters that were dealt with so summarily in Committee and here this evening.

It is interesting that, while care has been taken on behalf of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland—I do not object to that—and one or two of the obvious bodies such as the Royal Society of Edinburgh, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and the universities, the trade union and Labour movement of Scotland has not been brought in. The people who built the museums are not represented. Those who did the work, created our history and built those buildings are not mentioned. That is a stark contrast. We sought to mention all the groups in relation to the library; it could have been done in the amendment. We could have given that matter some consideration. Such slip-ups happen when there is such speedy action from the Government as we have in the Bill. That is another matter that will have to be considered in another place. If the amendment is accepted in this form, it will have to be changed further to be more reflective of the bulk of the people of Scotland, above all in the light of our concentration on the museum of industry.

While I respect the views of the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland, who has attempted to make sense and bring things into harmony, which we support, and although the amendment is an improvement on the Bill, in which only the Secretary of State has the say-so, the amendment will lead to further amendment in the other place.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) referred to the National Library. I should like to reiterate the point that I made in Committee. With regard to that board, we are dealing with an existing institution that appears to work satisfactorily, whereas in relation to the museums we are setting up a completely new board.

I understand the reasons for the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) and why he feels that bodies such as the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland and the Royal Society of Edinburgh should have a right of representation on the new board, but the points made by the hon. Member for Paisley, South showed the difficulty of agreeing a list of who should have the right of representation. My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Munro) rightly pointed to the advantages of having the maximum flexibility in arriving at decisions that will be in the interests of all aspects of the work of the national museums. It is right that trustees should be appointed for their individual contributions rather than for any particular interest that they might represent. The Bill as drafted lists a wide range of matters that the Secretary of State will be required to review when he considers the areas of expertise from which future trustees might be drawn.

Hon. Members referred in particular to the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland. They are right in recognising the special relationship that is traditionally enjoyed with the national museum. Nevertheless, having listened carefully to what has been said and read the representations that have been put to us, I believe that to include a reference to any one body or organisation, even one as closely associated as the society, would not, on balance, be sensible. It would imply that a particular outside body was entitled to be involved in the general decisions of the board.

I know that Lord Bute's advisory board, which is having further discussions with the society this week, will want to consider any other ways in which the society's long-standing interest in the work of the national museum, which is recognised on both sides of the House, can continue to be recognised in the future. I note what the hon. Member for Paisley, South said about possible debates in another place, but it would be wrong of me to speculate on their contents.

Mr. Wallace: I have listened carefully, but I am disappointed by the Minister's response. I accept that a new museum is being established, but one cannot simply ignore the history of the two bodies coming together to create it, especially the role of the Society of Antiquaries in providing the library of the national museum of antiquities.

The Minister said that he hoped to have particular regard to the ability and interests of those appointed to the board. As the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) has said, the National Library of Scotland has a whole list of people, including the Lord President of the Court of Session and the Minister of the High Kirk of Edinburgh. With all due respect to the current incumbents of those offices, there is no reason to suppose that their successors will have any special interest or ability with regard to books or libraries, but the Government seem to have ignored that inconsistency.

The hon. Member for Paisley, South suggested that the list should be extended to include representatives of the trade union movement on the new board. I have no objection in principle to that suggestion, which might also be discussed further in another place.

In view especially of the historical association of the Society of Antiquaries I hope that in the period between the Bill leaving this House and being discussed in another place the Government will think again on this.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment made: No. 8, in page 22, line 31, after 'agricultural', insert 'archaeological, artistic'. — [Mr. Allan Stewart.]

Mr. Allan Stewart: I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 23, line 39, leave out sub-paragraph (5) and insert—

'(5) Where a person becomes an employee of the Board in consequence of this paragraph, then, for the purposes of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, his period of employment in the civil service of the State or, as the case may be, for the purposes of the National Museum of Antiquities of Scotland, shall count as a period of employment by the Board, and the change of employment shall not break the continuity of the period of employment.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 12 to 15.

Mr. Stewart: This group of amendments follows the discussions on Second Reading and in Committee and is important in that it concerns the staff of the new institutions. I gave specific assurances to the Opposition about meeting with trade unions and I met the unions on 19 December. In the light of the exchanges at that meeting and what was said in earlier stages of the Bill, to avoid any further misunderstanding and in particular to ensure that the staff concerned know that we intend to protect their interests as far as is practicable, I have agreed to embody in the Bill the assurances that I gave on Second Reading —the so-called Chalmers assurances.

The Chalmers assurances provide that for any member of the Royal Scottish Museum who refuses an offer of employment from the new trustees a suitable post in the same grade in the Scottish Office would be sought, and that if that were unattainable the staff transfer unit of the Management and Personnel Office would be asked to seek such a post elsewhere in the Civil Service. Amendment No. 13 gives statutory backing to those assurances and has been welcomed by representatives of the staff concerned.

In addition to embodying those assurances in the Bill, the amendments remove certain other areas of possible doubt. Amendment No. 11 proposes the substitution of a new subparagraph (5) to paragraph 5 of schedule 1. That amendment, taken with amendment No. 12 to sub-paragraph (6), ensures that all staff presently employed for the purposes of the institutions comprising the national museums of Scotland and who accept the offer of employment from the trustees will have continuity of employment and any question of technical redundancy entitling anyone to a redundancy payment will be avoided.

Amendment No. 14 to subparagraph (7) ensures that not only staff who are civil servants but also those non-civil servants employed in the National Museum of Antiquities of Scotland will be entitled to appeal to an industrial tribunal if they think that the offer of employment which has been made to them by the board is on terms less favourable than those applying to them before the date of the offer.

I emphasise that none of these amendments implies any change in policy. The Government have always been firmly committed to the Chalmers assurances and it has always been our intention that the staffing provisions of schedule 1 should apply to all museums staff.

With regard to the staff of the National Museum of Antiquities of Scotland, in terms of the Chalmers assurances the Bill makes a distinction in favour of Royal Scottish Museum staff. I should perhaps explain why that is so.

Hon. Members will be aware that the Bill deals with two quite distinct groups of museum staff—there are Scottish Office staff at the RSM and those seconded to the NMAS. They are all civil servants. If they accept the offer of employment from the trustees, they will become non-civil servants. There are also the non-civil servants in the NMAS who are at present employed by a board of trustees, and who will not be changing their status. If they accept the offer of employment from the new board, they will merely change from being the employees of one board to being the employees of another.

The Chalmers assurances relate only to the first group of staff. That has always been understood. It was specifically stated in Mr. Chalmers' original letter and has always been repeated in those terms. On 10 January, however, at the meeting of the joint working party set up to consider the implications for museums staff of this Bill, the trade union side asked that consideration be given to extending the Chalmers assurances to appropriate staff of the NMAS — that is, staff certificated by the Civil Service Commission.

In fact, I fully expect all NMAS staff to accept employment with the new museums so that they can continue to develop their chosen specialties. However, I am sure that the House agrees that it is important that we do everything possible in the interests of good staff relations for the new structure. I am, therefore, prepared to meet the point made by the trade union side and to give an undertaking to NMAS staff that for any eligible NMAS staff who refuse an offer of employment, the Secretary of State will seek a post in the same grade in the Civil Service.

With that assurance, I hope that any remaining misunderstandings will be removed, that the staff concerned will feel fully reassured and that the House will be satisfied as to the Government's intention.

Amendment No. 15 gives the staff at the Royal Botanic Garden the same assurances as are given to the staff of the RSM. Since all the staff presently employed at the Royal Botanic Garden are civil servants, there is no need to make the other amendments.

I apologise for speaking at some length, but these are important matters. It is an important group of amendments. We wish to do everything possible to give the reassurances to the staff that I am sure the House will agree are correct.

Mr. Craigen: I am grateful to the Minister for giving such a full explanation of the amendments. He knows that I have expressed strong views about the way in which the issues came before the Scottish Grand Committee during Second Reading. Many of the issues should have been properly thrashed out before the Bill was even published.

I acknowledge that the Minister has gone some distance in reducing the concerns expressed by the three staff associations. There is still some uncertainty whether he has accepted some points in their entirety. There are some aspects upon which he might expand, and one relates to the NMAS. A group of curators and research staff are still a little apprehensive about the position. It would be useful to know just how active the staff transfer unit would be——

Mr. Henderson: I have heard some rumour about anxiety, but I suspect that it is about something with which we cannot deal in the Bill. Because of historical differences, there is a slight difference in grading and structure. As long as my hon. Friend the Minister draws that to the attention of the new board, that should be taken into account.

Mr. Craigen: Yes, I am hoping that these matters will be resolved by what the Minister has to tell us. However, I am sure that the hon. Member will agree that it was nonsensical that we had to discuss this matter on Second Reading and in Committee because normally, with transfer arrangements such as this, the whole business would have been cut and dried and ready for the approval of Parliament.

Schedule 1(6)(a) deals with a suitable alternative position in the Civil Service. It has been put to me that it would be reasonable to add on a phrase such as "or non-departmental body", as there might be people who would wish to, and could find a job with the other non-departmental bodies that have been established by the previous legislation relating to England.

2.15 am

Mr. Allan Stewart: I thank the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) for his reception of these amendments. I confirm that we are not changing Government policy, but the trade unions wished these assurances to be given legislative form. In essence, we have accepted that. I assure him that we do not expect any difficulties, and the trade unions do not expect many either.

The staff in the NMAS to whom the hon. Gentleman referred are not civil servants, but the union did not ask that these assurances should be given statutory form, and, given that the National Museum of Antiquities of Scotland staff are not civil servants, I am sure that the House will agree that this would not be suitable. The trade unions asked for an assurance on the record, and that is the assurance that I give the House tonight.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 12, in page 24, line 3, leave out

'in the civil service of the state'

and insert

'as mentioned in sub-paragraph (1)'.

No. 13, in page 24, line 13, at end insert—

'(6A) Without prejudice to sub-paragraph (6) above, where a person in the civil service of the State has unreasonably refused an offer made to him in pursuance of this paragraph, the Secretary of State shall not terminate that person's employment unless he has first had regard to the feasibility of employing him in a suitable alternative position in the civil service.

(6B) Where a person continues in employment in the civil service either—

(a) not having unreasonably refused an offer made to him in pursuance of this paragraph, or

(b) having been placed in a suitable alternative position as mentioned in sub-paragraph (6A) above, he shall be treated for all purposes as if the offer mentioned in sub-paragraph (1) had not been made.'.

No. 14, in page 24, line 17, leave out

'in the civil service of the State'

and insert

'immediately prior to the making of the offer mentioned in sub-paragraph (1)'.

No. 15, in page 28, line 40, at end insert—

Motion made, and Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 58 (Third Reading), and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

WELSH GRAND COMMITTEE

Ordered,

That, during the proceedings on the matter of Regional Policy as it affects Wales, the Welsh Grand Committee have leave to sit twice on the first day on which they shall meet; and that, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 67 (Meetings of standing committees), the second such sitting shall not commence before five o'clock nor continue after the Committee have considered the matter for two hours at the sitting.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Ex-Miners (Unemployment Pay)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

2.17 am

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): I am grateful, even at this late hour, to have the opportunity to bring to the notice of the Minister and the House the injustice that many unemployed ex-miners are experiencing, even though the problem has been pointed out to Ministers in the Departments of Energy and of Health and Social Security.

This problem applies to 400 or 500 ex-miners. I shall give an example of one man, which will show the problems for all such men. My constituent, Mr. A. J. Robinson, on 13 February 1984, along with 20 other miners at the Kellingley colliery, was interviewed by a representative of the National Coal Board. The men were offered terms, and encouraged to take redundancy. It was explained exactly what it would mean for them if they were to accept the NCB's offer. The terms included unemployment benefit, sickness benefit, mineworkers pension schemes, and so on. It also included a weekly income. They were issued with small pieces of paper, which I have with me, telling them what day they would be put on notice, what day their notice would expire, and much more information. They were also issued with a document showing what their lump sum payments and weekly incomes would be if they accepted the redundancy terms.

Arising from that information, those men, in good faith, accepted the redundancy terms. They were told on what date their notice would expire and on what date they would be expected to sign on at the unemployment office. When they attended the unemployment office, they were told that they did not qualify for unemployment benefit, because, since they had been put on notice, there had been a strike in parts of the coalfield.

When the men were interviewed, it was not pointed out to them that, if there was a strike, they would lose their entitlements. After receiving representations from Mr. Robinson, I wrote to the Minister then responsible for coalmining, the hon. Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw), now the Minister of State, Home Office, who replied to me in a letter that he was aware of the matter, recognised the injustice, and had decided to act to change the rules. He assured me that the Government and the National Coal Board were determined that men who took redundancy, and therefore helped the industry towards a better future, should receive generous redundancy pay. He said that neither had any desire to see such men penalised as a result of the strike. A similar assurance was given by the Secretary of State for Energy on 25 May in answer to a written question.

On 26 November, the Secretary of State, through the Under-Secretary of State for Energy, acknowledged the injustice and presented on to the House the draft Redundant Mineworkers and Concessionary Coal (Payments Schemes) Order 1984, which ended the link between the qualification for redundancy payments and unemployment benefit. Previously, if a man wished to qualify for redundancy payments, he had to qualify for unemployment benefit. As the order ended the linkage, the Department of Energy conceded that those men were no longer employed in the mining industry and were unemployed. The fact that they received weekly redundancy payments meant that they were unemployed.

In the debate on 26 November anxiety was expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House—none more forcibly than the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), who had received similar complaints from his constituents. That order went some way to redress the injustice, but it did not go all the way, because these men are still not receiving unemployment benefit. I understand that the adjudicator who dealt with their cases believes that the men are in some way involved in the strike. That is not the case. After Mr. Robinson had appealed against the Department of Employment's decision to disallow unemployment pay, the Department wrote to him on form UB 123 on 7 June 1984:

> "The claimant is disqualified from receiving unemployment benefit . . . because he has lost employment owing to stoppage of work which was due to a trade dispute at his place of employment."

But Mr. Robinson has no place of employment. He was not on the colliery books. The Department of Energy has conceded that. Mr. Robinson received form RP 3 from the NCB informing him of his entitlements. That form stated that his employment had ended on 14 April 1984.

I understand that the Department of Employment has used section 19 of the Social Security Act 1975 to deny those people their entitlement. Section 19 (1) states:

> "A person who has lost employment as an employed earner by reason of a stoppage of work which was due to a trade dispute at his place of employment shall be disqualified for receiving unemployment benefit so long as the stoppage continues, except in a case where, during the stoppage, he has become bona fide employed elsewhere in the occupation which he usually follows or has become regularly engaged in some other occupation; but this subsection does not apply in the case of a person who proves—
> (a) that he is not participating in or financing or directly interested in the trade dispute which caused the stoppage of work; and
> (b) that he does not belong to a grade or class of workers of which, immediately before the commencement of the stoppage, there were members employed at his place of employment any of whom are participating in or financing or directly interested in the dispute."

Mr. Robinson is certainly not participating in the dispute. He is off the books. Even if he had wished to do so, he could not have returned to work. He is unemployed. He is unemployed not because of the stoppage, but because the NCB offered him redundancy pay.

It appears that the Department of Employment is hanging its cap on the provision that, to qualify for benefit, a claimant must prove that he has not participated in, financed, or been directly interested in the dispute. If that is the case, those men feel that they were deceived in their interviews, and I share that view.

Section 19 of the 1975 Act has been the subject of much case law. In the past couple of days, I have been looking at "Neligan's Social Security Case Law" and some commissioners' decisions. My researches have not uncovered any identical decisions. The closest involves a 60-year-old claimant who was given notice by the NCB that his employment as a salvage worker would end on 20 January. Meanwhile, a national coal strike had begun on 9 January and the claimant withdrew his labour, along with other members of the NUM.

There is not a national coal strike. Nearly one third of the miners have been working throughout. Many of the miners at the colliery where my constituent worked are working. Who is to say that if he had not been taken off the books and made redundant he would not be working now? But he is not working because he cannot do so—he is unemployed.

I think that I can anticipate some of the Minister's answers, but the Department of Energy has acknowledged the injustice and produced regulations to put right its side of things. I suggest that the Department of Employment or the DHSS has an obligation to those men not to stick rigidly to the regulations, as the adjudicator seems to be doing. I hope that the Minister will consider the issue carefully and will apply pressure in the right quarters.

There is great concern in the areas involved. My local newspaper, the Pontefract and Castleford Express, ran a big headline on the subject:

"Row over Pitmen's Loss of £2,000."

Thus, the local newspapers have also expressed concern.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) received a letter from the Secretary of State dated 10 January 1985, in which he refers to a letter sent by my hon. Friend involving a similar case. In his last paragraph the Secretary of State writes:

"I understand that the National Coal Board have appealed against the Social Security Appeal Tribunal's decision to disallow Mr. Weatherill's claims to the Social Security Commission. I am afraid that I am unable to predict the outcome or intervene for the reason that I have already given."

Perhaps the Minister can tell us what the case is. Are those involved NUM members, part of management, or do they belong to some other category? I should be interested to know.

However, I hope that the Minister will give serious consideration to those men who have served the industry for 40 years or more and who took their redundancy terms in good faith, which I believe were offered to them in good faith by National Coal Board officers. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will use his powers to bring an end to this injustice.

Mr. Alec Woodall (Hemsworth): I am most grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) for giving me permission to contribute briefly to the debate. I wish to draw an entirely different case to the attention of the House, which involves miners who have been dismissed by the NCB for some minor misdemeanour. As hon. Members with mining interests will know, once an NCB employee has been dismissed for any reason—even for petty pilfering, and before he has appeared in court—he will never again be employed by the NCB. He is taken off the books and stays off the books.

During the current dispute many men have been accused of, and sometimes charged with, minor misdemeanours such as petty pilfering, the stealing of little bits of coal with which to warm their houses or even firewood. They have been dismissed and are off the colliery books, yet they are classed as striking miners and are not allowed to sign the register as unemployed. They are doubly punished for their misdemeanours. They lose their jobs and are then taken to court where a sentence is imposed for pilfering.

Another dimension to this issue was brought to my attention only a few days ago by a probation officer employed in the Wakefield district service. It involved a young apprentice miner who had committed an act of petty pilfering and who was immediately sacked by the NCB. When he heard of it, the colliery manager was very dismayed, because he knew the lad had a good intellect and was a good prospect for the NCB. He was of exemplary character and would have made quite a career for himself in the NCB. The manager was so upset that he wrote to the young man saying "Not to worry. When the strike's over, you come and see me and I shall see that you get your job with the National Coal Board back." That was his mistake. That letter got into the wrong hands. The colliery manager's superiors got hold of it and the colliery manager received a letter saying in no uncertain terms that if, when the strike is over, he re-employs this young fellow, he, the manager, will be sacked—and no two ways about it.

What is the NCB trying to do? The young man was guilty only of petty pilfering. He has lost his job with the Coal Board and lost his career. The probation officer drew the case to my attention because the young man has been before the court, is out of a job and wants to take part in a youth training scheme. He cannot, because he is not unemployed. He is not allowed to sign the register. Because he is not unemployed he cannot take part in a youth training scheme to try to build another career for himself. He is being doubly punished for his small misdemeanour. I appeal to the Minister to state that if a man commits a crime, whatever it is, and is dismissed by the Coal Board, he has been sacked, he is no longer employed by the board and never will be.

In many areas the local colliery is the only place of employment for men. This young fellow lives in an area of high unemployment and he cannot even take advantage of the Government's youth training scheme because he is not unemployed although he is off the board's books and has no chance of getting a job. I beg the Minister to examine the matter.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I recognise that of the many social security issues that have arisen during the current coal mining dispute, one of the most difficult is that which has been raised tonight by the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse)—the problem of the payment of benefit to those miners who have left the industry and are now unemployed. I am grateful to the hon. Member and the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Woodall) for allowing me to explain the position.

I shall deal first with unemployment benefit. I remind the House that the relevant legislation is an Act introduced by the last Labour Government. Section 19 of the Social Security Act 1975 provides that a person who has lost employment as a result of a stoppage of work due to a trade dispute at his place of employment is disqualified from receiving unemployment benefit unless he can show that he is not participating in or directly interested in the trade dispute which caused the stoppage of work.

A rule of this kind has been part of the national insurance scheme since 1948—also of course a year of Labour Government—and before that it was a feature of unemployment insurance in a slightly different form from 1911, which was a year of a Liberal Government. Once a person has lost employment as a result of a trade dispute he remains disqualified from receiving unemployment benefit for as long as the stoppage of work resulting from the dispute continues. He can escape disqualification only by becoming bona fide employed elsewhere in his normal occupation or regularly employed in another occupation. Of course, decisions on whether a person is disqualified from receiving unemployment benefit are for the independent adjudicating authorities and Ministers have no power to intervene in this process.

The hon. Member for Hemsworth referred to a number of matters which fall within the responsibility of the NCB and to some extent of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy. However, individual benefit claims arising from the loss of work relating to the trade dispute do fall within the realm of adjudicating authorities.

I should like to emphasise that there is no question of any special harsh or invidious treatment of miners or their dependants. Indeed, I remind the House that about £29 million has already been paid in supplementary benefit to miners' families. In the case of redundant mineworkers, far more claims to unemployment benefit have been allowed than disallowed over the past nine months or so. Therefore, there is no question of our seeking to use the social security system to penalise miners or ex-miners.

Nevertheless, there can be complications for someone, not just a miner, who becomes redundant during the course of a trade dispute. For example, a person whose redundancy comes into effect while he is on strike, whether he was given notice before or after the strike started, is disqualified from receiving unemployment benefit until the dispute ends. A striking miner who returns to his job and later becomes redundant is still disqualified when the redundancy takes effect until such time as the dispute ends. That is the effect of section 19(1) of the Social Security Act 1975 and the interpretation put upon it in the past by the social security commissioners whose decisions form case law, which is binding upon both adjudication officers and appeal tribunals.

I am aware that the way in which the law works can seem unfair in some cases, such as those referred to tonight, and I have particularly in mind those miners who were absent for only one or two days at the start of the dispute and, in some cases, where they had done everything possible to get to work but were physically prevented from doing so. A number of such cases are now awaiting hearing by the social security commissioner.

If a claim for supplementary benefit is made by a miner in the circumstances that I have described, the supplementary benefit adjudicating officer has to take account of any decision concerning the trade dispute which has been made for unemployment benefit purposes. If a decision about the unemployment benefit position has not yet been taken, or an appeal is pending, any supplementary benefit claim has to be dealt with meanwhile on the assumption that the decision will be adverse.

One other issue has arisen regarding redundant mineworkers which I ought to mention and which highlights the fact that mineworkers who are made redundant are normally in a far better position than workers in other industries. That is because, as the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford recognised, they are entitled to redundancy payments under the redundant mineworkers payments scheme.

Those weekly payments could be made only if the individual satisfied the conditions for receiving unemployment benefit. The effect of those rules and social security legislation together was that miners who had been involved in the strike were not entitled to unemployment benefit, and therefore were not entitled to weekly redundancy payments. Department of Energy Ministers, as has been acknowledged, introduced an amending order which took effect on 7 December to rectify that situation.

The result is that redundant mineworkers now receive their weekly payments from the National Coal Board despite the trade dispute disqualification from receiving unemployment benefit. By the same order my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy was given powers to make discretionary payments to miners who had not been able to receive such payments before the amendment order came into operation.

However, the position regarding unemployment benefit remains as I explained earlier, and the disqualification from receiving benefit continues to apply until the stoppage of work at the claimant's place of employment comes to an end or until the claimant obtains bona fide employment elsewhere in his occupation or he becomes regularly employed in another occupation.

I fully appreciate that the situation that I have described has been a source of serious concern to hon. Members on both sides of the House. To a large extent, though, that is because the adjudication authorities have had to apply the statute law in situations not met before and they have had to follow case law which was decided in different circumstances, although close enough to make it binding now.

After all, we are dealing with a dispute of unprecedented length, involving violence and intimidation on a scale not previously witnessed in this country. We would not, therefore, want to undertake hastily or lightly any revision of section 19 of the Social Security Act 1975, which, I remind the House, was passed by a Labour Government.

We shall, of course, look very closely at the outcome of the social security commissioners' decisions on the cases now going to them, and in the end we may well have to amend the law, or certain aspects of it; but I should remind the House once again that we are talking about legislation which is based on principles which go back to 1911, and which have been recognised as sound by previous Administrations of all political colours.

I hope that both hon. Gentlemen who have spoken will recognise the force of the case. I recognise the problems caused by individuals, but we must accept at the end of the day that this situation has arisen because of the extraordinary length of the strike and the pressure brought on these men by other members of the National Union of Mineworkers. I also remind the House that special arrangements have been made by the Government, as witnessed by the changes to the operation of the miners' redundancy scheme.

Question put and agree to.

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SERVICES

Cervical Cancer Screening

1. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied with the provision for cervical cancer screening in Islington.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): Health authorities are responsible for operating the cervical screening programme within their own districts. I understand that there is concern about the scope of the recall arrangements in Islington. We are taking this up with the authority and I shall write to the hon. Member when the inquiries are completed.

Mr. Smith: Does the Minister agree that this area of health care is of great importance to women? Does he further agree that until we get proper recall systems throughout the country, and a proper call system for women to be screened for this form of cancer throughout the country, the provision of services will be inadequate? Does he have any intention of providing funds to district health authorities to enable them to make such provision?

Mr. Clarke: I agree that cervical cancer is a major cause of avoidable death. We shall do everything possible to continue to reduce deaths caused by it. We have given advice to all district health authorities, asking them to set up effective recall systems, especially for priority groups of women who are most at risk. We shall take up with Islington the fact that, although it has arrangements, they do not seem to comply with our guidance. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman about that. Call systems require an authority or a practice to have an adequate age-sex register of their patients, but not all of them do. As we make more advances with the computerisation of family practitioner committees, and as better information is available to them, I hope that we shall move towards the introduction of call systems if research shows them to be effective.

Mr. Dobson: Will the Minister confirm that Camden and Islington FPC is not unique in not having a scheme? Will he confirm that more than 25 per cent. of FPC areas have no schemes whatever?

Mr. Clarke: The schemes vary. Good local schemes are much more effective than the national scheme that we replaced. Islington is operating a scheme but it is not of the form that we have recommended and we are asking it why it does not introduce an automatic recall scheme for at-risk groups every five years. We have just reminded authorities again of their duty to have a local recall system. As we advance further with computerisation and get new FPCs going I believe that we shall get them all up to the standards of the best.

Dr. Glyn: Although my right hon. and learned Friend has asked local authorities to examine their recall systems, what powers of enforcement does he have?

Mr. Clarke: We do not use legal powers in this area. We give guidance and instructions and inform authorities of their duty to have a local recall system. I do not find resistance to the idea at local health authority level. We are merely ensuring that we encourage all of them to make progress.

Social Security Reviews

2. Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the current state of his social security reviews.

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): I am currently considering the work which has been done on pensions, benefits for children and young people, supplementary benefit and housing benefit. I hope to be in a position to announce proposals for change in the course of the next few months.

Mr. Bowden: I fully accept the need for such reviews, but will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that it would be quite wrong if, to obtain some limited savings on administration by streamlining certain areas, he dovetailed various allowances into one level, which meant that those on the highest level no longer received them? Can he assure me that those who get the maximum amount will not be affected, as they are inevitably those who are in the greatest need?

Mr. Fowler: One of the aims of the reviews is to bring help to people in the greatest need. I shall have to ask my hon. Friend to wait and see in regard to the proposals. I shall not make commitments on that or any other benefit.

Mr. Park: What is the primary purpose of these reviews? Is it to save money, or to discover whether the services are adequate?

Mr. Fowler: The reviews have a whole range of purposes. One of the first is to see whether we can reduce the complexity of the system, which I think the hon. Gentleman will agree is bad for claimants and expensive to administer. A second purpose is to ensure that we are making best use of available resources and channelling them to the people in most need.

Mr. Marlow: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the best ways to alleviate the problem of family poverty is to provide some sort of an allowance for those mothers who stay at home to neeslook after their children? Will he talk to his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer with a view to transferring some of the cash from the married man's allowance to those spouses who are not in employment and who stay at home to look after children?

Mr. Fowler: I hear what my hon. Friend says. I am talking and will talk to my right hon. Friend about the inter-relationship of benefits and taxes.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Will the Minister confirm that among the recommendations of the social security review committees is the abolition of heating additions, and that this could be the last winter that pensioners receive heating allowances, no matter how cold the weather? If, as he has admitted to me in an answer published today, Treasury officials are attending meetings of the social security review committees, how will it be possible for him to resist the Treasury's insatiable demands for public spending cuts?

Mr. Fowler: As to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, as I said, I am not making commitments on particular benefits. As to the second part, not just Treasury Ministers or officials, but officials and Ministers from other Departments and people from outside Government are attending. If the House contrasts that with what the Labour Government did in 1978 when they had a review of supplementary benefit carried out entirely by civil servants, it will agree that the way in which we have approached this matter is infinitely superior.

Mr. Galley: I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's assurance about simplification. In seeking to simplify the system, will he seriously consider the possibility of a simple minimum income support system to replace the current complex supplementary benefit, which acts as a gateway to a plethora of other benefits which, in turn, increase the poverty trap and allow some people to milk the system?

Mr. Fowler: A whole range of proposals have been put forward around that idea. They will be considered.

Mrs. Beckett: Does the Secretary of State admit that for two reasons the reviews are of limited value only? The first is the no-cost theme which pervades them all, and the second is that he and his Department persist in introducing changes which will be disadvantageous to claimants on pensions or benefits without waiting for the result of the reviews? I have in mind the proposal contained in the Social Security Bill, through which 44 per cent. of those who receive invalidity benefit will lose out. How can the Secretary of State claim that the reviews are fundamental when he is making such changes all the time?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Lady must recognise that we cannot stop all change inside the social security system while the reviews take place. The point of the reviews is to have a new look at the whole of social security. It is the first time that it has been done for many years. It is long overdue, and I am surprised that when the Opposition were in government they did not do something of the same kind.

Secure Psychiatric Units

3. Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on progress in establishing regional secure psychiatric units.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: By the end of 1984 seven permanent regional secure units were open. These will eventually provide a total of 264 places, of which about 120 are now staffed and available. In most units, the places are being brought into use in stages. Seven further permanent units providing in total a further 141 places were completed and undergoing commissioning. These units are expected to admit their first patients in the spring. In addition, two pemanent units providing a total of 128 places are under construction and are expected to be completed during 1985. Four further permanent RSUs, providing over 170 places, are at various planning stages.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: Is it not an absolute disgrace and scandal that, over a decade after the Butler committee recommended the establishment of such units as an urgent national priority, regions such as Oxford, North-East Thames and the West Midlands still do not have units despite having received millions of pounds from the Government, and patients from their regions are detained unnecessarily and inappropriately in special hospitals and prisons? Will the Minister ensure that those regions establish units for mentally disordered patients?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Member has pressed me on this matter for some time and I have considerable sympathy for some of the points that he makes, but, with respect, his complaints are getting out of date. I have announced a programme which at least is achieving substantial success. We shall have 600 places by 1985. Recently I took up the matter of Oxford region at the regional review which I conducted with the chairman and officials of that region. We set them the priority task of coming back with plans to catch up with the rest.

Mr. Richard Alexander: May I assure my right hon. and learned Friend that his statement will receive a wide welcome from those who are interested in these matters. Is he aware that those who are working in the special hospitals are particularly concerned about the commitment of the Government to regional secure units? Will he consider further the possibility that if areas do not wish to have regional secure units in their communities they should be put into existing special hospital grounds?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend that we should regard regional secure units as part of a range of treatment, ranging from the ordinary psychiatric hospital in the National Health Service, which should deal with many difficult patients who needs secure accommodation, all the way across to the special hospitals which deal with the most difficult patients. We are not laying down a blueprint for every region. They can adopt their own approach. However, all of them must have regional secure units as one part of a range of care, all of which is very important.

Pensioners (Heating Assistance)

4. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has recently received about financial assistance for pensioners for heating purposes.

15. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has had about problems of lack of heating for elderly people and for families with children as a result of the changes in the heating regulation for supplementary benefit.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): In November there were changes to the rules for paying supplementary benefit weekly additions for special needs, including heating additions, to pensioners and others receiving the higher long-term rate of benefit. At the same time we extended age-related heating additions to supplementary pensioner householders aged between 65 and 69 and introduced an enhanced heating addition for those aged 85 or over. Heating additions in respect of children were not affected. Since 18 June, when my right hon. Friend announced the changes, we have received about 1,070 letters, including some 680 from hon. and right hon. Members, about the changes.

Mr. Winnick: Is the Minister aware of the misery that is faced by so many pensioners during this very cold spell who simply do not have enough money to keep their homes adequately heated? They turn off the heating, wrap themselves in blankets and go to bed very early. Instead of cutting £1 from the heating addition given to those elderly pensioners who need that amount to help them more, why do not the Government recognise the problem involved and give the necessary assistance?

Mr. Newton: It is precisely because of our conern over this problem that we have massively increased heating additions by comparison with the piffling scheme that the last Labour Government left behind. When the hon. Gentleman refers to those elderly pensioners who are most in need, may I remind him that part of the package was an increased heating addition for those aged over 85 which has given to them an extra £2.10 a week.

Mr. Bennett: Will the Minister remind the House of how much last June's change in the regulations saved the Government?

Mr. Newton: The net saving of the change in the regulations in this respect last June, which covered not only heating additions but all additional requirement payments, was of the order of £60 million.

Mrs. Jill Knight: Is my hon. Friend not aware that the answer he has given means that there are people aged between 70 and 85 who are disadvantaged by the new arrangements, and that it is wholly unacceptable to any side of the House that elderly people in this age group should have suffered cuts in their heating benefits, as Department of Health and Social Security officials have confirmed?

Mr. Newton: I understand what my hon. Friend says, but I must ask her to bear in mind that the original rationale of this deduction was the full difference between the short and the long term rates of supplementary benefit. That is how it was introduced by the Labour Government. On that basis, the deduction would now be not £1 but £11 for a married couple.

Mr. Speed: Is my hon. Friend aware that the special supplement that he announced yesterday apparently will not apply to Kent, yet Kent has been hit worst by the weather in the past fortnight? That is met with incredulity by many many people in Kent, because there are many elderly pensioners in my constituency. Is my hon. Friend satisfied with that situation?

Mr. Newton: Frankly, the exceptionally severe weather payments regulation is a pretty weird and wonderful construction. It is operated as best it can be operated on the basis of objective advice from the met office by the chief adjudication officer and I cannot go beyond that.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Following yesterday's announcement that East Anglia and some parts of southern England are to get special payments, and that the hon. Gentleman's Department is to publicise those payments and invite claims, is he not aware that many other parts of the country are facing serious weather conditions? What steps is his Department taking to draw to the attention of local offices the need for such payments? Would it not be outrageous if claimants throughout Britain were not treated on an equitable basis? Will the hon. Gentleman agree to meet a delegation of Labour Members, especially from Scotland, to discuss the matter?

Mr. Newton: It cannot be said to be inequitable to operate a regulation on the basis of objective advice from the met office weather stations assessed by the chief adjudication officer. If the hon. Gentleman and some of his hon. Friends wish to meet me or my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney), or both of us, of course we shall do that.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Is my hon. Friend aware that the Government's excellent record in caring for the elderly is being disproportionately damaged by the withholding of fuel allowance from some categories of the elderly? Will he urge his colleagues to think again on that issue?

Mr. Newton: I must make it clear that that applies to all additional requirements. Therefore, the effect varies according to what range of additional requirements exist. Some pensioners' heating allowances will have been affected only to the extent of 50p. I must repeat the underlying rationale and emphasis that part of the package was to enable us to extend heating additions automatically to all supplementary pensions to those over 65 and not least to give extra help to those most likely to be most in need, the over-85s.

Mr. Wilson: Is it not a perversion of social justice that a minor cold snap in the south of England can trigger off exceptional payments, when it can cost up to 30 per cent. more to heat a similar type of house in Aberdeen as a matter of general conditions? Should there not be a complete review of the heating additions so that claimants receive the benefits to which they are entitled according to climatic requirements so that, wherever one lives in the United Kingdom, one's house is heated to a reasonable standard?

Mr. Newton: I understand that the hon. Gentleman had a long talk with my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney) about those matters last year. The very fact that, as measured under the regulation, the weather now is more severe in the south than in the north illustrates the difficulty of some blanket assumption that it is always more serious in the north. If the hon. Gentleman were to ask me to have a further look at the working of the regulation, that would be very much the kind of point my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has in mind in the social security review.

Mr. Roger King: Will my hon. Friend give some consideration to concentrating heating allowances during the winter months when they are desperately needed perhaps at the expense of not offering any additional heating benefit during the summer months?

Mr. Newton: I shall certainly consider that point.

Mr. Meacher: Since the Government have now spent nearly £5 billion on the coal strike, do they still believe that that is a good investment for Britain, when the alternative could be the use of surplus coal stocks by providing every pensioner in Britain with a Christmas fuel allowance bonus of £100 for each of the next five years? Is not the eradication of hypothermia a much better investment for Britain than the present destructive use of our scarce fuel resources?

Mr. Newton: There have been few things more depressing this year than the Opposition's persistent support for policies which were bound to result in more expensive coal, to the disadvantage of pensioners.

Single Payment Claims

5. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the present arrangements for dealing with single payment claims by his Department.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): We are broadly satisfied with the existing arrangements, given the complexity of the regulations, but one of the aims of the social security reviews to which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has referred is to simplify and improve the working of supplementary benefit generally.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister accept that, in the main, the people applying for single payments are the most deprived and the most in need of urgent assistance? Does he really expect them to wait for a Government review? Does he agree that urgent action should be taken to ensure that it is made easier for those people to obtain the help that they need immediately, without having to wait?

Mr. Whitney: I am satisfied that the regulations are being applied efficiently and with urgency where appropriate. The appeals system is also working effectively. Nevertheless, we recognise that there is reason for improvement. That is why we have launched the reviews of the social security system which, as my right hon. Friend said, are somewhat overdue

Mr. Howard: A few moments ago my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security described the emergency heating regulations which form part of the single payment regulations as "weird and wonderful". Does my hon. Friend accept that they should be examined with some urgency? In particular, will he investigate the reason for the exclusion from the arrangements announced yesterday of Kent and, in particular, my constituency, which is among the areas worst affected? Will he ensure that the regulations are brought into some discernible relationship with reality?

Mr. Whitney: As my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security acknowledged, we recognise the complexities of this, but I refer my hon. and learned Friend to the criteria published in the "S Manual", which is available in the Library.

NHS (Annual Report)

6. Mr. Christopher Hawkins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what response there has been to the publication of the first annual report on the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The report has been widely welcomed as a clear description of the developments and achievements of the Health Service in England over the past five years and of some longer-term trends over the past decade.

Mr. Hawkins: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the main conclusion to be drawn from the report is that we have significantly expanded the Health Service and that it is safe in our hands? Will he ensure that if the annual report is repeated in future years more emphasis will be given to the performance of the Health Service in the regions, rather than just the national position?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. The report focuses attention on the real measure of what is happening in the Health Service—the number of patients treated and the results in patient terms. The report shows that in 1983 alone 300,000 more inpatients were treated in our hospitals, which is a bigger increase than the Labour Government achieved in five years. I agree that future annual reports should show more on progress, perhaps broken down by regions.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I recognise the usefulness of the report, but is not one of its defects the fact that it fails to evaluate whether the people of this country are actually healthier, and merely seeks to determine whether more people have been treated, which is far from the same question?

Mr. Clarke: The health status of this country remains extremely good. I see no evidence that people are getting more ill. There is, however, evidence that the Health Service is providing ever more treatment.

I agree that we should consider how to give more emphasis to preventive medicine so that people do not become sick in the first place, as my hon. Friend suggested yesterday. We are concentrating on all those areas because the purpose of the entire system is to look after the health of the country.

Mr. Eggar: I welcome the annual report. May we hope that future reports will set clear performance targets for each region and assess performance against those targets?

Mr. Clarke: We are devoting a great deal of work to producing a credible means of measuring the performance of authorities. That is now well advanced and the sooner we can put it in place and have a real means of comparing performance in different areas the better it will be for all of us, including the service and the patients.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Does the Minister accept that the whole House would approve that part of the report which describes the advantages of taking elderly people out of hospital and into the community? Will he tell the House now or publish in the Official Report, the impact of rate-capping on that highly desirable exercise?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's support of our policy of care in the community, which reduces the number of unnecessary long-stay hospital patients and provides better facilities elsewhere in the Health Service and in the community. I do not believe that rate-capping need have any impact on that. Rate-capping affects the totality of local authority expenditure. It affects the expenditure of those local councils which are spending excessively across the whole range of their activities. It is thus quite wrong to suggest that its impact need affect desirable community care, which other authorities provide without getting into trouble with rate-capping.

Mr. Churchill: While I warmly welcome the positive step that the Government have taken to increase the number of kidney donor transplants, is my right hon. and learned Friend aware of the great anxiety about the inadequate provision of dialysis? Does he accept that it is wholly unacceptable, given the resources already within the Health Service, that each year several hundred people are condemned to death by the failure to provide a known treatment?

Mr. Clarke: Throughout our period of office we have recognised the need for more renal treatment and have given it a high priority. The figures show that we are increasing the number of patients substantially each year. Now that our new drive is going forward on the transplant programme in particular, the transplant figures are extremely encouraging. Obviously we have further to go. With respect to my hon. Friend, the figures that he quoted in the second part of his question are of an elastic quality, because we depend on a mass of statistics. His emotive language is not justified by facts from hospitals. It is not necessary to dramatise the case in that way or to persuade us of what we already know, which is that there is a need to continue to develop the kidney services.

Mr. Meacher: How does the Minister justify blocking the appointment of general managers whom Conservative health authorities wish to appoint, for example, in the Oxford region and Lambeth, when at the same time he insists on appointing as chairman of the NHS management board a man who, at his press conference, admitted that he knows little about the NHS and always uses private health insurance for his family, and whose immediate background is confined to the Port of London Authority and the National Freight Corporation?

Mr. Clarke: We shall come to questions about the specific issues later. The point is that if we are to improve the service, put more money into it and get better value for money we must, among other things, improve its management. With a good, cost-effective management more patients are treated, whatever resources are available at a given time. It is wrong for the hon. Gentleman to question us, although he is entitled to do so, about what he perceives to be inadequacies in the service, and then to say that Ministers should not take a view about who holds key posts within it. Presumably, the hon. Gentleman prefers jobs for the boys, Buggin's turn, to allow NALGO to dominate the process, or whatever else takes his fancy. The new general manager of the NHS has an excellent track record of management, which is now being put at the service of the NHS and its patients. That is a wholly welcome development.

Ancillary Services

7. Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what savings have been achieved through putting ancillary services out to competitive tendering.

12. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied at the speed health authorities are dealing with privatisation in the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler: I am satisfied with the progress being made by most health authorities in drawing up and implementing their programmes for competitive tendering. We have asked health authorities to provide us with up-to-date figures on savings, but information available to us so far suggests that the policy will result in savings of nearly £20 million over the next three years.

Mr. Hargreaves: I welcome the news that savings are to be made. That is good news for patients, because of the increasing demands on the Health Service. What plans does my right hon. Friend have to extend competitive tendering to other sections of the Health Service?

Mr. Fowler: Our first priority is to ensure that the programme of competitive tendering for domestic services in the Health Service is continued and brought to a conclusion in 1986-87. That is our aim. There are substantial further savings still to be made. As my hon. Friend said, the point of savings is that the money saved goes to patient care. That is what our policy is about, and the House is beginning to see it work.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: Is the Secretary of State not worried that at least 40 Conservative Members have direct financial interests in profiteering from the privatisation of these services? Does he not recognise that the code of conduct laid down for local councillors at local level is much more stringent than it is for hon. Members of this House, who can go into the Lobby and vote to line their own pockets?

Mr. Fowler: I am much more concerned that some Labour Members take their line from trade unions such as COHSE and NUPE and apply an entirely uncritical attitude to those policies.

Mr. Maclean: Is my right hon. Friend aware that some health authorities may be including unnecessarily restrictive clauses in their tendering documents, which are designed to ensure that private companies cannot compete and that contracts are awarded to in-house, fully unionised labour?

Mr. Fowler: I shall consider any points that my hon. Friend may wish to raise with me. Of course, in some instances, the in-house organisation will produce a better price and a better service. That is also part of the policy of competitive tendering and it provides savings for the Health Service.

Mr. Dobson: Will the Secretary of State avoid grotesque exaggeration of the savings that may result from privatisation? Will he avoid misleading the House as the Minister for Health did on 23 July last year, when he told me that Merton and Sutton had made estimated savings of £126,000 compared with the in-house tender. That health authority has told me in writing that there was no in-house tender with which to compare the tenders that it had received, as the Minister had said. He said that Medway had saved £357,000 compared with the in-house tender, but that health authority told me that the figure is only £102,000. He said that north Warwickshire had saved £70,000, but the figure is £22,000.

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman is fighting the battles of yesterday's debates. We have asked health authorities to provide us with up-to-date figures on savings, and I shall ensure that those figures are at the disposal of the House. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not continue to take the absurd position that there is a monopoly of skill in cleaning and domestic services inside the Health Service, and that he will support this sensible programme, which means that more money will go to patient care.

Health Education

8. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make additional resources available to improve the health education services; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): Since 1979-80 the Government have increased funding of the Health Education Council from £4·5 million in that year to £9·1 million in the current financial year. This is an increase of 39 per cent. in real terms. The council's funding for 1985-86 is currently under consideration.

Individual health authorities determine the resources to be made available in their districts for local health education. We have been encouraged by the substantial increase in the number of health education officers employed by the NHS in recent years.

Mr. Dormand: Despite what the Minister says, when will the Government take health education seriously? The Minister knows that, despite what he said, there is no successful continuing health education service. Will he have new consultations with the British Medical Association, the Health Education Council and health education officers in order to provide a better service? Does he agree that a net saving could be made in the Health Service if we had an efficient health education service?

Mr. Patten: Uncharacteristically, the hon. Gentleman has ignored my answer and has completely ignored what is happening in health education in the regions and districts. In most regional health authorities, health education is part of the regional strategic plan, and almost every district health authority has a health education officer. Great steps have been made by the Government's preventive policies, and more has been achieved on preventive medicine by this Government than by any other.

Mr. Coombs: Is my hon. Friend aware of the Tesco initiative on food labelling that was announced last week, and does he welcome it? Does he recognise that the need for health education is made even greater if there is to be a proliferation of such initiatives, leading perhaps to extra confusion for the consumer?

Mr. Patten: Food manufacturers recognise the public concern for greater knowledge about the contents of the food that they eat, and the demand for better food labelling. That is why my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is consulting the food industry on this important matter, so that he can draw up guidelines which will be easily understood by the consumer and which will not lead to the confusion to which my hon. Friend referred.

Geriatric Services

9. Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what increase there has been in the number of inpatients per available bed in the geriatric services.

Mr. John Patten: The number of inpatient cases treated per available bed in NHS hospital geriatric units in England rose from 4·2 in 1978 to 5·8 in 1983.

Mrs. Peacock: Does my hon. Friend agree that this is a good sign of the hospital care that has been extended to our elderly people, and can he confirm that sufficient funds will be made available for their care in the community subsequently?

Mr. Patten: Yes, we are totally committed to the promise in our 1983 election manifesto to make better health and care for the elderly our great priority. That is why, in geriatric care, we have increased the number of nurses by 11 per cent., the number of consultants by 17 per cent. and the number of senior registrars by 43 per cent. since 1979. That is a considerable record by any Health Service standards.

Mr. Eastham: Instead of the Minister playing the numbers game on geriatric care, should he not pay attention to the fact that geriatric hospitals are the worst in the medical service, with antiquated wards and inadequacies in the provision for geriatric patients? Is it not about time that we spent far more money in this sector?

Mr. Patten: It has been the case, as the hon. Gentleman says, that long-stay geriatric hospitals have often been the part of the National Health Service that has been ignored. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has referred to that form of hospital care as one of the Cinderella services. That is what we are trying to put right, not only by our massive building schemes for new hospitals and geriatric units, but by the advances that we are making in our care in the community processes, by the increase in domiciliary visits by nurses and those who bring meals on wheels, and by increases in day centres and the other things that make up the new fabric of care for the elderly.

NHS (Statistics)

10. Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total number of beds in hospitals within the National Health Service in England and Wales, the number of pay beds and the number of beds now available in private hospitals, excluding nursing homes for the elderly; what percentage of the population are now covered by private health insurance schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In 1983, the latest year for which figures are available, there were on average 343,090 beds available daily in NHS hospitals in England. On 31 December 1983 there were 2,987 authorised pay beds in NHS hospitals in England. At the same date, there were, provisionally, 37,980 beds in the private sector, of which 8,100 were in premises with operating theatres. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales will send the hon. Member figures for Wales. We estimate that 8 per cent. of the population is now covered by private medical insurance. We welcome the growth of private medicine because patients should have freedom of choice, and because it adds to the country's health care resources and relieves pressure on the NHS.

Mr. Pavitt: Do not these figures and facts make complete nonsense of the statement by Mr. Victor Paige when defending his BUPA attachment? He said that most people now have private health care and that he would have to take some time to understand the Health Service. Cannot the Minister start thinking again about bringing from business people who have not a clue about health care and provision to run the Health Service? Is it not appalling to pay £70,000 a year to a man whose only previous experience is to preside over the diminution of the Port of London Authority, and over Sainsburys, when he thinks that baked beans going in and out of a checkpoint are the same things as patients?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman has slightly misquoted Mr. Victor Paige, who was describing the arrangements for managers in industry and was not talking about the generality of the population. Unusually for the hon. Gentleman, he is making trite points in a silly attack on Sainsburys and the rest, when we are talking about the appointment of a powerful manager to head a successful and expanding service. We should be concentrating on what we are producing by the changes that we are making, and on the room for changes. We are treating 12 per cent. more patients each year in our hospitals than was the case in the last year of the Labour Government and no fewer than 45 per cent. more day cases each year than in 1979. The appointment of a general manager is the next step in carrying on improving the Health Service.

Mr. McCrindle: Notwithstanding the rather carping attitude of Labour Members, has my right hon. and learned Friend recently noticed evidence that NHS patients are progressively being treated from time to time in private hospitals? Does this not underline the fact that, far from being competitive, there is a strong argument that coexistence between the public and private sectors is to the benefit of all?

Mr. Clarke: I strongly agree with my hon. Friend. We should be interested in whether we are treating the patients properly and getting waiting lists down. That matters far more than who owns the building and who pays the staff. If it is a more cost-effective way of treating patients, we would welcome collaboration between the NHS and the private sector if a health authority finds that it gets more inpatients treated that way.

Limited List Prescribing

11. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received about his proposals to limit the range of drugs prescribed under the National Health Service.

Mr. Fowler: I have received representations from a wide range of individuals and organisations on both the principle and the detail of the scheme. Consultations are continuing on the content of the limited list, which will be finalised next month.

Mr. Waller: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, while there is considerable support for the concept of substituting generic preparations for brand name drugs, the idea of having a limited list whereby certain drugs are not available at all on the National Health Service is quite another matter? Will he set his face resolutely against a system whereby a general practitioner has to consider the means of a patient before considering what prescription to write?

Mr. Fowler: We are not seeking to introduce some kind of two-tier system as has been suggested by some highly misleading advertisements of the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry, which I greatly deplore. Let me tell my hon. Friend that my chief medical officer and a team of independent advisers are examining all the drugs that could be on the list. We always made it clear that we would undertake this consultation and that the list was provisional. If we find a branded drug for which there is no adequate alternative, it will remain available for prescription.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Boyes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 January.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Boyes: Is the Prime Minister aware that the Department of Health and Social Services estimates that in 1984 140,000 homeless people, at a cost of £380 million —an increase of over 600 per cent.—will have used board and lodging accommodation, much of it substandard, lacking in heating, lighting and toilet facilities and representing a serious fire risk? Should not the Government be advocating an increase in the amount of cash available for public sector house building rather than a decrease, so that people can escape from despair, desperation and degradation?

The Prime Minister: No. I believe that the Government's housing policy is the right one and that most people wish to own their own homes. Home ownership has gone up 1·7 million since we were in power and in accordance with that wish the majority of house building is taking place in the private sector.

Mr. Sayeed: Does my right hon. Friend agree, and will she take time today to consider, that this nation's economy is not a one-commodity economy, and that to consider it as such is simplistic, if not downright hysterical? Does such a view not ignore the fact that under this Government inflation is down, productivity is up and the export of goods and services is ever-increasing?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. Gross domestic product is at its highest ever level, fixed investment across the economy is at its highest ever real level, retail sales are at their highest ever real level —up 4 per cent. in volume in 1984—profits are up 20 per cent. in the first three-quarters of 1984 and non-oil exports are up 12·5 per cent. in volume in the three months to November over a year ago. Britain is still worth investing in.

Mr. Kinnock: May I express the wish, with regard to the Prime Minister's last sentence, that many more people agree with her that Britain is worth investing in? Will she accept that on the Opposition side of the House we find the speculation against the pound irresponsible and irrational, but that we also feel that her Government's handling of the current crisis is an epic of bungling indecision that will cost the industries and the households of this country very dear? Will she let this shambles continue, or will she now help the pound by sacking the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

The Prime Minister: I am not sure whether the right hon. Gentleman means that he would have put interest rates up earlier, not at all, or later. Of course, he will not say—[Interruption.]—because he has not got a clue.

The speculation to which he referred has gone on, not only against the pound, but against other currencies. In the last day, record lows against the dollar have been reached by the Swiss franc, the Italian lira, and by the French franc, and the deutschmark also reached a 12-year low. Yesterday, the deutschmark stood at $3·20 in New York. The speculation which the right hon. Gentleman condemns has gone on against all currencies in Europe. We took what we believed to be the right decision because we had to consider exchange rate policy along with several other factors.

Mr. Kinnock: The truth is that the Prime Minister did not take the right decision in any calm fashion. She and the Chancellor of the Exchequer were eventually forced to panic into taking some kind of decision. As she has compared our condition with that of Germany and Switzerland, is she saying that she would do what the Germans and Swiss do, and that she would intervene? If so, will she come clean and admit it? Will she stop dodging the question and asking what the policies of others are and, instead, tell the country what it wants to know, which is what she and her Government will do to stop the crisis in currency and interest rates?

The Prime Minister: I recall recently two occasions when Germany intervened. I emphasise that I recall only two occasions. The intervention was not successful, as I indicated — [Interruption.] Will the right hon. Gentleman listen, as he might then learn a thing or two —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. These are very serious matters. The Prime Minister is seeking to answer the question, and should be heard.

The Prime Minister: Intervention alone was not successful, because, as I indicated to the right hon. Gentleman, yesterday the deutschmark also reached a 12-year low in New York. No single country has enough reserves to counter large volumes of currency moving round the world. We used the interest rate because we thought it right to do so in the circumstances in the exchange market. I remind the right hon. Gentleman that he predicted doom and gloom in July, when we had to do precisely the same thing. Since July, when he predicted doom and gloom and we eventually managed to get down interest rates, inflation has remained at, or below, 5 per cent., output across the economy has continued to grow, exports have been up in volume and retail sales have been higher in the fourth quarter. What the right hon. Gentleman predicted would happen in July did not happen, and the economy is being properly handled by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Kinnock: In July I asked the Prime Minister what she would do to give new strength to our economy. Since then we have lost 80,000 jobs and billions of pounds have flowed out of our economy. Will she now answer the question that the whole of Britain is asking? What is she going to do to change her policies in order to bring us strength, to stop the speculation, to bring down interest rates and to give us a secure future? The right hon. Lady has not yet answered that question.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman's points are not right. After the interest rate increased to 12 per cent. in July output across the economy continued to grow. Construction output was up 3 per cent. in the third quarter over the second, exports were 6·5 per cent. up in volume in the three months to November over the previous three months and the doom and gloom that he predicted did not come to pass—[Interruption.] It did not come to pass because my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer took the right decision to contain inflation, and we have been containing public expenditure. That is why the Stock Exchange today is 14 points higher than a month ago, 233 points higher than at the time of the 1983 election, 395 points higher than at the time of the 1979 election and 803 points higher than the lowest point under the Labour Government.

Mr. Rippon: It is a shame to change the subject. Will my right hon. Friend take the opportunity to ask Chancellor Kohl whether he agrees that we are fully entitled to celebrate the end of a war which secured the freedom, not only of Britain but West Germany? Might Chancellor Kohl not agree also that the only aspect we have to regret about our victory on VE day is the fact that the United States did not heed Sir Winston Churchill's advice to shake hands with the Russians as far east as possible?

The Prime Minister: I know that there is a good deal of feeling that we should have a national celebration of VE day. I understand that feeling and believe that we should celebrate not only victory but peace with freedom and the fact that for some 40 years we have had peace with freedom across Europe. We are considering the form of a national commemoration, which will honour the dead and point to the reconciliation and reconstruction that has been achieved. We shall make an announcement in due course.

Mr. Steel: Returning to the currency crisis, does the Prime Minister recall that in October 1976, when she was Leader of the Opposition, she said that the drop in the value of pound sterling to $1·66 was due to the lack of confidence of other countries in the Chancellor's policies? Now that the right hon. Lady is in office, does she consider that the current drop in the value of the pound sterling to below $1·12 is a massive international vote of confidence in her Administration's success?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman's question shows that he cannot understand that the strength of the dollar is an entirely new and different phenomenon. Otherwise, the right hon. Gentleman would realise that that currency affects not only sterling but the Swiss franc, the Italian lira, the French franc and the deutschmark, whose value has fallen to record lows. Normally one expects the richest nation in the world to have great outflows of capital to finance other countries. In fact, for some time, the United States has been attracting capital from the rest of the world and has not been putting capital out because of the debts in the rest of the world, because previously the banks overlent and other countries borrowed more than they could repay.

2. Mr. Strang asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Strang: Accepting the Prime Minister's preoccupation today with the sterling crisis, will she take time to reconsider the war of attrition against the miners? The right hon. Lady may believe that the miners are misguided, but they are accepting severe privation and showing heroic determination in fighting for their communities and the dignity of work. Does the right hon. Lady recognise that in June, September and October last year real negotiations which almost secured a settlement took place? Why can we not have a resumption of negotiations without preconditions to secure a principled and balanced conclusion to a dispute which is not helping sterling and is damaging the economy?

The Prime Minister: Some 73,000 members of the National Union of Mineworkers are not on strike. More than 20,000 members of the NUM have returned to work since the beginning of November, including 1,800 so far this week. The only attrition against the miners is being carried out by the leadership of the NUM.

3. Mr. Cartwright asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cartwright: Can I take it that the Prime Minister has now overruled the view of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, expressed to me last week by letter, that any celebration of the 40th anniversary of VE day would be at best nostalgic and at worse anti-German? Will the right hon. Lady ensure that any celebrations are genuinely international in character and involve all our wartime allies?

The Prime Minister: I believe that we are entitled to national celebrations, and I have said that we shall be bringing forward some proposals. I hope that those will celebrate the victory of freedom over tyranny and that they will also celebrate 40 years of peace with that freedom. It will, therefore, be a celebration with two aspects to it.

Mr. Favell: In view of the clamour from Opposition Members for increased public spending, may I ask my right hon. Friend to spare a word for those engaged in the wealth-producing private sector? After all, they have borne the brunt of the recession, they need all the help they can get and, contrary to popular belief, the vast majority of them are not engaged in building roads and sewers.

The Prime Minister: The health of the public sector depends on having a flourishing private sector, and that depends on not putting so many burdens on those in that sector that they cannot make sufficient profits to re-invest and extend their activities. I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Ryman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Does it arise directly out of questions?

Mr. Ryman: It does, Mr. Speaker. In answering questions, the Prime Minister spent seven minutes answering two questions.—[HON. MEMBERS: "Three".] Before the Christmas recess, when a Minister of State at the Home Office purported to answer a question by taking eight minutes, you ruled, on a point of order raised by me, that you would exhort Ministers in future to restrict the length of time they took in purporting to answer questions. The Prime Minister, in her attempt to answer questions, clearly infringed that ruling that you gave before the Christmas recess. I ask for your guidance for future reference.

Mr. Speaker: The whole house knows that I should like to see shorter supplementary questions, which I think would lead to shorter answers from the Front Benches. In fairness to the Prime Minister, she was answering a very important question put on three occasions by the Leader of the Opposition. As a general principle, however, I agree with the hon. Gentleman that shorter questions would be beneficial.

Mr. Faulds: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Does it, too, arise directly out of questions?

Mr. Faulds: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Two of the three hon. Members who asked questions this afternoon did not, in their preliminary phraseology, refer to the Prime Minister's business today. Is it not the requirement that such a reference should be part of the phrasing of questions, and would it not have been right for you to have drawn the attention of the hon. Members concerned to that fact?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is entirely right, but I suppose that that preliminary phrase takes up that little bit of extra time. The whole House knows what we are about when we have these open questions.

British Aerospace plc

3.33 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Tebbit): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the Government's residual shareholding in British Aerospace plc.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury told the House on 7 March last year that it was the Government's policy to sell minority residual shareholdings in privatised companies as the circumstances of the companies, the prospectus undertakings and market conditions permit. In pursuit of that policy, the Government have now decided to sell our residual shareholding in British Aerospace.

Since 1981, when it became the first nationalised industry to be denationalised, British Aerospace has been operating successfully in the private sector. We intend, subject to satisfactory market conditions, to offer for sale all our shares in British Aerospace—48·43 per cent. of the company's issued share capital—in the spring or early summer of this year.

The company has agreed that, before the sale is made, it will recommend to shareholders a resolution providing for the Government to retain a special share in the company. The purpose of this special share will be to ensure that no change may be made without Government consent to the provisions of the company's articles of association which restrict the foreign ownership of shares in the company and require the directors to be British nationals.

When British Aerospace was privatised, the Government said that we would retain at least 25 per cent. of the shares in the company so as to be able to block any changes to those articles. This Government shareholding will be rendered unnecessary by the issue of the special share which will have the same blocking effect.

We will also have the right to nominate a director to the company.

It is the company's intention to raise new equity capital at the same time as the Government's shares are sold. The British Aerospace chairman, Sir Austin Pearce, is making a statement about this this afternoon.

Subject to the approval, as necessary, of the company's shareholders, it is intended that the offer for sale should take the form of a simultaneous offering of the Government's existing shares and new shares issued by the company.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): May I begin by welcoming the right hon. Gentleman back to the Dispatch Box? We are very pleased that his recovery has been so complete as to allow him to resume his duties in full. I am sorry, however, that his return to the House has been to deliver such a miserable and humiliating statement.

Is it not crystal clear that the Government have been pushed and panicked into an early forced sale of these shares in British Aerospace because of their incompetent handling of our financial affairs? Is it not the case that as a result of the yet further postponement of the sale of British Airways shares the books will not balance unless the Government sell something else as fast as they can? Is it not a shabby circumstance that valuable public assets of inestimable long-term significance have to be sold in forced sales circumstances which means that the price to be obtained will be well below the true value?

Is it not now obvious that the whole privatisation process is not a measured and well-considered transfer of assets as between private and public ownership but a scramble to sell off anything valuable that the Government can get their hands on to disguise their financial bungling? Is it not a measure of the Government's desperate straits that they have been forced to break a solemn undertaking that was given to Parliament, presumably in good faith, that they would retain 25 per cent. of the shareholding of the company so as to maintain essential control?

Is the Secretary of State aware that the special share device upon which he places great reliance has not yet been tested in the courts as being effective, especially in cases where the holder of the share has no beneficial interest whatsoever in the company? Does not the Secretary of State realise that if this rather pathetic device fails to achieve its objective the Government will have lost all control of an enterprise which is crucial to the equipment of our armed forces and to our national security? Is it not ironic that if the Government had not failed to obtain the proper value for the shares they sold in British Telecom they might have been spared the ignominy of this forced sale of British Aerospace?

Mr. Tebbit: May I first thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his kind personal remarks?

The Government have not been pushed unwillingly into selling these shares. It has been my ambition ever since the concept of denationalisation was arrived at that we should sell all of them. Indeed, we want to get back as soon as possible to the position which obtained before the Labour Government's incompetent decision to nationalise the industry in the first place.

When the right hon. and learned Gentleman talked about this being related to the British Airways decision and about its being necessary to balance the Government's books, he seemed not to understand that this will happen in the forthcoming financial year, during which I very much hope that British Airways will also be liberated.

If the right hon. and learned Gentleman thinks that the shares will be undervalued and sold too cheaply, he is at liberty to buy some. He is even at liberty to suggest that the Labour Party should buy some; it might help its financial state.

As to what the right hon. and learned Gentleman said about the retention of 25 per cent. of the shares, it is clear that he is unduly excited about the mechanism by which the objective would be achieved and is completely oblivious to the fact that it is the objective of ensuring that control of British Aerospace remains in Britain that is important. The right hon. and learned Gentleman chooses to cast some doubts upon the legal validity of the mechanism of special shares. That is an idea that he seems to have invented out of the air today because he has no other valid criticism to make.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): In welcoming my right hon. Friend back today, may I say how wonderful it is to have him in such cracking good form and delivering a statement so dear to his heart and so dear to his right hon. and hon. Friends who, for many a long month, have espoused a hope in their hearts that the totality of British Aerospace would be sold in this way? This example should be a very good precedent for the sale—in fact, the liberation—of British Airways? Could the employees of British Airways benefit in the same way that the employees of British Aerospace have undoubtedly benefited, those who had the prescience to buy shares in the company when first it was floated?

Mr. Tebbit: I had best not be tempted into discussing the basis on which British Airways shares will be sold, but it is right that I should say to my hon. Friend that on this occasion, on the sale of British Aerospace shares, the existing employees will have priority rights of application with regard to the Government shareholding, but at present I do not envisage that there will be any special incentives beyond that for them to buy.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I join with others in welcoming the Secretary of State back to the Dispatch Box and add the wish that his wife will also soon be restored to full health.

May I press the point that has been made, that this is like selling off the family silver to pay for the grocery bills? Does not the Secretary of State accept that selling off capital assets in this way would be more acceptable if the funds raised by the Government were not just lost to the Exchequer and the Government's capital investment record were better than it was? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that an increase in capital investment in the Budget would be widely welcomed using the revenues that have been received from the British Telecom sale; this sale and other sales of State assets?

Mr. Tebbit: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind remarks, particularly those concerning my wife, which I shall convey to her.

The hon. Gentleman referred to capital investment. I must confess that my memory may be at fault, but I thought that the hon. Gentleman was present in the House last Thursday when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister sought to set his mind at rest over the Government's record on capital expenditure, which is very good—and so is the present record of the private sector of industry.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): May I also say how great a pleasure it is to welcome my right hon. Friend back to the House? He has given us good news in his first statement. Can he define for the House and those outside who are partners with the British Aerospace company in international agreements such as Panavia in Germany and Italy and Airbus Industrie in France and Germany what relationships they will have with the new company when it is entirely in private enterprise? Will my right hon. Friend assure them that there will be no change in those relationships and that the Government will continue to back those relationships?

Mr. Tebbit: I can certainly give my hon. Friend the assurance that no change is envisaged in the relationship between British Aerospace plc and its partners in either Airbus Industrie or Panavia, or in the other international projects with which British Aerospace is associated.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Bearing in mind the De Lorean experience, will the Secretary of State say what the terms of reference will be for the Government-appointed director?

Mr. Tebbit: The Government director will have the responsibilities of every other director of the company. I do not think that there is very much connection between De Lorean and British Aerospace, not even, I hope, in the mind of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement and am delighted to see him back. Is he aware that those of us who have been involved with this denationalisation process will be most interested in the special share arrangement that he has announced and that, on the face of it, it appears to be a most useful way in which to provide additional opportunities for putting shares on the market? Will he take this opportunity to say how far he hopes that share ownership will be spread as widely as possible, as with small investors for British Telecom? Does he further recall that when British Aerospace was floated 90 per cent. of the employees took their free issue but that 40 per cent. spent money to buy shares? Is that not a promising augury?

Mr. Tebbit: I hope that the share ownership of British Aerospace will be spread widely. I especially hope that many of that company's employees will take advantage of the priority that they will have to apply for shares in the company in which they work and in the success of which they have an enormous interest.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): Is it not an interesting insight into the morality of the Secretary of State and those Members behind him who cheered that, when he attempted to meet the criticism of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) about shares once again being sold at far too low a price, he suggested that the criticism might be stifled by my right hon. and learned Friend trying to make money out of the shares himself? Is that the sort of morality that we now have in the House?

Mr. Tebbit: I am not sure that I am too keen on taking lessons in morality from the hon. Member, but I suggest that he has misunderstood the import of my question. Were he and his hon. Friends and others who believe that something is undervalued to come forward with a better bid, the price would be raised, the taxpayer would benefit, and, as I have suggested, even the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East and his colleagues might benefit. When such benefits can be spread widely, it is an unhappy thing that the hon. Member should be so carping. Why does he not celebrate a little?

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): Might I also welcome my right hon. Friend's return to the Dispatch Box? Although he sounded fine on television, he sounded even better this afternoon, giving a message that I know will be warmly welcomed by all of us who have British Aerospace divisions in our constituencies? The announcement will be welcomed as giving new and increased hope for the future of this most important, if not vital, industry.

Mr. Tebbit: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend. It is worth remembering that British Aerospace's constituent companies were prosperous and well run before denationalisation. Their success since denationalisation has been quite remarkable—there has been a continued growth in turnover, exports and profitability. We can all hope that that will continue.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): How long will it take the Secretary of State to learn that privatisation does not spread share ownership more widely? If he takes the time to investigate the circumstances of British Telecom plc now, he will find that 30 per cent. of its employees who bought shares have already sold them.

[Mr. Harry Ewing]

Does the right hon. Gentleman remember that, in the middle of 1984, General Electric Company attempted to gain control of British Aerospace? For one reason or another, the attempt did not materialise. Will he assure us that his announcement is not a back-door method of giving control of an extremely important industry to GEC? If that happened, it would be an utter disaster for the British Aerospace industry.

Mr. Tebbit: The hon. Gentleman has forgotten that, should there be an attempt at a takeover of a company such as British Aerospace, it would fall within the criteria that apply under the Fair Trading Act 1973 and therefore might well be investigated by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. A conclusion would then be reached by the MMC and the Government on whether such a bid should be allowed to go ahead. There is no question of this sale of shares changing matters in that respect.

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): I welcome the principle of what my right hon. Friend has announced, but is he satisfied that the arrangements that he has outlined will give the Government reasonable certainty that, in its future ownership, the company will retain primacy in matters of aerospace?

Mr. Tebbit: The standing of British Aerospace will be governed by the skill of the work force from the chairman down to the last man and woman on the shop floor. The Government will continue to give British Aerospace the support which they give to all British companies in their efforts to export and prosper.

As my hon. Friend will be aware, the Government have already entered into an agreement with British Aerospace about launch aid for the A320 airbus. That agreement is completely unaffected by the sale. It may also be of some comfort to Opposition Members if I say that we intend to impose a limit of 10 per cent. of the proportion of the shares offered that will be allocated to any single applicant or group of applicants acting in concert.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): When answering a supplementary question the Secretary of State said that it has always been his intention to sell all the shares in British Aerospace and yet in the statement he said that the Government intended to retain 25 per cent. of the shares. Can he reconcile the difference between those two statements?

Mr. Tebbit: Simply. I have always had that desire and intention in my mind since the dastardly act of nationalisation was first committed.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): In welcoming back my right hon. Friend, may I ask whether he agrees that his statement is an indication of the strength of the company, the commitment of the work force, the excellence of its products and the success of privatisation? Does he agree that that is nothing but good news for the company's employees, at whatever level, and for our constituents?

Mr. Tebbit: I agree with my hon. Friend. I am sure that he would wish to look back on the company's record of profitability since it has been privatised, its success with export orders and many other matters, and take comfort from that. I am sure that the staff of British Aerospace will feel the same about it. I think that they will be glad to be entirely free from Government.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Does the Secretary of State agree that this further act of denationalisation owes less to the idea of the spreading of a company's share ownership, because it reduces public involvement in that company and concentrates it in a few hands, and more to his and the Government's idea of rewarding their political mentors and supporters from before the election with the profits from the privatisation of industry?

Mr. Tebbit: No, Sir.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend accept that most of us on the Conservative Benches accept the logic that there is no need for any Government to own shares in British Aerospace? However, bearing in mind the fact that at one time Thorn-EMI wished to bid for British Aerospace and that GEC is now widely rumoured to wish also to bid and has a huge mountain of cash so that it could do so if his Department allowed it, would it not be sensible to clear this matter out of the way first to save any embarrassment from selling shares at a relatively low price, with a bid being made within a short time, when that profit could accrue to the State instead of to other outside shareholders?

Mr. Tebbit: My hon. Friend neglects the fact that I do not believe that GEC or Thorn-EMI would necessarily take me into their confidence as to whether they intended at some time to bid.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Now that the Secretary of State is back, and aided in his recovery by the non-privatised section of the National Health Service—[Interruption.] It is a fact—and taking into account the fact that there have been several statements from the Government about privatising sections of the economy and that with each of those statements, like today, there is talk of liberating industry and assisting the economy, why after five years of privatisation measures is the pound in the geriatric ward?

Mr. Tebbit: Oh, dear, Mr. Speaker; the hon. Gentleman must, as usual, have spent more time with his mouth open than with his ears open during the exchanges at Prime Minister's Question Time today. As to what has really helped me back to my present state of what I understand is called rude health, above all else I have been encouraged by the splendid return of miners to work in the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): Would not my right hon. Friend agree that it was extraordinarily interesting that the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), who spoke this afternoon on behalf of the Opposition, made no reference to the possibility of his party renationalising British Aerospace in the unlikely event of its being returned to power? Could that be because he has become an apostate of the theory of nationalisation, or is it more likely that the right hon. and learned Gentleman recognises——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must ask a question which the Secretary of State can answer. The Secretary of State cannot put himself into the mind of the Opposition spokesman.

Viscount Cranborne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Will my right hon. Friend therefore agree with me that the reason why the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East was reluctant to refer to this previous undertaking was that it would be a vote loser and that the people recognise that it would cause extreme damage to the British economy?

Mr. Tebbit: I am sure that my hon. Friend does not really expect me to take responsibility for the state of mind of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) and his colleagues. I do not think that I am quite well enough just yet to take that on. I am quite sure, however, that there will be no question of denationalisation because there is no possibility of a Government committed to that sort of policy ever again being returned to office in this country.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): As the Secretary of State has returned to the House with all his former "bottle" intact, will he tell the House how much he expects the net gain to the Exchequer to be as a result of this sale? Is it not fair to say that the proceeds of the sale will be used next year to cut the taxes of the better-off in our society?

Mr. Tebbit: One could equally say that the proceeds of the sale will be used by the Government to maintain the value of pensions and other benefits. One cannot distinguish between what one section of money does as it goes into the Exchequer and another.

As to the amount of money which will be raised, at the time when dealings were suspended the valuation of the Government's holding was about £350 million or £360 million. What the valuation will be at the time of the sale depends, as the hon. Gentleman knows, upon many factors.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): I welcome both the return and the statement of my right hon. Friend. Does not he agree that, so far from this being a forced sale at a disadvantageous moment, as the Prime Minister pointed out earlier this afternoon, the stock exchange has risen very substantially and therefore this may seem to be a highly opportune moment for disposing of the rest of the Government's stake?

Mr. Tebbit: I very much hope that it will prove to be.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his most welcome and boisterous return to the Dispatch Box will give particular pleasure to those of my constituents who work for British Aerospace? His statement is a sign, first, that in the private sector it is now commercially vibrant and, secondly, that it will lead to the final shackles of nationalisation being removed from their workplace.

Mr. Tebbit: It is important to understand—I do not believe that the Opposition have yet quite grasped this—that the denationalisation of these enterprises results in wider share ownership and in a more dispersed control of the company. For who, really, has been controlling the company while it has been nationalised? One sometimes wonders. Certainly it is not a very widespread group of people.

British Broadcasting Corporation Advertising

3.58 pm

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the constitution of the British Broadcasting Corporation to allow the Corporation to raise revenue, as and when required, through transmitting advertisements subject to the same rules as to advertisements that apply to independent television.

I welcome this opportunity to put the Bill before the House because, believe it or not, since 1923 when the BBC began the House has never had any say in the fixing of the television or broadcasting licence. It has usually been stitched up as a deal between successive Home Secretaries and Governments and announced at midnight. The public have had to put up with that form of poll tax whether they liked it or not.

There is no doubt that the proposal to increase the licence fee to £65 will bear heavily on the poorer sections of the community. Many families in Britain, probably 5 million, never see £65 in a lump sum. It is not that they do not want to pay £65 for a television licence; it is just that they can never afford to pay that.

The time has come to re-examine the method of financing the BBC and there is a great public demand for that. Obviously, many of my colleagues are opposed to advertising on principle. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I have yet to see similar opposition to advertising that appears in Tribune, Morning Star, Labour Weekly or the Radio Times, or any other form of financial help which is given to those organisations.

Obviously, it would be better if a subsidy could be paid to poor people so that they would not have to pay a massive £65. But the fact is that no Chancellor, Labour or Conservative, has ever shown any sign that he is prepared to put up that sort of money. It would need about 1·5 per cent. on VAT to pay it. There is no sign even now that a future Labour Chancellor would be able to find between £400 million and £500 million to keep down the cost of the television licence and to pay a subsidy to people on low incomes. Therefore, we must consider how that could be financed.

There is no doubt that some of my hon. Friends will argue that already the poor pay more than £65 in the 1p that they pay on a tin of beans or the adverts on the other supermarket purchases that they make every day. But the fact is that that sort of payment is relatively painless. When people pay a penny on a tin of beans for the advertising, they can absorb that into their weekly budget far more easily than a £65 lump sum payment.

Nobody is denying that £65 would be tremendously good value for money. It would be. It works out at about the cost of a postage stamp per day. But the fact is that the BBC has not yet come up with any method of collecting it, other than in a lump sum. The benefit of paying by advertising is that the people who spend the most tend to pay the most. The poor families in my constituency who cannot afford continental holidays are not paying for the continental holidays to be advertised on television. If they cannot afford to fly British Airways or to pay for beer, they do not pay for advertisements for those. There is a principle in advertising that the ones who spend the most pay the most, which is a good principle on which to work.

The Bill does not tell the BBC how it has to run its affairs or raise funds. It allows it complete flexibility. It has been worked out by advertising agencies that the BBC would need to take as little as 30 or 40 seconds an hour. I have just returned from making a television programme with Mr. Alasdair Milne, the director-general of the BBC. [Interruption.] It is not usual to shout hon. Members down on a ten-minute Bill, but I understand that my hon. Friends do not wish to listen to the argument.

Mr. Alasdair Milne confirmed on television an hour ago that advertising would work out at just over a minute an hour. One commercial an hour is all that the BBC would need to keep the licence fee at its present level. It would have a guaranteed per capita income of £46 and it could then raise as much or as little as it liked to finance its programmes.

Nothing in the Bill says that every programme must contain advertising. The BBC could choose to advertise on "Dynasty" or "Dallas", "Hi-di-hi" or "Blankety Blank", and leave "Panorama" or "Newsnight" alone. It could choose to show programmes from the Olympic games where there were adverts for McDonald's hamburgers or Coca-Cola and then use the cash to subsidise opera on BBC2. The Bill gives the BBC complete flexibility to decide how much it wants to raise and how to raise it.

An alternative argument that would probably be put forward is that advertising tends to lower standards and goes for the mass market. There may have been something in that argument until Channel 4 appeared. Nobody now can say that Channel 4 lowered its standards to get a bigger range of advertising, because it did not. Many programmes on ITV, such as "World in Action", "Weekend World", "TV Eye" and "News at Ten", do not pander to advertisers. They make no concessions to advertising at all. They are excellent programmes of integrity. The miners in my constituency will say that Channel 4 news has given them the fairest coverage that they have had. Therefore, there is no experience at all that advertising lowers standards in Britain, and that is the result of the strict controls that we have. Last year ITV won all seven Emmy awards for dramas such as "Jewel in the Crown" and "Brideshead Revisited" and made a profit from selling those programmes abroad.

We already have massive advertising on BBC every day, especially on sporting programmes at the weekend. The Canon league, the Gillette cup, the Nat-West trophy and all sorts of sponsored events are constantly thrust in front of the public. We now have the crazy situation where the BBC pays Embassy to show its snooker when it should be Embassy paying the BBC to advertise Embassy. How can that be Socialism? To expect people to pay £65 to subsidise Embassy is inconceivable to me.

Advertising is one of the best growth industries in Britain. It is making massive profits. We have only to look at the growth of free newspapers over the past 10 years. Ten years ago Britain never experienced free newspapers being shoved through the door. There has been a phenomenal rise in that market and its profit. In real terms ITV now charges 50 per cent. more for advertising than it did in the 1970s. That is possibly because there is a massive demand for advertising. ITV does not want to change the set-up because it does not want to face competition. If the price of the cost of advertising comes down because the BBC is showing it, it benefits the consumers and the poor people who pay 1p on a tin of beans towards paying for it.

ITV experienced so much demand for advertising last year that it went to the Independent Broadcasting Authority and asked for an extra minute an hour and the IBA turned it down. The market potential there for fund raising is enormous. The only thing that prevents it is that on the one hand the BBC does not want to do it, and on the other it does not want a handout from the Government because it wants to retain its integrity. It cannot have it both ways. There must be some form of help to the poor and lower paid.

That system works well in Italy and Germany. In Italy the fee is £33. One can argue about quality, but we are arguing about financing.

4.7 pm

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman seek to oppose the Bill?

Mr. Sedgemore: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Few Labour Members would have expected to see a Labour Member bring in a Bill to put the BBC in private hands and bring public service broadcasting to an end. I imagine that the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) wants to be remembered as the person who gave the BBC over to commercial salesmen.

Frankly, I am horrified at the way in which the hon. Gentleman has run his campaign on radio and in the press. He knows the long-term and calamitous consequences of what he is proposing but he simply does not care. In bringing the Bill before the House in this fashion he combines, as only he is capable of combining, rampant populism with insistent philistinism and a profound ignorance of television and the importance of the BBC in the maintenance of our culture.

The Bill will damage entertainment, drama, news, art and culture. It may be the hon. Member's intention to turn Bassetlaw into a cultural-free zone before he dies.

The hon. Gentleman has consistently misled the public on radio and television. He has said that the BBC would need only 30 seconds of advertising per hour to keep the licence fee at the present level. That is incorrect, as I have always known. The hon. Gentleman has taken that figure from an advertising agency called DMM. In fact, the BBC would need three times that amount—one minute and 20 seconds of advertising per hour. If I can do my homework on that, I do not see why the hon. Gentleman cannot.

The hon. Gentleman has argued in public and in the House today that people who watch ITV should not have to pay for the BBC. Audience research figures show that 97 per cent. of the public watch BBC television for an average of 10 hours per week. That is the whole population except those who are moving house or happen to be away from home for some reason.

The hon. Gentleman said that the BBC had won no Emmy awards this year. Perhaps he regards those gargantuan competitions as reflecting the quality of television broadcasts, but if he had done his homework he would know that the BBC won no fewer than 100 national and international awards last year.

The hon. Gentleman says that he does not like the idea of lump sum payments by pensioners. I do not like it either. But instead of proposing that one of the most important communications media on earth should be handed over to private, corporate vested interests, he should address himself to the problem in hand. He may not know that one sixth of the BBC's current income comes from the sale of 50p licence stamps, most of which are contributed by pensioners. Why does he not seek to develop that scheme?

Why does the hon. Gentleman not support Labour party policy, which seeks to give pensioners free television licences? I agree that paying the licence fee out of the national Exchequer would require institutional and structural changes, but if the hon. Gentleman wishes to know how that could be achieved he need only read the article in New Socialist by Juliet Steyn and myself on future policy for the BBC and the arts.

The hon. Gentleman refuses to consider the mischief of his Bill. [Interruption.] Despite all the noise and "yah-boos" from the Conservatives, I ask him to consider what will happen when instead of competing in the making of programmes the BBC and the independent television companies compete for advertising revenue. What will happen to the programmes when the BBC is run by advertising agencies? What will happen to public service broadcasting when Saatchi and Saatchi tell the BBC that it must increase its ratings to sustain its revenue? What will happen to dramas and documentaries of the type made by Ken Loach and Roland Joffe? "The Sponger's United Kingdom" on BBC could never have been made if the hon. Gentleman's Bill had been law.

The hon. Gentleman's proposal seeks to make it more difficult for the BBC to produce programmes which are disturbing, emotive, sensuous, imaginative, critical, analytical and intellectual. He is seeking to leave people unwittingly and helplessly subjected in their own homes to the lowest common denominator, unable to think sensibly about where they are and what they might become. Some people believe that Socialism can be achieved simply by questioning elitist statements, but any Socialist thinker will confirm that to achieve Socialism in this land we must question every popular assumption as well as every elitist assumption. Given the current state of ideology and popular opinion in this country, that is the only way to mediate between the world as it is and the world as we should like it to be.

One cannot always appeal to authorities, but I ask the hon. Gentleman to consider the words of Alasdair Milne, director-general of the BBC, who has said:

> "The fact that broadcasting competition in this country is confined to programmes alone makes for healthy, professional rivalry and is the cornerstone of the British broadcasting achievement."

In this context, I quote with approval the words of David Plowright, managing director of the Granada company, for which I worked. I am no friend of his and I have had arguments with him about censoring programmes on open government, but he showed some sense when he said of the present system:

> "It has enabled the two services to avoid damaging, cut throat competition for ratings and strive instead for a full measure of audience interest, appreciation, programme originality and excellence . . .
> The BBC deserves a significant increase in the licence fee. It has set standards we in ITV have done our best to emulate."

In effect, he is saying that Granada would never have produced programmes such as "Jewel in the Crown" and "Brideshead Revisited" if the hon. Gentleman's Bill had been law.

At a time when the licence fee and, indeed, the whole future of the BBC is under extraordinary attack from the Conservative party, the Government and the Prime Minister, as The Times today makes clear, the hon. Gentleman comes to the House with this damaging proposal. I do not know how Conservative Members intend to vote, but it would be a disgrace if any Socialist voted in favour of the Bill.

Opposition Day

[5TH ALLOTTED DAY]—considered

Unemployment

Mr. Speaker: Before we proceed with the debate, I should inform the House that I propose to operate the 10-minute limit on speeches between 7 pm and 8.50 pm. I hope that hon. Members who are called before 7 o'clock will bear in mind the fact that there is great pressure to speak during this debate. No fewer than 32 right hon. and hon. Members have so far shown their wish to participate. I hope that the House will think it fair to give precedence to those hon. Members who were not called to speak during the regional industrial policy debate on 28 November.

I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): I beg to move,

That this House condemns the Government's wilful refusal to implement policies which would result in a reduction in unemployment from its present record level and from the even higher total to which it will rise in 1985; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to concentrate the resources at its disposal on the public sector, thus providing the stimulus which the economy needs in a way which creates the largest number of jobs.

Today's debate concerns three issues, about which the Government and the Opposition are fundamentally and, perhaps, irrevocably divided. For the Opposition the first is a matter of principle. We believe that the overwhelmingly most important national priority at this time is a reduction in unemployment. Unemployment is at a record level and was set to rise even before yesterday's fiasco, and it will rise further and faster because of the increase in interest rates that was announced yesterday afternoon.

To the Opposition, a reduction in unemployment is an objective towards which every aspect of economic policy should be directed. I have no doubt that in his speech the Chancellor of the Exchequer will say that he, too, regards a reduction in unemployment as essential, and that he is working towards that end. If the Chancellor says that in good faith, the Government's policy on unemployment is as ghastly a failure as are their policies in every other economic area. If that is their intention, they have signally, indeed spectacularly, failed to realise it during the past five and a half years. For five and a half years we have been promised that a rigorous application of the medium term financial strategy will produce a certain and irreversible reduction in unemployment. Yet for five and a half years that strategy has produced the diametrically opposite result: a continued and unremitting increase in the number of men and women who are without work. But after five years during which that strategy has failed completely and palpably, all that the Government offer in their amendment today is a repeat of the same old discredited economic clichés. Conservative Members who vote for the amendment will be voting for more of the same; and it is more of the same that has pushed up unemployment, on an accurate and honest assessment, to approaching 4 million.

For us to believe that the Chancellor is remotely sincere in what will be his expressed concern for the unemployed, he must answer one simple question: when does he judge that his chosen strategy for the eventual reduction of unemployment will begin to work? When will the total begin to level off, let alone to fall? When will the unhappy Secretary of State for Employment no longer have to appear on television month after month and describe himself as surprised and disappointed by the monthly unemployment figures? Indeed, the successive disappointments of the Secretary of State, matched only by successive surprises on the same occasions, say little for his judgment but much for his gullibility. We want an honest statement about when the Chancellor expects the strategy, which he has insisted for five years will eventually work, to begin to work.

I suspect that the Chancellor will refuse to give even an estimate of when unemployment will begin to decrease, so let me tell the House what the honest answer would be. On an accurate and honest measurement of present unemployment, it will still be at or above 3 million at the time of the next general election. Several things will happen before then. Lord Young will perform his duties of manipulating the statistics to make the published figures look more acceptable. The Chancellor will invent new excuses. The Prime Minister will counterfeit concern. But by the next general election, we shall have endured almost a full decade of increasing unemployment, and the real figure will still be 3 million or more.

Four years ago, the Prime Minister would have said brashly that unemployment is the short-term price that we must pay for long-term economic success. I should describe some of that success to her today in honest terms, not in the sort of terms that she trotted out at the Dispatch Box an hour ago. Putting aside the present record unemployment, and the fact that her success must be measured against higher unemployment than Britain has ever known, the success about which she spoke includes an annual tax bill that is £22·5 billion more than it was when she took office, manufacturing imports exceeding manufacturing exports for the first time in our history, interest rates still at their 1979 levels despite all the promises of reductions, and the pound at its lowest ever value. We have become — this is one success about which the Prime Minister could legitimately boast — what one commentator described yesterday as a one-commodity economy, saved from national bankruptcy by the gratuitous benefit of North sea oil revenues.

Whenever the Chancellor is reminded of the position in which the public sector borrowing requirement, his hopes for tax cuts, and public expenditure would be were it not for the boon and benefit of North sea oil, for which he can take no credit, he always replies, as he did yesterday, that North sea oil revenues will continue for a good time yet.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): So they will.

Mr. Hattersley: The hon. Gentleman is perceptive to say that, but that is hardly the point. The point is — perhaps even the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) has noticed this—that North sea oil revenues have peaked during this financial year. From now on they will be a wasting asset, and to rely on those revenues to balance our books instead of using them to invest in our industrial base and our infrastructure is to make the British economy tragically vulnerable to every external pressure.

The true state of our economy is eloquently demonstrated by the way in which the Prime Minister is driven to the most disreputable use of statistics to give a fraudulent impression that at least part of her policy is working. I shall give three examples. On 10 January, she told me that public investment is at the same level as it was in 1978-79—a claim that is statistically plausible only because the Government have changed the definition of public investment. They have been condemned for doing so by the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. That is the value of the Prime Minister's honesty in such matters. Another example from the same day——

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): The right hon. Gentleman has rightly stressed the importance of honesty in this debate. What contribution to increased unemployment does he believe has been caused by the worst recession for 50 years, by the advent of an extra 1 million people in the labour force in the 1980s, and by the impact of new technology — all factors which it is beyond the scope of this or any Government to control?

Mr. Hattersley: I assure the hon. Gentleman that it is my judgment, and the judgment of almost all objective commentators—[Interruption]—many of whom I shall quote as the afternoon continues — that were the reduction of unemployment the Government's highest priority, the figure would be lower than it is today. When Conservative Members scoff at that fact, they are not just scoffing at me, which is par for the course between Government and Opposition, but are scoffing at the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), under whom they were proud to serve when he was Prime Minister.

However, I shall not be diverted from giving two further examples of the weakness of the Prime Minister's case, which she manipulates in a way that I can describe only as statistically fraudulent. On 10 January she said that investment in the economy as a whole is at a peak, but she did not add that it is certain to fall next year as a direct result of Government policy. Investment is high now because of the impending changes in investment allowances, which have brought forward investment, but the policy that increases it this year will be the policy that decreases it next year. It is a sign of the weakness of her case that she takes refuge in such subterfuge.

The Prime Minister did it again today when she told us about the great investment record and the booming economy. I wish that she could have brought herself to answer the question honestly and to admit that, during the past four years, net investment in manufacturing and transport has been in a negative rather than a positive form. These are the facts about the economy, and the Prime Minister does herself no credit by trying to pretend anything different.

These are statistics that the Prime Minister polishes, hones and manipulates to impress her weaker-minded Back Benchers, but, on the evidence of the recent past, they do not impress international opinion or fool international confidence, for the collapse of the pound is in no small measure due to the recognition of the debility of the British economy, for which the Tory Government are responsible.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham) rose——

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) rose——

Mr. Hattersley: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden), who is pointing at me with his left hand.

Mr. Walden: Earlier today, the Leader of the Opposition said the speculation against the pound was irrational. The right hon. Gentleman is now saying that it is an expression of no confidence in the Government's economic policy. Could he elucidate?

Mr. Hattersley: As I understand it, the hon. Gentleman shares my view that John Maynard Keynes had something important to say about economics. The hon. Gentleman will recall that half of Keynes's general theory was an explanation that psychology and economics could not be adequately divided and that what people thought was happening and their impression of what was happening had an enormous effect on the markets, on confidence and on investment. Therefore, the two things go together.

Of course there was a great deal of irrationality about the frantic activity on the exchanges last week and the week before, but equally that irrationality was in part based on what was only to be regarded as a rational judgment about investment prospects. I can explain why that is. Many reasons have been given for the run on the pound. The Chancellor acknowledges only two, the instability in oil prices and the strength of the dollar, but there are two more. I know that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition will agree with me that these are the rational judgments of hard-headed men who have seen the Chancellor and come to some conclusions, not only from his performance but from what he said.

First, until 11 o'clock on Friday morning, the Government had no exchange rate policy and therefore the market had no idea at what point the Chancellor and the Government would stand and fight. Secondly, and perhaps more importantly, the Government in general and the Chancellor in particular have openly boasted that a continual depreciation, matched with the dollar denomination of the price of oil, would increase the financial adjustment that would enable him to cut taxes. As the Chancellor said that, and as his economic adviser explained in great detail to the Select Committee that continued depreciation and oil being denominated in dollars meant that the Chancellor had more money in his fiscal deficit with which to finance tax cuts, there was a suspicion that the right hon. Gentleman wanted that massive depreciation to meet the demands of his Back Benchers for massive tax cuts.

Mr. Richard Ryder (Mid-Norfolk): In order to meet his own high standards in honesty, will the right hon. Gentleman say whether he wants a higher or lower exchange rate?

Mr. Hattersley: The hon. Gentleman should not play such palpable games. What I want, and I freely acknowledge that I shall not get, is a different economic policy from the Government. Anybody who believes that I or any of my hon. Friends will fall into the trap of offering tinkerings within the disaster area of the Government's economic policy should improve his tactics. We are calling for a radical shift and change of economic policy. Asking whether there is a better or worse exchange rate, different by 10 per cent. either way, is like asking me where I would like the deck-chair to be placed on the Titanic before it hits the iceberg.

The run on sterling was in part caused by the Chancellor's boast that depreciation gave him more money for tax cuts, but it was caused by other things as well. Just before Christmas, the Chancellor was talking about having £3 billion to distribute. Yesterday, he was not even sure whether he could maintain the £1·5 billion boast. The fact that he has said so many conflicting things and that hardly anybody outside this country as well as inside trusts either his judgment or his statements has had a deeply damaging influence on our prospects.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): Will the right hon. Gentleman quote, with references, the occasion on which he alleges that I said that there would be a £3 billion fiscal adjustment? I have never said anything of the sort on any occasion.

Mr. Hattersley: Immediately after the last debate on public expenditure, the right hon. Gentleman, or his agent, briefed every newspaper saying that he hoped for twice as much as he had previously hoped for. The right hon. Gentleman now only adds to his reputation for saying different things on different days. That reputation has done deep damage to the prospects of our economic recovery. The problems of the sterling depreciation were enormously intensified—building on the absence of any exchange policy and the boast about the advantages of depreciation for tax cuts—by the nervous paralysis that inflicted the Chancellor last week. They were then multiplied by the contradictory briefings that were given one day by the Treasury and on the following day by Downing street.

If the right hon. Gentleman wishes to contradict that, I hope that he will tell me of the errors made in the article by Mr. Samuel Brittan, not always the most devoted supporter of Socialism, which set out the names of the officials who have given the contrary briefings that caused the problem to accelerate towards the end of last week.

The problem was brought to a head by the Chancellor's indecision running up to yesterday morning. About an hour and half ago the Prime Minister changed tack again and tried to brush the problem aside, saying that this was not a sterling crisis but a crisis for all currencies and a crisis from which all countries similarly suffered. Some right hon. and hon. Members might ask what all the fuss and panic yesterday was about, whether the crisis were as small as the Prime Minister had suggested. Others will ask whether the Prime Minister did not know, or whether she simply chose not to tell the House, that when she said that Britain's currency has depreciated against the dollar but so, too, had the European currencies, that sterling has depreciated against European currencies as well. That is the essential, and, I fear, intentional error in the Prime Minister's answer. Sterling has depreciated by one-third against all currencies, not just against the dollar, and for the Prime Minister to pretend that the dollar strength is what caused the crisis on Friday and Monday is to deceive herself or to attempt to delude the country.

The underlying cause for the collapse of sterling is the basic weakness of the economy. This leads to the Opposition's second contention—another contention that divides us from the Government—that the abandonment of the medium-term financial strategy would both reduce unemployment and strengthen the economy. There should be positive measures to improve the employment prospects of the country.

That is why the leader of the Social Democratic party, the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), was silly to spend Sunday afternoon, if the newspapers are to be believed, frantically phoning journalists to denounce what he described as diversions from the assault on the Government. The diversion to which he took particular exception was my proposal for repatriating British capital invested abroad, for increasing investment in British industry, and indirectly as a result of those two things, stabilising sterling values. I say to the right hon. Gentleman that anybody can abuse the Chancellor, as the Daily Mail proved adequately this morning, but what we now need are some positive statements of alternative policy to what the Government are pursuing. We shall certainly not get them from the leader of the SDP since he supports the Government's economic policy. He said on television last night—and I hope that Conservative Members are prepared to cheer—that the economy is now being run better than it has been run for 25 years. He is, in fact, the crypto-Thatcherite against whom the leader of the Liberal party warned.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Will the right hon. Gentleman give us the chapter and verse of this extraordinary statement that was made on television last night? Since I was on television last night and since I said nothing of the sort, I should be grateful to be told the reference. If not, the right hon. Gentleman should withdraw.

Mr. Hattersley: I offer two pieces of evidence. First, I and many of my hon. Friends saw the right hon. Gentleman; secondly, it is reported in detail in today's Daily Mail.

Dr. Owen: If the right hon. Gentleman finds when he looks at a transcript of what I said on television that he is wrong, will he withdraw it tomorrow?

Mr. Hattersley: Of course. In that unlikely event I shall certainly withdraw it, and I take it that the right hon. Gentleman will take appropriate action against the Daily Mail. That is a bargain, is it not, Mr. Speaker? If I can make a sporting metaphor, I think that I have no takers in this.

I want to make one other point to the right hon. Gentleman. He complained that the assault on the Government's management of sterling was not adequate. An assault of some sort we made yesterday afternoon. Unfortunately, the right hon. Gentleman was not present to take part in it. I know exactly where the right hon. Gentleman was. He was down the road arguing that he should be allowed to appear on television more often.

Putting aside these irrelevancies, I repeat that it is the Labour party's view, although apparently not the view of the alliance, that the whole economy would benefit from an increase in real demand.

On 13 December 1984 the Prime Minister appeared momentarily to endorse that view. At the time she was extolling the virtues of tax cuts that the Government were then proposing, and no doubt as the afternoon wears on we shall hear whether the Government's proposition remains. The right hon. Lady said:

"Reduction of tax can lead to extra jobs, as it leads to extra demand." — [Official Report, 13 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 1202.]

May we be told categorically whether that was one of the Prime Minister's slips or whether, at least at that moment, she meant that an increase in demand was a desirable way of changing the Government's economic posture? [Interruption.] I think that the Prime Minister is saying something — perhaps she would like to say it to the whole House.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): An increase in demand as used by the right hon. Gentleman usually means printing money. As he knows, I completely and utterly reject that.

Mr. Hattersley: It is not an answer to my question, but it is an answer to a question. My question was: did the Prime Minister mean it when she said that an increase in demand would create more jobs? On previous occasions she has merely gone on about mini cars being sold, but not enough of them being British. The demand is there, she said. But on 13 December she changed tack and the House, the country and perhaps even the markets are entitled to know whether that was an error, whether it was then intended or whether it has since been withdrawn.

I ask the Chancellor that question specifically: does he believe that an increase in demand is desirable? I must tell the Chancellor——

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: I have given way a great deal. I look forward enormously to giving way more in a moment, but I think that for the time being I ought to obey Mr. Speaker's strictures and press on so that other hon. Members may contribute.

In the past we have always been told that what would improve employment in the country is not a shift in demand, but a shift in the supply side of the economy. I tell the Chancellor at once that I share his view that radical alterations are needed in the structure of the economy. I want a tougher competition policy. I want new forms of industrial investment. I want more effective training programmes.

Indeed, my complaint about what the Chancellor has to say about the supply side is that the changes that he proposes are so unambitious. They amount to two things. They amount to arcane tax adjustments and to a call for lower real wages. He will tell us—because he always tells us—that lower real wages are the sovereign and certain cure for unemployment. If the Government choose to make a massive boost to demand, I say, as I have always said, that a moderation of wage claims would ensure or help to ensure that the new resources were concentrated on job creation, but in present circumstances when demand is inadequate — and on 13 December 1984 it was inadequate even by the Prime Minister's judgment—a reduction in real wages is an unreasonable proposition and an unattainable objective. To my regret, I suppose there is one area where it may be achieved and that is the public sector where the Government are pressing their own employees to accept a wage increase of 3 per cent. even though the inflation forecast is 5 per cent. or more. But in the public sector a reduction in real wages will not produce any more jobs because the Government will make sure that there is a reduction of jobs throughout that sector.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer knows very well the truth about a reduction of wages in the private sector. It will not happen and it is not worthwhile for him to demand it except, of course, for the fact that to the Government the beauty of advocating wage cuts is the knowledge that they will not come about and the consequent opportunity that provides the Government to blame somebody else for their own failures to reduce unemployment.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether he favours higher wage increases and more inflation, and will he further say what effect that will have on unemployment?

Mr. Hattersley: This must be the last time I give way because of the fatuous questions that I am asked. That is not so much a fatuous statement as an admission of inattention. Two moments ago I made it absolutely clear —and I gladly repeat the exact words—that I want to see a massive boost in demand and a moderation of wages which ensures that that boost in demand is concentrated on job creation rather than an increase in money wages. But without the massive boost in demand the wage increases will not be moderated and it is unreasonable to expect that they would be.

Having explained that to the hon. Gentleman as simply as I can, let me go on to say that I suspect that this afternoon in this very area — the supply side of the economy—the Chancellor will tell us that it is necessary to do what we can to cut taxes in a way that is tantamount to holding down wages in order to make possible certain adjustments to the economy. He will go on to say that it is also necessary to cut taxes to alleviate what is fashionably called the poverty and unemployment trap and therefore encourage individuals who previously would have chosen not to work to find jobs. I find that a rather offensive analysis of the psychology of the unemployed.

If the Chancellor is to advocate the view that the unemployment and poverty trap has to be alleviated not by increases in child benefit but by cuts in taxes, I hope that he will read with some care the work done on this subject by the Institute of Fiscal Studies. I shall read its conclusion on this very point:

". . . any Chancellor who rises on Budget Day and claims that by increasing income tax allowances he has made significant inroads into the poverty and employment traps, or started to sort out the nonsensical interactions between the tax and benefit systems, is simply talking ill-informed nonsense."

I look forward to hearing the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject. In the light of that, I ask him whether, as he can best judge today, he intends to pursue the policy of tax cuts which he outlined in the debate on the Estimates. If so, is he doing so solely to influence the supply side of the economy, or is he still claiming—as he and the Prime Minister have claimed — that by cutting taxes there will be a boost to demand that improves job prospects more substantially, pound for pound, than using the available resources in any alternative way?

We know, of course, that the primary purpose of a cut in income tax rates is to boost the popularity of the Tory party, but I must ask the right hon. Gentleman how he believes that his proposed tax cuts will affect the unemployment figures. Does he believe that there is a better way of using the money at his disposal? I do not think that cutting taxes and letting the unemployed fend for themselves will have the political result that the right hon. Gentleman hopes for and the Prime Minister expects. I share the view expressed or implied by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup that to choose that course would be an insult to the unemployed. I believe that there are millions of voters, including Conservative voters, who have grown more prosperous over the past five years and who would benefit from tax cuts, but who would be revolted by the prospect of their being made more prosperous while the unemployed are left to remain without work.

In my concluding passages I hope to demonstrate that cutting taxes cannot remotely reduce unemployment in the way that the Prime Minister has now taken it upon herself to pretend. I have always argued—and will continue to argue—that direct investment in jobs is a far better way of achieving that aim, pound for pound, than tax cuts. But before I demonstrate that as best I can, I shall consider how much there is available to spend on tax cuts or alternatively on direct job creation.

I assume—I have no doubt that the statement by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is intended to contribute to this end—that when the Budget comes along the Chancellor of the Exchequer will find it possible to provide the £1·5 billion fiscal adjustment that is, on his present plans, to be devoted to tax reductions. If the Chancellor wished, he could of course retain the public sector borrowing requirement at its present level—still an appreciably smaller percentage of gross domestic product than is the case with many of our more successful competitors.

After running a long interview with the right hon. Gentleman and a long article by him, The Sunday Times then went on to advocate quite a different course of action which he could take—the spending of £3 billion on job creation and the like. But today I am not even advocating that proposal or cross-examining the Chancellor on it. I am saying that within his own parameters and the terms that he has set himself—or had set himself until Friday—there was £1·5 billion to spend. Conservative Back Benchers who have prepared speeches on the profligacy of the Labour party's proposals had better tear them up for this debate at least, because this afternoon I seek only to argue about how the Chancellor proposes to spend the money that he himself says is at the nation's disposal.

Within the terms of the Chancellor's own policy he could, if he thought it sufficiently important, use the money to act directly against unemployment. As a byproduct of that, without changing the tax income a penny or a pound, he could use some of the £3 billion annual reliefs that have been enjoyed by the better-off to carry out a redistribution within the tax budget and to do something about taking the lowest paid out of tax altogether.

But the Chancellor always chooses the high unemployment option when deciding how to spend his money. When I urged that some of the £1·5 billion should be spent on job creation and when, at a recent Prime Minister's Question Time, I urged that it should be spent on direct investment, the Prime Minister said, "Well, that's all very well, but it would create more jobs if it was devoted to the direct employment creation measures." That might be true but the Prime Minister does not propose to spend the money on that either, but to use it to cut taxes.

There is overwhelming evidence to show that to use the money available to cut taxes would not reduce unemployment by anything like the amount by which it would be reduced if the money was used for direct job creation in two forms. First, the money should be used on the infrastructure. It should be spent on the public sector housing stock and on roads. To spend the money in that way would have two automatic and parallel benefits. Our depleting and collapsing capital stock and our infrastructure would be renewed—and while there was time to do so at a massive but not overwhelming cost. If the Government do not respond to the recommendations of the National Economic Development Office report, the deterioriation will continue to such a degree that it will become impossible to restore our infrastructure.

In spending money on building houses, recreating roads, moving the docks into the second half of the 20th century and on all the other desirable projects that are in themselves necessary and right, the Prime Minister would be restoring and creating jobs. She could also do that—and should do it—by a programme of direct job creation in the public sector that would similarly have double benefits. This country needs more nurses, more home helps and more people working in the inner cities. To employ them both rehabilitates our social services and puts the men and women thus employed back into jobs.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way, because I am mindful that he has now been speaking for more than half an hour. Will he address his mind to the terms of the motion to which he has put his name and tell us what the "largest number of jobs", which is to be found in the motion, means? How many jobs is he talking about? The Labour party has talked of creating 1 million extra jobs. Surely the cash that he has mentioned could not produce that number of jobs. Where will he obtain the extra cash from? What will it cost in extra taxation?

Mr. Hattersley: The hon. Gentleman has not been listening either. I have told him exactly what money I was discussing and what money I was asking the Chancellor of the Exchequer to comment on. The point is not that the hon. Gentleman does me no courtesy but that he does the House no courtesy in wasting time with such frivolous interventions.

I am dealing with the £1·5 billion that the Chancellor of the Exchequer claims to have at his disposal. I am arguing, with the London Business School—once the repository of all economic wisdom—the Institute of Fiscal Studies, the National Institute of Social and Economic Research and even with the figures worked out on the Treasury's own model, that to spend that £1·5 billion to cut unemployment by direct means would in two years cut it by 73,000, whereas to use it to cut taxes would reduce the unemployment total by only rather less than half of that—35,000.

The evidence that I wish to draw to the attention of the House goes further than that. There is a lot of evidence within the Government, from the Department of Trade and Industry, to show that by using the money for direct job creation one is spending the money more directly in the United Kingdom and not dissipating it on imports that create jobs for other people in other countries. The figures of the Department of Trade and Industry demonstrate two or three conclusive points. If money is invested in construction, only 15 per cent. of it finds its way abroad into competitor economies. If money is spent on domestic electrical equipment or textiles, 40 per cent. of it ends up abroad. Those are the sorts of items on which the money will be spent if it is used to reduce taxes.

When the Chancellor of the Exchequer had that point to deal with in his article in The Sunday Times two weeks ago he did not deal with the figures or with the input/output tables of the Department of Trade and Industry. He merely took refuge in some sort of sentimental chauvinism saying that he had hopes and beliefs that the British people would not spend their money on foreign textiles and videos. Before the right hon. Gentleman expresses such hopes and boasts, I wish that he would talk to some of my hon. Friends who represent Lancashire constituencies. They would tell him that the increase in expenditure on textiles that is likely to come about by a reduction in taxes and increased consumption would be forced into foreign markets because of the collapse of the Lancashire textile industry which has been brought about largely by his Government during the past four years. There is no alternative, and to dismiss that fact by romanticism about faith in the character of the British people is to fly in the face of the facts. That is a habit indulged in by weak-minded Chancellors and even weaker-minded boards of prejudiced opinion dressed up to look like objectivity.

The Institute of Directors' policy unit has produced a paper on this subject. The institute says that to allege that taxes contribute more to imports than any other form of public increase in expenditure is a counsel of despair. It may be a counsel of despair, but it is also true. If the Chancellor wants to invest in jobs he will, therefore, use his money in the way that every authority demonstrates creates the most jobs—what the Prime Minister calls the "measures" and what other people want to see by way of direct investment.

My conclusion—I say this with no pleasure but with deep regret for constituencies such as mine in the northern half of which unemployment runs at 50 per cent. among adult males—is that the Chancellor will not change his ways, because they conform to his policy to choose the high unemployment policy and regard the unemployed as a low economic and low political priority.

Two weeks ago, the Chancellor promised the country a budget for jobs. That was not a wholly original phrase, because last year the Chancellor promised the country a budget for jobs. Unemployment has risen remorselessly. I do not know whether the Chancellor's habit of boast one day and counter-boast the next, claim one day and counter-claim the next, is the result of his wish to deceive, the product of the economy being wholly outside his control, or the outcome of his personality which oscillates from the manically aggressive to the depressively incoherent. Having seen one phase of his character yesterday, I assume that the right hon. Gentleman will be breaking the furniture this afternoon. Whatever the Chancellor's mood happens to be, I tell him that it is now widely accepted, as the right hon. Gentleman must know if he has read a single newspaper today, that his Chancellorship has been a disaster for this country. While he remains in office, combining strategic ineptitude with technical incompetence, there is no hope of reducing unemployment.

5.12 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'rejects the Opposition's doctrinaire commitment to higher government spending and endorses the Government's determination to pursue responsible fiscal and monetary policies, which, along with its policies to improve the efficient working of the economy, provide the only secure basis for ensuring continuing low inflation, steady growth and rising employment.'.

This debate has been somewhat overshadowed by recent events in the markets. I should like to ask the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) to have the courtesy, at least on this topic, to answer the question put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder) on whether the exchange rate should be higher or lower. It is no use the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook just sitting there with that "Oh to be in Nicaragua look" about him, because in the past he has not hesitated to express views on the exchange rate. Suddenly, when he raises this important issue, he has nothing to say about the exchange rate.

The turbulence in the financial markets recently, especially in the foreign exchange market, results from three main causes. The right hon. Gentleman conceded two of those causes in a broadcast the other day. Those causes are outside the Government's control. One cause is the strength of the dollar. It is important to recognise that, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said earlier today, we are seeing a massive and excessive strength in the dollar. The dollar has reached an all-time high against other currencies besides sterling.

It is interesting to examine what has happened during the whole period since the Conservative party first assumed office in 1979 and to note the movements in sterling against various currencies or groups of currencies. During that five and a half year period as a whole there has been a reduction in the value of sterling of 46 per cent. Against the deutschmark—the strongest of the European currencies—the reduction has been 9 per cent. Against the European monetary system index as a whole the value of sterling has increased by 5 per cent. It is clear from those figures that there has been a massive surge in the value of the dollar. That is causing concern to people throughout the world, including those responsible for economic policy in the United States.

The second phenomenon has been the weak oil market. It is true, as the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) and other hon. Members pointed out yesterday, that there are benefits to us from lower oil prices. The plain fact is, however, that the present state of uncertainty only adds to the pressure on sterling, and we no more want an unstable oil market than we want an unstable foreign exchange market. We cannot influence the world price for oil in any substantial way.

We must assess the extent to which the exchange movements which result from those two factors put future inflation measures at risk, because we must always have that point in our sights. There is no mechanistic way of doing that. It is a matter of judging the combination of monetary growth and the exchange rate that will keep financial policy on track. At times this means that we may have to have a lower exchange rate and higher interest rates than we would like. Taken together, there is no risk whatever to the counter-inflation policy; nor, as we have seen from the events in July, is there any threat to the prospect for growth and employment.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West): Given that there has been such a minor devaluation against the deutschmark, why is there no panic about the deutschmark, and why is the three-month lending rate in Germany still 7 per cent. as opposed to 12 per cent. here?

Mr. Lawson: The reason is that the Germans have succeeded — I admire their success — in bringing the inflation rate down to a much lower level than we have done. Germany has an inflation rate of less than 2 per cent. That is why the Germans can have that level of interest rate.

The third factor is related most closely to the Opposition's motion. I am afraid that there was a feeling in the markets that the Government had lost their willingness and ability to control their affairs so as to maintain the downward financial pressure on inflation. It is clear from market behaviour that this fear was much stronger overseas than at home, and it is easy enough to see why. Those who deal in these markets do not need to know the truth; they need only play safe. The foreign exchange dealers in the middle east, Europe or the United States cannot be sure that the rantings of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook will be treated with the contempt they deserve. When they read the newspapers and see that, apparently, the CBI is allied with the TUC at NEDC, they do not realise that the CBI wishes to cut public expenditure. The foreign exchange dealers see only the news of the massive increase proposed by the TUC. They know that, when all the talk is of increasing public expenditure, they had better watch out. They play safe and move into the already excessively strong dollar, and the subsequent slide in the value of sterling can damage inflationary expectations. We come close to a vicious circle, and that is why the authorities' reaction had to be correspondingly robust. That is why we did not merely raise interest rates, but raised them decisively in a high profile way, using the Bank of England minimum lending rate. That instrument was specifically retained for just such circumstances.

Mr. Hattersley: The right hon. Gentleman says that he raised interest rates decisively. Does he mean his first bite on Friday, or his correction on Monday?

Mr. Lawson: I should have more respect for that intervention if at any time prior to the increase in interest rates the right hon. Gentleman had once suggested that interest rates should be increased. The use of MLR was retained for just such purposes, and policy overall will maintain even further downward pressure on inflation, because in no circumstances will this Government take risks with inflation.

The simple lesson is that the millions of people around the world who use sterling for one reason or another will not accept that we can produce a more successful economy simply by providing more public money for this or that project—quite the reverse; and of course they are right. We recall what happened when the newly elected Socialist Government of France attempted to do this not many years ago.

If growth, employment and economic success were simply matters of public expenditure, every country would have a successful economy, because there is nothing difficult about public expenditure. Indeed, they would have even more successful economies by spending more and then more again. I can see why observers from overseas are amazed to hear that there are some in this country who still believe in this ancient form of witchcraft.

I reject equally strongly the idea that we can somehow cut ourselves off from the rest of the world. The 1980s are not the 1960s. We are part of Europe. We are part of an integrated Western world. We play an important part—I hope that it will be an increasingly important part—in the international financial system, which provides income and jobs for our people. The Euro-markets centre on London and foreign banks have their European headquarters here.

We could throw the business away if we wished—clearly the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook wishes us to do so—but there would be plenty of other countries willing to take it on. But even if we were to do it, we still could not put back the information technology lock, which means that there is a market somewhere which can be, and is, actively dealt in 24 hours a day every day. Nor can we alter the fundamental fact that the exchange rate is determined in the modern world by flows of capital of immense size. They cannot be stopped by exchange controls or grotesque devices such as the right hon. Gentleman's latest wheeze to penalise overseas investment; presumably, incidentally, overseas investment in the developing countries as well. We live in an integrated financial world, whether we like it or not, and that is the backcloth to this debate.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): The right hon. Gentleman said that we were part of an integrated Europe. If so, why have we not joined the EMS? Is it not simply because the right hon. Gentleman has no exchange rate policy and cannot possibly join a system of fixed parity?

Mr. Lawson: We have not joined the EMS because, on the balance of the advantages and disadvantages—and there are both—we have decided that at present it would not be right to join. So far from not being a member of Europe, the ecu market is more highly developed in London than it is in any other financial centre throughout the European Community.

Meanwhile, the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook persists in arguing—[Interruption.] He does not like listening to any views other than his own; he might have the courtesy to pay attention to what I am saying—that the economy remains in recession and that there has been no recovery. He accused the Prime Minister of some falsification or other, which he was totally unable to sustain. The only falsification which was sustained was his attribution of remarks to myself and the leader of the Social Democratic party, neither of which bore any relation to the facts.

The right hon. Gentleman's interpretation of the economy is extraordinary and is a distortion of the evidence. Output has been rising steadily since the first half of 1981. We are now well into the fourth year of rising output in Britain and that rate of growth has, by historical standards, been most respectable. Between the first half of 1981 and the first half of last year GDP grew at nearly 3 per cent. a year, allowing for the effects of the coal strike.

The right hon. Gentleman talks of boosting demand. There has been no shortage of demand. Indeed, the figures for the last three and a half years, when they are finally in, are expected to show a growth of domestic demand of more than 3 per cent. a year—faster than the equivalent period under Labour.

The balance of demand has also been better. As the House knows, investment—private and public together—has been making a major contribution to growth, and it continues to do so. During the period 1975 to 1979—the recovery period under Labour—consumer spending grew twice as fast as fixed investment. During the current recovery the position has been exactly reversed, with investment growing twice as fast as consumer spending. When final figures are available, they are likely to show that total investment last year reached an all-time record level in real terms, with an increase of 7½ per cent. between 1983 and 1984.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that during the recessionary period of the Conservative Government consumption fell by far less than investment?

Mr. Lawson: That is true of every recession.

What really upsets the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook is that the economy is set to continue to grow at 3 per cent. A continuation of growth is likely because it is based on sound conditions. That is not just the Government's view. It is the view of the OECD, the annual report of which has just been published and which states, talking about the United Kingdom:

"Recovery may be rather more durable for it now appears better balanced and it has not been as dependent as in the past on a strong contribution from stock building and an expansionary fiscal policy."

That is the verdict of the OECD, and that is right, though that is not all. Rising inflation is the mechanism which, in the past, has brought so many recoveries to an end. The striking feature of this recovery, which marks it out from virtually all upturns since the war, is that we do not face rising inflation.

As the House knows, the reason why we do not have rising inflation is that the Government have persistently pursued financial policies which have supported the recovery of output and declining inflation. Opposition Members have eagerly hung on the words of any commentator they could find who would pronounce the imminent ending of recovery and the onset of recession, and then slavishly repeated those assertions. They have not been short of allies. We have heard it year in and year out ever since the recovery began, but on each occasion they have been proved wrong. They have been wrong mainly because they have failed to understand the key role that financial policy has played in reducing inflation and in supporting the growth of output.

The strength and durability of our recovery is, on the whole, well understood—other than by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook and his hon. Friends—and it is respected throughout the world. The OECD, some of whose words I have quoted, has come to recognise it.

Mr. D.N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Does the Chancellor believe that the prospect of recovery would be helped by a dollar-pound parity?

Mr. Lawson: No, I do not. [Interruption.] At least Opposition Members get a direct answer from me.

The claim of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook that there has been no recovery is based entirely on the unemployment figures and, of course, it is a great source of concern to us all that unemployment remains high. It is crucial to understand the fundamental reason for that and for its relationship to the growth of output. Fundamentally, it is due to the strangulation of the economy in the 1970s, the painful visibility of what was hidden for so long, and to the quite unrealistic rates of pay settlements.

By the end of the 1970s the United Kingdom had a large degree of disguised unemployment. Everybody knows that a combination of controls and sluggishness to adjust produced widespread and heavy overmanning in a wide section of British industry.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West) rose——

Mr. Lawson: That is clear from the statistics of the time. In the wake of the first oil price shock—the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas), who is an expert on the oil industry, will recall this—productivity growth in the non-oil economy was negligible. There was scarcely any growth whatever. Had employers followed the pattern of earlier periods and adjusted employment in line with output, unemployment in 1979 would have been much higher than it was. What has happened over the past five years is that we have seen the painful process of adjusting to realistic manning levels.

Mr. Douglas: If the Chancellor is concerned about the level of unemployment, has he or his officials made any assessment of the opportunity cost of unemployment? Does he accept that it is costing the nation £30 billion to have the level of unemployment at which he is running the economy? That sum has gone for good. That is the cost of the Government's policies.

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Gentleman does not have to tell me that unemployment has a cost. Of course it has a cost, not merely in financial terms, but in social and human terms. The question before the House is: what are the policies that have the biggest chance of bringing unemployment down? That is what we are concerned with. The starkest evidence of the change of trend is the rapid growth of productivity in recent years. This has reflected industry's attempt to recapture the efficiency which was lost in the 1970s. Productivity in manufacturing industry in particular has risen by more than 20 per cent. since 1980. This is excellent for efficiency, and it is good for costs, but, sadly, it is as bad for jobs in the short term as it is good for them in the long term.

Despite the need to adjust, the overall employment situation would have been much better without the damagingly high rates of pay settlements. The Opposition speak of their concern for unemployment but never lose an opportunity to support any action that will lead to higher pay rates. There could be no starker example of the triumph of opportunism over genuine concern for the plight of the unemployed. Despite the damagingly high growth of earnings, employment has begun to rise. The latest published estimates suggest that the number of people in work in the United Kingdom rose in the most recent year for which we have full figures, while employment was still falling in West Germany and in France. Although registered unemployment stands much too high, it is often forgotten that this country has one of the highest proportions of people in work amongst all the major countries, and well above the European average.

A second significant indication of improving job prospects is the recovery of company profitability, where for so long Britain has lagged wretchedly behind its main competitors. For 1984 the Confederation of British Industry now expects companies operating outside the North sea to show a real net pre-tax return of 7½ per cent., while for this year, 1985, it is forecasting a 9 per cent. real return. If this is achieved, it will be the highest rate of return that we have seen in this country since the 1960s.

In money terms, profits outside the North sea were up 20 per cent. in the year to the third quarter of 1984. There could be no better news for the unemployed than that British industry is once again profitable. It cannot be repeated too often that it is companies, not Governments, which create jobs. It is the job of the Government to do their best to create the conditions in which business can flourish and create those jobs.

My answer to a question which the right hon. Gentleman put to me is that I have stressed on many occasions that we do not make forecasts of unemployment. The margin of error involved in such exercises is enormous, but I should like to take this opportunity to describe to the House the route which I expect to have the greatest possible chance of success in reducing unemployment. Inevitably, in the real world, the creation of jobs is a complex process and it is not possible to be too precise about the route through which new jobs will come. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman has no time for these subtleties. To him there is a simple and easy answer. He says that lower unemployment requires higher demand, that demand is unlikely to go fast enough under present policies and, therefore, that the Government should step in and boost demand. I do not think that I am traducing him when I say that that is what he is suggesting. [Interruption.] President Reagan's policy has been to achieve success entirely through tax cuts, which I shall come to later.

The right hon. Gentleman ignores the failure of his suggested approach to work in the past, because it is not for want of trying, and he simply debates the extent of the largest boost that could be made to sound respectable, a figure which differs each time we debate the issue in the House. That is a mistaken approach. Because of the Government's financial policies, we can be confident that there will be sufficient money demand to generate the growth needed to reduce unemployment, provided inflation continues to fall. It is a question not of creating sufficient demand, but of whether the economy works well enough to be able to take advantage of that demand. That is why I have characterised unemployment as a supply side problem, rather than a demand problem; a problem to be solved by micro-economic reform, and not by fiscal irresponsibility.

With a well-functioning, efficient economy it is not difficult to see the route by which unemployment would decline in the years ahead. Inflation would fall, leaving room within the monetary targets for faster output growth. Real wages would grow sufficiently slowly for company profitability to rise to a level that would encourage firms to expand their capacity and enlarge their markets and their work forces. Lower public spending and taxation as a proportion of gross domestic product would help sustain the growth of disposable income and consumer spending and help incentives by removing some of the severe distortions in the tax and benefit system. Throughout industry productivity would rise faster once restrictive practices were ended and obstacles to the use of best practice techniques were removed.

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): Given that we are now in the real world and that in the real world only 6 per cent. of the school leavers on Merseyside this year went into full-time occupation, can the Chancellor say when these measures will provide jobs for the other 94 per cent.?

Mr. Lawson: As I pointed out a moment ago, the number of jobs in the economy is rising. But output per head in the economy as a whole might not improve to quite the same extent, as the more modest growth in real wages would boost employment in the more labour-intensive, and thus lower productivity, sectors. The growth of output would be above the growth of productivity. We would do better than we have in the past in maintaining our share of world trade and imports would not take the same share of domestic demand that they have been taking. We would probably see a faster turnover of jobs as people moved to those activities that best suited their ability, aptitude and skills. We would see more geographical and industrial mobility, and the structure of industry would change towards producing those goods that we were best at producing.

These are the characteristics of a well-functioning economy, and they are the only sustainable route to lower unemployment. The Government's supply side strategy is directly aimed at bringing about these conditions. It has been directed towards removing impediments and outdated controls. It has encouraged companies to adopt new techniques and to meet new markets. In general, it has been aimed at helping markets to work better. It has encouraged conditions which assist growth in output and jobs rather than, as too often in the past, holding them back.

The key aspect of micro-economic policy has been the removal of unnecessary obstacles, particularly those which stand in the way of those seeking work. To that end we have abolished controls on pay, prices, dividends, foreign exchange transactions and hire purchase contracts. We have removed unnecessary planning restrictions on industry. We have strengthened policies to promote competition. We have gone ahead with an unprecedented programme of privatisation. We have introduced the business expansion scheme and the loan guarantee scheme. In this context, one of the things that we suffer from most is that new businesses were not started 10 to 15 years ago which could have made a major contribution to our economy today. That is why it is so important to get them started now. We have reduced the rates of corporation tax. We have instituted the biggest programme of youth training ever. We have tackled the abuses of trade union power.

All that amounts over time to a transformtion of the supply side of the economy. The measures that we have already taken have helped to set us on the path towards a more enterprising economy. But there is more to be done, and there is more to be done by others, too, because the Government can do only so much. The private sector must respond and take the opportunities that have emerged. The demand is there, profitability has improved, and many of the obstacles to success have been removed.

[Mr. Lawson]

I am confident that we are seeing the first of the rewards from the steps to create a more enterprising economy, and there are more rewards to come.

The right hon. Gentleman's approach is to say that if there are supply side defects these can be overcome by more demand, but it is clear that "macro-economic policies cannot on their own make a major contribution to reductions in unemployment over the medium term."

Those are not my words but those of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development report. It goes on to say that "supply-side measures . . . are essential in this respect, especially those that reduce rigidities in the labour market".

I am glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman nods and agrees that we need to reform trade union law to reduce rigidities in the labour market.

It is simply not possible, except in the very short term, to offset supply side defects by more demand. The only answer is to remedy the defects. It is in that spirit that we must see the debate about public expenditure and taxation.

The choice between public expenditure and taxation has been characterised by the right hon. Gentleman exclusively as a matter of which creates the most demand. That is how he has presented it. But, as I have stressed, Government financial policy is already designed to deliver the right level of money demand. Therefore, the choice must be on the basis of what is best for the supply performance of the economy.

Mr. Hattersley: I believe that the Chancellor is now making a genuine mistake. The choice between public spending and taxation has been characterised by me according to which creates the most jobs. I understand that both create demand. My problem is that one creates demand in Japan, America and Germany. That is the point that I am trying to put to the Chancellor.

Mr. Lawson: Then the right hon. Gentleman must be opposed to any increase in pay, because that might also be spent on imported goods from Japan, Germany and France.

The choice is stark. As a nation, we have to choose between higher public expenditure and higher taxation or lower public expenditure and lower taxation. If a high public spending, high tax economy were the solution to our problems, the United Kingdom would have been the world's economic success story long ago. If high public spending and high taxation were the answer in the 1960s and 1970s, unemployment would not have risen from cycle to cycle and Government to Government. Profitability would not have fallen from cycle to cycle. Productivity growth would not have fallen behind that of other industrial countries, and living standards in this country would not have fallen so far behind those of our European neighbours.

If high public spending and high taxation were the answer in the 1960s and 1970s, our markets would not have been increasingly taken by imports, demand growth would not have outstripped supply performance, and inflation would not have become the curse it did become. Instead we would have prospered. After all, why should there be any end to that transfer of purchasing power from individuals to the state if that is the recipe that is proposed?

There is little difficulty in persuading Governments to tax and to spend. They have always found that very easy and convenient. So where did the policy go wrong? It went wrong because, although Governments may have enjoyed high public spending and high taxes, no one enjoyed the consequences. It was precisely because of high spending and high taxation that the problems that I have outlined emerged. High taxes damage performance and incentives, generate waste of resources, create huge distortions, reduce risk and initiative and banish the spirit of enterprise from our economy upon which everything depends. And it is only lower taxation and lower spending as a proportion of national output that will reverse those pressures.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): Can the Chancellor tell me and the 24,000 people in Wigan who are currently on the dole how they will be helped if tax cuts are given to the rich, who will benefit from them?

Mr. Lawson: I am talking, not about tax cuts for the rich, but about tax cuts for the population as a whole.

Of course lower taxes do not carry tickets with precise jobs written on them. That is not the way in which market economies work. However, the long-term benefits to employment are real and substantial.

Of course none of our policy denies the role of a worthwhile public sector investment programme. To listen to the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, one might imagine that the Government had stopped investing in the infrastructure and had ceased all capital expenditure. The facts conclusively demonstrate otherwise. Public sector capital expenditure has remained broadly stable in real terms since 1979, and in addition to the £24 billion of capital expenditure—public sector capital expenditure—in 1984-85, some further £5 billion has been spent on repairs and maintenance classified in the figures as current, but nevertheless restoring and enhancing the very assets to which the right hon. Gentleman referred. The right hon. Gentleman has only to look around him——

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): What about the Confederation of British Industry?

Mr. Lawson: Let me refer to the CBI as the right hon. Gentleman has mentioned it. It is concerned about spending on roads. Spending on trunk roads next year is planned to run at 25 per cent. up in real terms on the figure that we inherited in 1978-79. That is the truth. As for the water industry, it is planning to increase its investment next year by £70 million, a 9 per cent. rise.

Our record is good, even on the blinkered terms of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook. However, I do not display this as an exercise in statistical machismo, because public spending on infrastructure is not an end in itself. Any particular project has to be justified on its own merits, on the basis of its own rate of return, taking into account the wider economic and social benefits.

The right hon. Gentleman appears to be oblivious to those elementary points. Along with the Trades Union Congress, for example, he urges additional investment in the nationalised industries. Is he not aware of what the public corporations have said about that matter, as reported in the CBI paper entitled "Fabric of the Nation", published last summer? It states that for the present the nationalised industries

"take the view that, having pushed up their aggregate capital outlays by more than a half in the past five years, from £4,463 million in 1979-80 to £6,757 million in 1983-84, their present levels and patterns of investment spending are broadly consonant with the proper development of their businesses."

That is the view of the nationalised industries.

Public sector housing has reduced, but that is because of deliberate Government policy to shift housing from the public sector to the private sector, which is what the people want to see. Let us look at private sector capital expenditure on housing. Last year, in 1984, it was up roughly 20 per cent. in real terms over 1978, the last full year of the Labour Government. Last year it was running at its highest level ever in real terms. Total investment is also running at an all-time high, and we expect it to be higher still this year.

It is a commonplace of our critics to accuse the Government of obsession with theory and dogma. Yet, in the current discussion about whether employment is best served by lower taxes or by higher taxes spent on public spending, it is our critics who are the slaves of theory. To the man in the street it is pretty obvious that in a low tax economy incentives to work, invest, expand and therefore to create jobs are likely to be stronger than in an economy burdened by high taxes.

The man in the street is much more impressed by concrete examples than by econometric models. It is a fact that Japan and the United States — the two most successful economies at creating jobs and wealth—have far lower tax rates than the United Kingdom. Japan takes little more than a quarter of its citizens' income in tax and the United States takes about one third of its national income in tax, whereas we are taking not far short of half our national income in tax. Faced with that evidence, the man of common sense will not be readily convinced that we can become more efficient and create more jobs by burdening our people with taxes to pay for even higher public expenditure.

Our sophisticated critics dismiss all this as vulgar populism. What use is the concrete experience of Japan or America to a man who relies on an econometric computer model to tell him how the real world works?

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): Although my right hon. Friend is absolutely right to resist the temptation to see in a large public investment programme the real solution to unemployment, just before he assumes that the only possible alternative is the reduction of direct taxation, will he consider that at least part of any money that he might have to dispense during the Budget might well be dispensed by reducing employment costs—for example, by providing a holiday on employers' national insurance contributions? I am a little worried to find the polarised argument—that it is either one thing or the other—developing. Will my right hon. Friend not ignore the possibility of there being a middle way?

Mr. Lawson: That middle way is much closer to the way that I was advocating. I am glad to have my hon. Friend's support. He will recall that it was for this very reason that the Government abolished the national insurance surcharge — the tax on jobs — which the Labour Government imposed.

For the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook and his erstwhile right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), the computer simulations which they like to quote purport to show that £1,000 million spent on recruiting more civil servants would have six times as much effect on unemployment as £600 million spent on raising tax thresholds. That is what the simulations purport to show, yet no nation in the real world has ever attained full employment, higher living standards or sustained economic growth by taxing productive enterprise to build up its own payroll.

The Government are determined to tackle the harrowing problem of unemployment by the proven, commonsense route of restoring an enterprise economy. That means lower taxes, better rewards for success, fewer restrictions and trade unions being more responsive to their members. It means an education system geared to technical and marketable skills, incentives for new, small and expanding businesses and freedom to own one's home and so be able to move when a better job is available elsewhere. It means converting loss-making nationalised industries from leeches siphoning off resources from elsewhere into new centres of profit and enterprise in the private sector.

Those are the measures, across a broad front, which the Government have taken to transform the British economy. Consistent with the needs of our counter-inflation strategy, those are the policies with which we shall persist.

5.52 pm

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): The Chancellor has made much of OECD figures. One of the OECD's recent studies has sombre news for Britain. It shows that, of the 20 major industrial countries, our standard of living has slumped to fifteenth. It will not be long, on present trends, before Italy has a higher one. Against that sombre background, we should examine some of the Chancellor's statements.

When recalling some of the Chancellor's previous statements, it is not unreasonable that we should doubt the veracity of what he says and his capacity to predict. On 12 July he told us

> "There is no lack of confidence in sterling . . . I have every expectation that the fundamental soundness in the economy will be reflected by a resumption of the trend towards lower interest rates".—[Official Report, 12 July 1984; Vol. 63, c. 1400.]

That does not augur well for any of the statements that the Chancellor has made today.

We must deal, first, with the management of the exchange rate. The Government's management of the exchange rate—at the beginning the pound was worth $1·60, it increased to $2·40 and has now plunged to $1·10—reflects the Lawson style. It is a strange mixture of insouciance, indifference, intransigence and, finally, sheer incompetence. It is on the last that we indict the Chancellor today. In Question Time today, the Prime Minister made much of the fact that no one country has enough reserves to stop money moving around the world. She is right. There is no doubt about that. No country can deal with speculative flows on its own. The indictment of Britain's policy, especially in the past five years, is based on its inability to mobilise other countries, which feel similarly, to get co-ordinated and concerted international action.

The Chancellor indicts himself. He said today—the words would have fallen from his lips with more effect a few days ago — that no one has any interest in an unstable oil market or in an unstable exchange market. The Chancellor has been preaching the virtues of utter non-interference in what he purports to claim is a free market in energy prices, when everyone knows that that is complete nonsense. He has also preached the value of no interference in what he also likes to think is a free market in exchange rates. Exchange rates do not always follow market pressures. They are remarkably brittle and incredibly sensitive to irrational forces. I believe that some of the speculation in the past few days has been irrational. The problem is that that irrationality has been fuelled by the incompetence with which the Government have given signs to the market at home and internationally.

Many things can be done in an attempt to smooth exchange rate fluctuations. I favour moving away from the firm fixed exchange rates of the past. We have all learnt some lessons from the tragedies that resulted from hanging on to fixed exchange rates for far too long. However, other countries have recognised far more than the Government, it appears, that it is difficult to plan an industrial economy without rather greater stability in exchange rate markets. The Government seem not to understand that we have the power—it is not massive—to influence exchange rates instability by acting with other countries.

I should like to put to the Chancellor a few serious suggestions about what he should be doing. He is to go to Washington for a meeting of the Versailles group—the five key finance Ministers who already, under the Williamsburg and London summits, are enjoined to try to introduce greater exchange rate co-ordination and stability. The Chancellor will say that there is nothing that we can do about the strength of the dollar. However, there is a lot that the United States can do about the strength of the dollar and there is a lot that it ought to be doing. Moreover, there is much that Europe should be telling the United States straight about what it should do. Britain cannot achieve that alone as we have not the international or financial weight to carry through such a message in Washington.

It is the Chancellor's duty to tell the Treasury Secretary that we are not prepared to put up with the tight monetary policy that the United States is pursuing and the high interest rates that it involves, and that it is high time that the United States acted to relax its rediscount rate—the equivalent of our minimum lending rate. The Chancellor might say that the United States has no intention of doing that. If so, two things can be done. First, we must mobilise the French and the Germans so that the three European countries at the meeting speak together. That brings me back to asking why the Chancellor persistently refuses to gain the collective strength of being a member of the exchange rate system of the European monetary system.

The EMS is not the solution to all of our problems. Membership of it involves considerable disciplines. Anyone who believes that that is the soft option or that it means that there will be no increase in interest rates to defend the exchange rate is living in a fool's paradise. Those disciplines are broadly sensible ones within which this country can live. Over the past year, the pound sterling has not moved massively out of line with the EMS basket of currencies.

To declare this week our intention to join the EMS would have great value in showing the world that this country wanted a more stable exchange rate; would operate within a collective framework within Europe; and was prepared to accept the disciplines of the EMS.

The Chancellor may say that we cannot go in because the pound is too high against the deutschmark. He has said that we have moved down significantly against the deutschmark in the past few years. People can now argue whether the present rate of the deutschmark is competitive, and that if we are going into the EMS we should try to reach agreement to go in a little lower than the present deutschmark rate. I should like to go in at 3.40 or possibly even a little lower. On the point of entry, we could persuade our European colleagues that we should go in a little lower. That should be done. We should then find within the EMS it much easier to co-ordinate French and German pressure upon the United States to do something about the dollar.

It is interesting to note that the Bundesbank intervened in the market on Friday in co-operation with the Japanese authorities with the yen to sell dollars. They only did a little, but it is possible for Japan, France, Germany and the United Kingdom — other European countries would follow—to sell dollars if the United States still refuses to live up to its responsibilities. It is time that we said to the United States, "You are not just damaging us in Europe; you are doing grave damage to the Third world and the developing countries."

The Chancellor may say that the United States will still resist, that it is strong, and that even if Europe sold dollars in a co-ordinated way we should not be able to bring the dollar rate down. I have my doubts about that.

The Chancellor ignores the other pressure that the United Kingdom has. We are the fifth largest oil producer in the world at the moment. Because our oil is in a rather special category, we have more influence on oil prices than our fifth position might suggest. The Chancellor's stance has been hitherto not to intervene, we must be prepared to say to OPEC that while we had hitherto taken the view—rightly in my judgment—that our interest was not in combining to increase oil prices, and that it was an overall world economic interest to keep oil prices low, so we were not taking part in the cartel, if we were faced with United States' authorities who refused to act responsibly in their world role not just as custodians of the dollar but in terms of their impact across the world economy, we should have to start to intervene in oil prices. [AN HON. MEMBER: "In which way?"] We could reduce our production. That would have an effect also on our revenues. But it is too easy to say that is all right because the oil price is denominated in dollars and a fall in the pound increases our oil revenues. One of the reasons—the Chancellor has used it himself—why sterling has been under such pressure has been the oil price movement.

The Chancellor talks about us having a petro-currency and uses it as an argument against us entering the EMS. There are times when the Government should intervene in oil pricing. We have been much upset in the past few weeks by the actions of Statoil and the Norwegians. If we were to co-ordinate with them, as I believe we could, rather more effectively, we should have some impact on stabilising oil prices.

The policy of complete "hands-off" and of leaving oil pricing to market forces is wrong as it is in relation to the exchange rate. It is something in which the Chancellor has the power to intervene. He can intervene in two directions. They would both put added pressure on the United States. They would be essentially European pressures and would be in the overall interest of the world economy.

Mr. Alan Howarth: How does the right hon. Gentleman square his desire that there should be some depreciation of sterling against the deutschmark with his proposal that we should rig the oil market so as to increase the oil price?

Dr. Owen: The only way to achieve depreciation against the deutschmark over and above the one of 10 per cent. that we have had since 16 January 1984, and the depreciation of 7 per cent. against the French franc—it may be moving down as I speak—is to reach agreement on entering the EMS and on the rate at which we would enter. When entering or adjusting the EMS it has been a common practice to persuade the other countries involved to go in at a rate lower than the current market rate. I know that our European partners will not like that. They would prefer us to go in at a rate even higher than our present one. It is not unreasonable, however, for us to argue that, given the trends and our competitive figures against the deutschmark in comparative industries, we should be a little lower than we are currently—[Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman wants us to go in at the present rate, that is a reasonable position. I do not know why the Financial Secretary is laughing. That is a legitimate role, and he cannot have it both ways. Half the time, the Treasury has been arguing against our joining the EMS on the ground that we are not competitive.

I wish to deal with the subject of unemployment and the indictment of the Government by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). His quotation was wrong. The interpretation, in fairness to him, was not completely right even by the standards of the Daily Mail. In the comment I was referring to the position of the alliance parties. The end of that quotation states: "and the Alliance has got to be the party of the future." The complete quotation is:

"There is nothing right wing about running the country's economy rather better than it has been for the last 20 to 25 years and the Alliance has got to be the party of the future."

The quotation does not relate to what the Government have done. I made it clear—[Interruption.] I agree that it is poorly reported by the Daily Mail, but if the right hon. Gentleman wishes to make the allegation that he has, he should go to the proper text. His veracity was not helped by going on LBC on 27 September and describing me as being passionately in favour of private health and private education. I have never charged a patient in my life, and my children are going through a state education. It would not be a bad start for the right hon. Gentleman if he were a little closer to the truth.

Let us deal with the right hon. Gentleman's prescription for our economic future, and why we should support the Opposition's motion. First, on the point of substance, he is aware that we have long supported increases in public expenditure, but the problem with the motion—it must be coupled with the extraordinary speech that the right hon. Gentleman made on Sunday—is that it is a wholly false prescription for what the country needs. An increase in public expenditure is needed, but there is also a need for an increase in private investment. Infrastructure is not always public. A great deal of public ordering and contracting goes straight to the private sector.

Secondly, there is no shortage of funds for investment. Endless studies have demonstrated that, including one by the former Labour Prime Minister, Lord Wilson of Rievaulx. The money is available, but the problem is that people cannot use it because of the high interest rates. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook proposes the most extraordinary scheme whereby we coerce funds back from overseas—we force repatriation—create a nationalised bank, and then disburse funds at lower interest rates. There is great virtue in an industrial credit scheme. That proposal has been put forward by my party for some time. We could then channel investment into those areas of technology and industry that are starved of funds at the moment because they cannot afford them. The high interest rates which are the consequence of the Chancellor's action are worrying for industrial investment. There is whole raft of other matters where the Opposition's economic policies are not worthy of support.

I come now to the Government's and the Prime Minister's position on public expenditure. We are asked by the Prime Minister to believe that the current levels of public investment are in some way equal to the levels that were running in 1979. She was at it again last Thursday at Prime Minister's Question Time. But the figures do not bear this out. If one looks at forward investment in the national income and expenditure Blue Book we see that it has progressively fallen since 1973. If we take one particular example—roads—capital investment at 1980 prices has fallen progressively since 1973. It is lower now than it was in 1979. If these were just my criticisms they might be thought to be purely partisan. Yesterday a very interesting speech was made by the chairman of Wimpey in which he said:

"We have seen over the last five years a gradual deterioration in the availability of work that the Government is prepared to make to the construction industry; reducing from 60 per cent. of total workload in the 1970s to the present level of 40 per cent. We have seen the increase in the power of economists who pursue rigid financial policies which they assure the young people of this country, and the vast number of unemployed, that it will 'come right on the night'".

There are numerous industrialists in the country who are bitterly critical of the Government's neglect of the infrastructure. It is no use saying that the infrastructure does not need money to be spent upon it. In the Health Service the Davies report estimates a backlog of £2,000 million worth of repairs which have not been carried out, that half of the building stock in use pre-dates the first world war, that three-quarters of it pre-dates the 1939-45 war and that 88 per cent. of our mental health buildings are over 50 years old. It is not surprising to note that capital spending by the National Health Service as a percentage of total spending has fallen since 1974 from 10 per cent. to 6 per cent.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Owen: No. Twenty-five per cent. of secondary schools suffer from overcrowding; 900,000 temporary places are still in use; 25 per cent. of schools still have outdoor toilets; 90 per cent. are lacking buildings for practical subjects such as applied modern sciences. Do not tell me that construction work on some of these projects would not be an investment in our future. It would not suck in imports and it would bring work in the construction industry to some regions where 40 per cent. of construction workers are unemployed. Something has to be done about this.

Where is the money to come from? During the last few weeks we have been debating, to cheers from the Tory Benches, how £3 billion is to be spent upon tax cuts. We must have the courage to tell the electorate that it will be unable to have tax cuts of that sort at the standard rate of income tax and that it is not right to take a penny off the standard rate of income tax.

Mr. Howard rose——

Dr. Owen: The hon. and learned Gentleman must sit down for a second. If we are asked about tax thresholds, there are better ways of dealing with the problems of the disincentives which undoubtedly exist at the lower level of earnings. Ways of improving family support have to be introduced. Child benefit could be increased but it costs money. That may mean postponing tax cuts. It may be that we shall have to face increased indirect taxes. We have not opposed every single increase or extension of VAT. We wish there to be a widening of the base and some increase in indirect taxation. It has to be sensibly applied. It depends upon where the investment is going, exactly the point made today by my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth). If British Aerospace was to be sold off and the money invested in the new industries of the future, we should find it a great deal easier to support that sale.

Mr. Fisher: If the right hon. Gentleman wants there to be a widening of the VAT base, will he tell the House upon which items he would impose VAT?

Dr. Owen: I shall look at the question when it arises. I have made my views quite clear. I am not in favour of VAT on food. We shall look at the widening of the application of VAT or at an increase in the level of VAT when the matter arises—[Interruption.] It is a great joy for the two old parties to go over this ground again. If this country is going to invest in its future and do something about unemployment, people must be prepared to stand up and say that they are prepared to accept some increase in taxation, including indirect taxation. We would not impose VAT on food because we are trying to help those on low incomes. That is why we should increase child benefit and that is why we should not cut the heating allowance or housing benefits. We have to try to share the burdens more fairly. If, however, we are to reduce unemployment there is a cost. It is no good ducking the question. One such cost would be to borrow more than this Government are borrowing, but dangers are involved in borrowing. I believe that the Chancellor will not now have the same room for manoeuvre on the public sector borrowing requirement as he might have thought he had a week ago. Therefore, we have to face the fact that we may have to reduce the amount of money that we put into capital spending. There are other schemes, but they all cost money.

I wish to speak about the restructuring of the national insurance scheme. The national insurance contribution for employers is very considerable. It has been added to by this Government by £700 million more than the savings which Government made by getting rid of the jobs surtax. They have added to employers' costs. I believe that a restructuring and a reduction of that tax would help greatly, particularly if it were geared to helping those employers who are taking people off the long-term unemployment register. There is a massive degree of support for this, but it will cost money.

Again we shall be asked where the money will come from. It will add to the public sector borrowing requirement. It might also mean an increase in interest rates, although I do not believe that it would mean an increase in interest rates as they are at present because they have been jacked up, we are told, by forces outside the control of the Government. However, those Conservative Members who do not wish to face up to the issue of unemployment, who are completely insensitive to the consequences and who are not worried about its social impact will go on producing schemes for tax reductions. I am saying that there should not be tax reductions unless they are specifically and positively geared to creating more jobs.

The most effective way to create more jobs is by a combination of measures. There should be greater investment in the public sector and the private sector, especially in the construction industry—particularly over repairs. I suggest that people should look at what is happening to the secondary roads of our country and their total lack of maintenance.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton) rose——

Dr. Owen: No, I shall not give way. The hon. Gentleman can sit down and later make his speech in his own way.

The other matter is the restructuring of the contribution made by employers towards national insurance. Preferably there should be an overall reduction in order to ensure that restructuring does not hit even those who are employed in high tech industries but, if not, because there is insufficient money, there should be internal restructuring which would be self-financing.

Thirdly, the community programme needs more money to be spent upon it. This is perhaps the most cost effective way of creating jobs, but it does not have quite the same forward investment potential and does not have quite the same long-term return as insulation or repair of poor housing stock or new capital construction projects. The Government will have to face up to all of these problems. If hon. Members are prepared to let unemployment rise or stay at its present levels, they will look for tax cuts from the Chancellor of the Exchequer and hope that they will win back for them some of the Conservative support which they are losing in by-election after by-election. However, there are others who are determined to get something done about unemployment and who are prepared to ask for a reasonable measure of sacrifice from those people who are in jobs and who are reasonably affluent. That cannot be done at the expense of those people who are already on low wages and at the expense of some of those on pensions and fixed benefits. We must simultaneously do something about them.

I wish that the Chancellor could have presented such a broad approach today. To ask the House, and, through the House, the country, to endorse his economic posture and his economic mess of potage that has surfaced over the past few days is an insult.

I should have loved to believe that the debate—it should have been such a debate—would have combined those critics of the Government's policy across the House of Commons and that we would have had a motion from the Leader of the Opposition for which all of us could have voted which may not have been what he and his party wanted but which was what the country wanted. We would have gladly voted for such a motion.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): That is not the Opposition's style.

Dr. Owen: As my right hon. Friend says, that is not their style. Their style is to pursue their own narrow interests at the expense of the national interest. That is not the approach of the two alliance parties.

Mr. Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): I had the opportunity of addressing myself to the subject of unemployment and Thursday's forthcoming debate on regional development last night in Sunderland, in the north-east. As I had what might be considered satisfactory press coverage, unlike the leader of the Social Democratic party—satisfactory except for The Times and the Daily Express—and as I had wide coverage on television and radio, unlike, apparently, the leader of the Social Democratic party, I intervene tonight with some hesitation. But because of the subject's importance I want to draw some points to the attention of the House.

I must say straight away that I stand here as an avowed advocate of what the Chancellor of the Exchequer described so elegantly as voodoo witchcraft. Perhaps I could explain to the House what I mean by that. It is simply that I regard the present level of unemployment in Britain as appalling. The situation north of Watford is shameful. To go to the north-east of England and find there more than 19 per cent. overall unemployment, to find areas of male unemployment of 30 per cent. or more, and to find in Consett 60 per cent. of juvenile unemployment is to me shameful.

It is particularly heart-breaking when one goes back to an area in which the Conservative party played such a major part in the plan which Lord Hailsham produced in 1963, and which I had the privilege of implementing in 1963-64, which reduced the impact of the loss of 120,000 jobs so that unemployment became less than 5 per cent. That is the first part of what I mean when I say that I am an advocate of voodoo witchcraft. That situation should never have been allowed to arise and is untenable.

Secondly, I mean that public investment now has a major part to play in dealing with unemployment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will not have expected me to be convinced by anything that he said this afternoon. That I fully understand. I am not really interested in the jibes of the Opposition. It is an insult to those overseas to say they are influenced in their foreign exchange policy by anything which the Leader of the Opposition may have said, either publicly or in the House of Commons. I am not interested in the internecine battles between present and former members of the Labour party. What concerns me is the policy which will deal with the present situation; the strategy which will overcome it, and in a reasonable time.

When a group of young people outside Consett say that they have finished their course and have been unemployed for three and a half years and ask how many more years they will be on the dole before they get a job even if the Government work out a successful strategy, what today can one reply to that? After listening to the Chancellor's speech, what could I say to them that was different from what I said last Wednesday when they put the question to me? It is hardest of all when they say that I am not really interested because the Conservative party does not have many votes in that area and so there is no reason why it should do anything about the problem. That is what we as a party have to face.

Very well, let us look at the situation. We can build on the fact that public opinion now shows itself clearly as having a priority for dealing with unemployment before dealing with tax cuts. It was originally intended that the debate should be on that question. It was the basic question to be dealt with. Public opinion is now quite clear on that. Those who want to go for tax cuts before jobs must prove to public opinion that theirs is the right means. That, so far, they have failed to do.

As has already been said, the debate has been greatly influenced by the present situation of the pound sterling. I want to say one or two things before I come to the important point about the analysis that is being made. Those overseas look at us now—and I have travelled overseas quite a lot in recent months and have experienced it myself—as being a country whose economy is being greatly damaged by a miners strike, for a length of time never previously experienced, and with a Government who, for reasons that those overseas do not understand, appear to be unable to do anything about it. That is a major factor in the way those dealing in foreign exchange look at Britain.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): That is not the point.

Mr. Heath: It may not be the point, but it is the point for them and as they are dealing in foreign exchange that is what matters to the pound.

Secondly, those overseas, as has already been remarked, have become convinced that we are a one-commodity country. They believe that because they have seen the way that our manufacturing capacity has been destroyed, very largely, looking back, as the result of the pound going up to $2·42. They see that clearly—more clearly, apparently, than some of my hon. Friends behind me.

The last factor which was mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister this afternoon, which some of us have been emphasising for nearly four years now, is the drain of capital from Britain and much of Europe to the United States.

The point that I want to emphasise in my analysis is that the decline of sterling is not due to anxiety about the public sector borrowing requirement or the fact that the Chancellor may exceed it by £1·5 billion. He has done that in the past and so has his predecessor without similar damage to sterling. That is not the anxiety at the moment.

The second point concerns money supply. We were told that the last figures might prove to be damaging, but they were nothing of the sort. The Chancellor and the Governor of the Bank of England congratulated themselves on that. There is no reason to believe that the next lot will be damaging.

No, those must not be used as excuses for what has been happening to sterling. Therefore, they must not be used as a reason for not considering Government investment on its own merit in the future because they would just be an excuse for stopping Government investment or preventing it from being expanded.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Heath: No, I am sorry; I want to get on.

The Chancellor mentioned the Japanese level of taxation and said that it is much lower than ours. In fact, the marginal rate is much higher there. But the characteristic of the Japanese system is that its borrowing requirement is infinitely greater than ours and so is that of every other country. Our public sector borrowing requirement is 2 per cent. of our gross domestic product.

[Mr. Heath]

The German figure is higher than that at 3 per cent. and the Americans at 6 per cent. The Japanese have a high figure. That is the important factor in connection with the PSBR.

As I have said before, those are countries which do not have to support a large public sector. Their Governments are not responsible for ensuring that all the nationalised industries get the investment they require. Therefore, if it is inexcusable to have a 2 per cent. PSBR of GDP, those others are infinitely less justifiable. The plain fact is that the Chancellor has always refused to analyse what is current expenditure and what is capital expenditure in Britain. It cannot be denied that on current expenditure we have a massive surplus and on capital expenditure there is justification for looking after the capital of the people of this country.

I see that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has now returned to the Chamber. I emphasise again that the reason for the decline in sterling is not related to his public sector borrowing requirement, to any anxiety that he may exceed it by £1·5 billion or to fears that the money supply is out of control, so those arguments cannot be used to try to reduce capital expenditure still further or to block proposals for more capital expenditure.

Mr. Lawson: I apologise for having missed the opening section of my right hon. Friend's speech. On a point of fact, the German public expenditure and budget deficit as a proportion of GDP is significantly lower than ours.

Mr. Heath: That is not the figure that I have. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor knows, the Germans have rightly been boosting their public expenditure in the present circumstances as investment for their country.

Reductions in taxes as opposed to increased Government investment provide no direct jobs. Jobs may result indirectly if those who have the extra money in their salaries spend it on goods. Those jobs may be in this country or abroad. No direct jobs are provided. That must be plain even to the simplest mind.

Investment in public expenditure for the benefit of the community as a whole provides jobs for those who are now unemployed. Those people will tend to spend their new income on goods produced in this country whereas all the research shows that people already on higher wages and salaries will tend to spend more on imports. We have learnt that from painful experience. Construction and other public works directly create jobs and thus reduce unemployment.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has said that such projects should be considered on their merits, and I agree entirely. I could cite a large number of projects which are desperately needed in my constituency in the south. They include drainage and sewerage projects. Despite the sneers of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), those are vital matters in my area, especially in the old village. Projects of that kind would provide jobs. That is a powerful argument for Government investment rather than tax reductions.

The extent to which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor can produce incentives through tax changes with the £1·5 billion to which he has referred is very limited. Research shows that no tremendous incentive results from such changes. Moreover—my comments on this yesterday have already been publicised and I said the same again this afternoon—it makes no sense to tell people who are unemployed that they need the incentive of tax reductions for those who are in work. Those people want jobs as soon as possible.

Then there is the emphasis on private enterprise. The purpose of improving the country's infrastructure is to improve the opportunities for private enterprise to become more efficient. Any firm north of Watford will confirm that to be more competitive it needs an improved infrastructure. As no one else is capable of achieving that —the provision of infrastructure cannot be privatised— the responsibility rests on the Government to carry out that task, and they should do so.

The argument that Government investment is simply printing money has been advanced again today. It is becoming no more than a parrot cry. What is wrong with using people's savings for Government investment? Every country does that. When the Chancellor says that there is plenty of money around, he is talking about the savings of the people. But what happens to those savings? They can go into Government investment for infrastructure or they can go into private investment. No one could argue that there is insufficient to do both as it is clear that private investment will not be squeezed out by public investment in the present circumstances in the economy, and it is with the present circumstances that we have to deal.

The real danger is quite different. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister touched on it this afternoon. It is the fact that so much of this country's savings are being drained across the Atlantic in search of high interest rates. That is the danger to us all. One can point to British companies with enormous cash holdings. They are private enterprise companies, but they are not investing in this country. They are putting their money on deposit where they can obtain interest rates above the rate of inflation, and it pays them to do so. Why should they take risks when they can obtain high interest rates simply by moving their money around without taking any risks? That is the real problem.

It is argued that Government investment is throwing away money. That is nonsense. It is a mere slogan, not an intellectual argument. Again, the argument that we cannot "spend our way out of recession" is used to block every proposal to improve the infrastructure. It was the tragedy of the Labour party that the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), when he was Chancellor, used that phrase to justify doing what the IMF wanted. The right hon. Gentleman nods in agreement. The Opposition have been paralysed ever since. They have never been able to put forward constructive proposals with any conviction because of that ridiculous phrase. The people's savings can certainly be used for proper investment and every Government in the past used it in that way.

Market activity is constantly emphasised. We must recognise the following facts with regard to sterling. It was believed that the Government had a purely monetary policy from which other things such as interest rates were expected to follow. Sterling could do what it liked, and it is clear that it did just that—rising to $2·2 and now falling to a little over $1·1. We have had to learn the painful way that one cannot operate the market like that. The Germans and the Japanese do not do so. They use the intervention powers of the Bundesbank and the Bank of Japan selectively and effectively—not continuously, but when they can lead speculators and others to burn their figures. We must return to that technique.

With regard to minimum lending rates, too, we are painfully going through the process of learning that one cannot abandon everything, sit back and expect the market to do everything for us. I hope that the Government now recognise that.

One also cannot operate the market when one party is dominant. That applies to both our national and our international affairs. Nationally, it has been strongly argued that we should not take special measures in regional policy but that we should let the market operate. That was based on the complete fallacy that previous investments in the regions did no good. That can be proved to be a fallacy. It has been picked out by many people as a simple argument to use in an endeavour to help the south.

The south, the south-east and parts of London are dominant in the United Kingdom, and the remainder is being allowed to suffer. The dominant part is continuously attracting such jobs as exist. The north-east, the north-west, Scotland and Wales are becoming poorer and weaker, while the south becomes stronger and richer. I am sorry that my hon. Friends think otherwise, but those who know those regions know that this is the case.

The reason for that is that the measures that are being taken are not being co-ordinated, and are not part of a strategy. They use individual incentives in particular areas, which are often damaging. The effect is that firms move from outside an area in to a smaller special area. That is another lesson that we had to learn in the past.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling) rose——

Mr. Heath: No, I shall not give way.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North) rose——

Mr. Heath: I am sorry, I shall not give way.

In the past we had to learn that if a regional policy was to be followed there had to be an overall strategy for both the regions and the country. A regional policy cannot be followed in specific pinheads because that only damages surrounding areas.

I know that Scotland has had success in some respects, especially in new technology, and it deserves credit for that. The north-east is having success at present in bio-technology. However, it is not providing the number of jobs required to deal with unemployment. Until there is an overall strategy for the regions, we shall not get jobs.

The market is not functioning internationally either because it is being dominated by the United States, which operates regardless of other countries' interests. Tomorrow the Chancellor of the Exchequer will attend a meeting in Washington, but he will return empty handed —he knows it—as will all European countries because the American Administration are in no mood to run their policy in any other way. Even if they wanted to, which they do not, the American people would not allow them to. They would say, "We are walking tall. We are riding high. Look, it has been done by a budget deficit of $200 billion a year and a trade deficit of $130 billion a year, still rising". The United States is living on the rest of the world and it will not stop doing that. The Chancellor of the Exchequer knows that very well.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: The Chancellor should not go.

Mr. Heath: No, it is right that he should go. Europe should use its combined influence. For that reason, I urge on the Chancellor the view that the United Kingdom should become a full member of the European monetary system. He has never yet given an explanation why we have not become a member. He has always said that there are some reasons for joining and some for staying out. What are those reasons? The Chancellor prides himself on being an intellectual. Could he not for once reveal that aspect of his personality? Then we could form a judgment about the Government's policies. There is every reason for joining the EMS at the earliest opportunity. It may or may not be possible to negotiate, as the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) said, but we should join.

France may be derided. It went through far worse circumstances than we are going through with sterling, and survived them because of the EMS. Moreover, the EMS survived despite France. Why, then, cannot we join and adjust ourselves accordingly? The French followed a policy of reflation at the wrong time because some of their markets were deflating heavily, and, obviously, it suffered. Our job is to join the EMS and to use what influence we have.

Nothing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said today will give any hope to the more than 3 million unemployed—in real terms, it is nearly 4 million. When he returns empty handed, what will he do? Are we to continue to allow the United States to live on the rest of the world for as long as it wishes, with massive unemployment in the United Kingdom, millions of unemployed in Europe, and with even greater unemployment and increasing debts in the Third world? Is that all that the future holds for us, or has the Chancellor a policy? If so, will he confide that strategy to us?

The crisis that we all face is how long we should continue to support the United States, with its enormous budget and trade deficits, while it continues its policy regardless of the rest of us. That could never have happened under Bretton Woods; it would have been impossible. However, today there is no regulation in the international financial market. It is foolish and the utmost stupidity. Moreover, it is ruining the United Kingdom and Europe.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer and his hon. Friends must decide what action to take to insulate us from the high interest rates of the United States, which we do not require. Without them capital would cease to flow from the United Kingdom, and we would have capital for public and private investment in the United Kingdom, and some hope to offer those who are today without jobs.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): I hope that the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) will not be embarrassed by what I have to say. Perhaps I can be forgiven for saying that if he continues in the strain of his speech, as I am sure he will, I could easily become what might be described as a Heathite. The only matter on which I disagree with him is whether we should enter the European monetary system quickly. We must be careful and not rush into the EMS, because there are dangers in it for us. All hon. Members who are genuinely worried about unemployment, and all those affected by unemployment, should give the right hon. Gentleman full support for his speech.

[Mr. Eric S. Heffer]

I do not understand why the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) said that he could not support the motion. We can always improve motions. All hon. Members will agree that a motion does not necessarily carry everything in it that it should. Today's motion is moderate and can be supported by almost all hon. Members, whether they represent the Labour party, the Conservative party, the Social Democratic party, the Liberal party or other parties. I hope that by the end of the evening hon. Members will find it in their hearts to support the motion and so let the Government know that the House believes that the time has come for a fundamental change in the Government's strategy and policies for dealing with unemployment.

The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup was right to discuss how unemployment affects individuals and communities. Too often our debates in the House are unrealistic and seem as though they are taking place in an ivory tower. Some hon. Members are unaware of what is happening to ordinary people in areas of high unemployment. The figures contained in the research note from the Library demonstrate the problems. I shall take as examples some constituencies on Merseyside. In Broadgreen, of a total of 8,049 unemployed, 50·8 per cent. have been unemployed for more than a year. The figure for Mossley Hill is exactly the same. In my constituency of Walton, of 10,397 unemployed 51·9 per cent. have been unemployed for more than a year. Of course, some of them will have been unemployed for much longer than that.

Those hon. Members who are still unaware of the true position should speak to my young nephew, who is a skilled engineer. I had problems in getting him an apprenticeship in the first place. As I had some status, I was able at least to talk to some companies, and he was lucky enough to get the chance of an apprenticeship with one of them. At the end of the apprenticeship he got a job for a year, but then the company for which he worked collapsed. He has been without work for more than a year. Although he is trying to find a job on the oil rigs, or in another part of the country, he has almost no chance of doing so. He is just one of thousands of skilled workers in a similar position. He may eventually get a job on an oil rig or elsewhere, but what about unskilled workers, who have no chance of getting a job?

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I endorse the remarks of the hon. Gentleman, but does he not think that it is wrong that youngsters should be encouraged to become Dick Whittingtons and be expected to go in search of a living elsewhere? Is it not outrageous that some youngsters who live in the centre of Liverpool face nothing other than 50 years on the dole?

Mr. Heffer: I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman. During the campaign for the general election we discovered when we knocked on doors that, more often than not, it was a youngster who opened it. The mother and father may have managed to continue their employment, or the mother may have got a part-time job, and the youngster provided the meal for them when they got home in the evening. What an indictment of a Government who allow our youth to waste in that way.

That is the tragedy of unemployment. I agree with what the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said about being uninterested in the arguments between those who used to be in the Labour party and some of those who are still in it. I could not care less either. I am worried about the unemployed and about what we can do to create jobs for them.

Merseyside has about the highest unemployment in the country. Perhaps hon. Members saw the recent television programme about a small drugs squad in Liverpool moving against a young man who was involved in the peddling of drugs, whose use is widespread on Merseyside. It is the old story of the devil finding uses for idle hands. That is what is happening in those communities. There has been a growth in the drugs traffic because youngsters have no employment and wish to find ways of making money. There has also been an increase in burglaries and in petty crimes.

Unemployment also causes internal tensions in families. Many live in overcrowded conditions, with recently married youngsters living with their parents when they should be living in their own homes. However, they have no chance of buying a home because they are on the dole. Many internal problems can arise between the two women or the two men in a family.

I am sorry that the leading Government figures have left the Chamber. Perhaps they do not wish to listen to what ordinary Back-Bench Members, as opposed to ex-Prime Ministers, have to say. It would not be a bad idea if they listened to some of those who do not hold eminent positions but who have wide experience of the grassroots of the problem. When I go home at weekends, I meet my relatives who live on council estates. I meet people who are suffering. I must tell Ministers that that is what the debate is about. Too many of them live in conditions that make them immune to the realities of life. Ministers cannot continue to show no understanding and compassion. They must take steps towards investment that will create employment in the regions, as the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said.

I should draw the attention of the House to what another section of society, the Quakers, believes. The Religious Society of Friends sent me, and probably other hon. Members, a proposal from the Hertford and Hitchin monthly meeting. I was born in Hertford, and it is delightful to know that people in the south are also worried about these matters. The society says in a letter to the Prime Minister:

> "We note with concern the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer (announced on 12 November) to use cuts in public expenditure as a basis for a reduction in personal taxation. Whether or not such a reduction would aid the British economy, as is claimed, we believe that it would be morally unjustifiable to benefit taxpayers at a time when so many people are suffering the indignity of unemployment and poverty, and when the needs of the Third World are so acute."

I agree with that.

I think that the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup is right in one other respect. On one occasion, the Labour party was arguing that we should reduce personal taxation. All parties have done that from time to time. Dick Crossman said to me, "If we reduce personal taxation, that means that I shall have two holidays abroad a year instead of one." Is it not true that the reduction of personal taxation at certain levels will mean that people will have more holidays abroad, rather than that there will be more investment and employment? Is that not the reality?

Conservative Members do not live in the same world as people like myself. We believe in further taxation, but not the kind of taxation suggested by the right hon. Member for Devonport. I do not know what he wants when he argues for further VAT. He was asked what sort of taxation he was concerned with—was it extra VAT on books, on newspapers, on children's clothing or on holidays? I believe in taxation based on income. That is what is required, not taxation through VAT, although we may have to raise a little taxation through that system occasionally.

I shall finish my speech soon, because we have now entered the 10-minute speech period and I do not wish to take too long. I was all right until 7 o'clock, as that rule comes into force at 7 o'clock, but I shall be fair and try not to go over time.

Today can be an historic occasion. I hope that hon. Members, like the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup, who feel strongly about this subject will take a stand. Many Conservative Members have privately told me how deeply concerned they are about the problems of unemployment.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Many say it publicly.

Mr. Heffer: The hon. Gentleman is right.

The Opposition motion can be supported by all hon. Members. I appeal to Conservative Members. If they are really concerned, as I am sure they are, about the need to begin to deal with the problems of unemployment, they should support the motion. Let us begin the process of getting young people back to work, although we are not concerned only with young people. It has been proved that the majority of those unemployed are well below the age of 55, and that is a real strength that could be used to build up our industry. This country is either an industrial nation, or nothing. Therefore, Conservative Members should support the motion and not continue to support the absurd nonsense that we have once again heard from the Government Front Bench.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. As the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) said, we are now in the time for 10 minute speeches. Ten minutes is the maximum time, and if hon. Members are able to speak for a rather shorter time than that I shall be able to call more than 12 Back Benchers in the time remaining until 9 o'clock.

Mr. Tim Eggar (Enfield, North): One cannot but respect the passion of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) even if one does not admire the logic of his argument.

Over the past few weeks we have heard much argument about whether the Government should spend the Budget fiscal adjustment on tax reductions or on public expenditure. There is a danger that we have become so preoccupied in taking sides on this argument that we have forgotten that our overall priority must be to work towards a package that has only one objective—the creation of jobs, be that through more expenditure, through tax reductions or through reducing employment costs. I shall look briefly at the various options open to us purely in terms of how the choice between those options should or should not create jobs.

I am not a strong believer in infrastructural expenditure. It is not good in itself. One has only to look at the saga of high-rise building or at the power stations programme to realise that infrastructural spending itself can be wasteful. The two most widely quoted infrastructural proposals—roads and sewerage—are particularly bad examples because they cost a great deal in terms of expenditure per job created.

On the other hand, there is a strong need for additional expenditure on the maintenance, repair and improvement of our buildings. Improvements can be made in the way that we spend money. For instance, there is a strong argument for making sure that improvement grants are targeted on those who really need them. Expenditure on the improvement of the building stock should be a priority for this Government.

Quite rightly, the Government have dramatically increased the amount of money that is spent by the Department of Employment. However, they have increased not only the quantity of expenditure but the quality of expenditure. We have only to look at the move to the youth training scheme from the youth opportunities programme to see that. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will make available to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment the necessary funds to introduce new initiatives. In particular, I am thinking of extensions to the community programme. Expenditure in this sector is good value in terms of money spent per job created.

There has been much talk about the removal of supply side inhibitions to job creation. Sadly, too much of it has simply been talk. Planning controls, health and safety regulations and employment protection legislation, to list but a few, were all introduced at a time of near full employment. One has to ask oneself whether the pendulum has moved somewhat and whether we should put jobs rather higher than these regulations, some of which are undoubtedly inhibiting job creation.

We need to go further and we need to have rather more political courage than we have shown. For instance, we need to tackle the problems of the private rented sector because it is only by improving housing mobility that we can hope to allow people in Liverpool and other areas to move to where the jobs are, which is largely in the south-east. The Treasury should look not only at the cost in housing benefit but also at the tax and economic activity benefits that would accrue by permitting the private rented sector to grow.

There is also the use of the derelict land register. Should we not be thinking in terms of giving private sector developers the right to force the public sector to sell land for development for housing or industrial purposes?

The job creation test applies not only to the supply side to expenditure but to our evaluation of the tax reductions. If there are to be tax reductions, I share the Chancellor's preference for raising tax thresholds; but I would go further. If we are to tackle tax thresholds, we should also tackle the impact of national insurance contributions and their incentive effect on the lower paid. There is, I think, a case for complete co-ordination of the national insurance contributions with the income tax system. It is disappointing that the social security reviews are not paying more attention to working towards the ultimate goal of complete integration of the social security system and the tax system. In other words, if there is an argument for creating jobs through reducing taxes and increasing incentives, let us not only think in terms of thresholds but let us realise that incentives are affected by national insurance contributions and by the social security system.

It is easy for Conservative Members to take a position in favour of infrastructural expenditure or of tax reductions, yet I say to the Chancellor that we are not considering a straightforward choice: it is not a case of one or the other. We are looking to him to produce on 19 March a Budget package which inevitably will involve trade-offs within the broad current economic framework. But there is only one way in which Conservative Members will judge that package—whether it is the best possible package to create new jobs for our people, whether they be in London, in the north-east or in the north-west. My right hon. Friend bears a heavy responsibility.

7.10 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): It is one of our national weaknesses — indeed, it may be a human weakness widely shared—not to recognise our blessings when they come and consequently to fail to seize them, if not to count them. There is an example to hand in the manner in which the dramatic financial events of the last week or two have been received and interpreted. I believe that those events hold out the prospect, admittedly a long-term prospect, of hope for a reduction in the level of the unemployment which both sides of the House agree to accept as intolerable, although neither side of the House has an intelligible doctrine to explain how it may be reduced.

The initial impact of those events was certainly unpleasant. The Chancellor of the Exchequer found that the conjuncture of the anticipated fall in oil prices and the fall in the exchange rate presented him with a difficulty in funding his borrowing requirement. The attraction of lending across the exchanges at an effectively much higher rate of interest than was offering on Government securities threatened the whole basis of the Chancellor's stand against inflation and obliged him to take action to secure the possibility of continuing to borrow from the public to meet his requirement.

It is, incidentally, not only the borrowing requirement as it features in the Budget statement that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has to bear in mind. A large quantity of sight money in the form of national savings, largely held by persons who are in a position to switch their holdings, is very volatile. The Chancellor of the Exchequer therefore was right to take the action which he did when he did, to protect his ability to borrow from the public and save himself from falling into the necessity of borrowing from the banks. It is in my view quite perverse to accuse the Chancellor of inconsistency in raising interest rates in the short term in face of the fall of the exchange rate. His purpose, the background to his thinking, was not at all to massage the exchange rate. It was not an exercise in the control of exchange rates. It was an exercise in maintenance of the capability of the Government in all circumstances to borrow their requirements from the public and not again have recourse to inflationary borrowing from the banks.

But that is the short term. In the long term I believe what is portended is that one at any rate of the causes of high unemployment may be in process of changing.

There are, of course, many contributory causes to that extraordinary phenomenon. Some of those causes are inaccessible to us. Obviously the demographic cause is inaccessible : we cannot manipulate it. Obviously, too, the rise and spread of technological improvement is something which we could not alter even if we had a magician's wand that would bring it to a standstill or reverse it for us. But among other factors there is one which I believe has received insufficient attention. That is the sudden and massive change in the world situation of the British economy from an economy which was in chronic net deficit on current account and net surplus on capital account into an economy in huge surplus on current account and net deficit on capital account. That changeover was bound to impose upon the economic pattern of this country most painful and severe readjustments, which in turn were bound to express themselves in terms of major unemployment.

Of course, the cause—not necessarily the only cause, but the overwhelming cause — of that disastrous — in retrospect one might dare to call it disastrous — turn round was that Britain had become an oil-surplus country. It is true, therefore, that in one sense our oil bonanza lies somewhere near the heart of our economic difficulties. It was that more than any other single cause which made us a surplus country on current account and therefore a deficit country on capital account. We have been hearing in the debate this afternoon lamentations about that deficit on capital account, represented of course by outward net investment from this country — at the present time no doubt outward net investment from this country into the United States.

The impact upon the exchange rate which has been felt has been attributed more than anything else to the expectation of a fall in the price of oil, which appears to be regarded as a potential disaster that the Government ought to do everything in their power to ward off—a continuation of the paradox existing ever since 1973, that Governments, while bewailing dear energy, have clubbed together all over the world to keep the price of petroleum up.

Now this cannot be right for Britain of all countries. Of all countries, Britain stands to gain by cheap and readily available sources of energy. After all, our former industrial greatness was founded on cheap domestic sources of energy. Indeed, we are now watching the agonies of the industry which placed that energy at the disposal of our industrial revolution and the industrial development of the United Kingdom. I say it is an absurdity, a contradiction, for this country to be party to the maintenance of an artificially high price for a source of energy such as oil.

I am not saying the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be wise to come to the Dispatch Box and say so in so many words at this moment, but we in the House not governed by the same inhibitions ought to be prepared to welcome anything that could reduce the price of oil and make cheaper energy available to this country in a form the source of which is now predominantly within our own hands, under our own control and within the ambit of our national economy.

The mere possibility that this might happen, the perceived prospect of this happening, resulted in a marked weakening of the international value of the pound sterling; but that, of course, is only an index of what would happen if we cease to be a current account surplus country and again become a current account deficit country. It is an indication of what we might expect to see if we again became an economy with a net capital surplus, instead of a net capital outflow. Those of us, therefore, who can stand back from the day-to-day management of the Government's finances should welcome the two constellations that have appeared in the financial firmament during the past week.

First, there is the indication of a potential break in the structure that has artificially sustained a false price for petroleum products. This afternoon I was shocked to hear the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) suggest that we might cut our production in order further to force up the price of the source of energy upon which we depend so extensively. Secondly, the fallen external value of the pound has become a symbol and signal of the fact that we may again be poised to become predominantly an industrial exporting country. The inhibitions that have lain upon us for the past six years —the inhibitions of an oil surplus overpriced at a time when this country has been in the unnatural predicament of not needing to exert its full industrial capacity to maintain the flow of goods and services between itself and the outside world — have shown some signs of weakening. We have at last seen some sign of a break in the disastrous weather.

That is not something that will necessarily be welcome to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But it is something that we here should take seriously. We should be able to state it and expose it to examination in a debate such as this — for indeed it involves the future level of unemployment in this country.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): I shall address my remarks to the substance of the motion. It is quite astonishing that we should even be debating this proposition after the lessons of history. It is staggering that the hardy perennial and delusion of British political life — that it is somehow possible to create extra jobs through public expenditure—should continue to be put about by comparatively responsible people who once held high Government office. It is amazing, because there is not a shred of evidence to support that view, and so far we have not heard any evidence tonight to support it.

Public investment in whatever form may appear to create jobs, but in the long term it destroys more than it creates because of the resources that it takes from the private sector, which it pre-empts in so doing. Public expenditure to create jobs has been used by successive Governments of all parties in two broad ways. I think first of direct subsidy and De Lorean, Invergordon, Corpach, Linwood, Bathgate and a score of other examples. I am sorry that my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) is not in the Chamber, but, in the case of Bathgate, we dragged British Leyland kicking and screaming to Scotland to deal with the appalling level of unemployment, which stood at 7 per cent. Today, because that industry collapsed as it was uneconomic and should never have gone there in the first place, unemployment stands at 20 per cent. and the community has been destroyed by that attempt to move against the market.

The direct subsidy approach has a familiar pattern to it. We can all find an example in our constituencies. It starts in hope and acclamation. It starts with everyone jumping on the bandwagon and claiming the credit for having brought jobs to the constituency. But, having gone through a period of losing markets, it ends in closure, dismay and recrimination. I am aware of no example to counter that view, and I am surprised that we should even be considering that.

But there are now some people who say that they agree with that, but that they have found a better, painless way. They say that they have something that will work better, and that the answer lies in the Government simply loosening the reins a little and spending more to create demand. I have no doubt that engineering, building and steel and the other lobbies that we have heard arguing for that would benefit, and that they would take on some labour. But at what cost? The cost would be to send false signals throughout the economy which would result in demand for skilled labour, which is already in short supply, and which would create massive distortions.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) asked about the opportunity costs of unemployment. If he was in the Chamber, I would ask him about the opportunity costs that arise from the money taken in higher taxes or, less honestly, in inflation from private enterprise. What about the results of less demand that will come from higher prices? What about the reduction in investment and competitiveness, and the destruction of jobs that comes from taxing the private sector? Public expenditure is made at the price of removing demand from the private sector.

What is so magical about injecting demand through the public sector? If it creates jobs, why does it not also destroy jobs by taking demand from the private sector? The so-called witchcraft that we have had to listen to tonight represents a call for the creation of short-term marginal skilled jobs and for the silent destruction of many jobs in the private sector that are dependent on real demand. The notion that public sector investment would create more employment is defective, because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar) said, the cost of capital investment programmes is high in terms of cost per job. If those programmes are financed from taxation or by abandoning job-creating tax cuts, people will cut, or not take part in, several luxury activities. There will be less entertainment, less eating out and fewer people participating in all the things in the economy provided by the service industries that lead to the employment of more people at a lower cost per unit of investment.

Why, then, should we be debating this issue? I suggest that it is because of the nature of Members of Parliament. The incentive for us as politicians is to dance the light fantastic and to whizz up to the north-east with "Newsnight" or whatever to look at unemployment and to argue for increased public spending with the slogans of care and compassion so that we can be seen to be doing something and to be arguing for expenditure to reduce that unemployment even though the reality is that the jobs that are less visible, and that could be created in the hundreds and thousands by small companies and which do not make the headlines, will disappear. They will not be mentioned and will not be the subject of debate on "Newsnight", or the subject of headlines in newspapers. But then there are no votes to be lost in that.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): What a lot of drivel.

Mr. Forsyth: The private sector, left to fend for itself and left with the money in its pocket, will invest it far more wisely than any committee or group of politicians haggling over their constituencies would do. It is inherently more expensive and wasteful to command goods and services in the economy with public rather than private money. The hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) may say that my speech is a lot of drivel, but he should consider the experience in the United States. The jobs there have come not from large firms benefiting from investment arising out of Ronald Reagan's deficit, or any other form of public expenditure, but from entrepreneurial small business. In the past 10 years the Fortune 500 companies have shed more than 4 million jobs, while 20 million jobs have been created by firms employing fewer than 20 people that receive not a penny of public subsidy. It is the United States' experience that jobs come from small business. In 1981-82, 2·6 million new jobs were created by small businesses while large firms lost 1·7 million jobs.

The problem in our economy is not a shortage of demand. My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup got in a muddle about why rich people were buying video recorders and foreign goods while people who were unemployed could not do so. My right hon. Friend must face up to the fact that there is demand in our economy. The key to creating the jobs we all want lies in a micro-economic analysis of the economy and not in a Keynesian or pseudo-Keynesian macro-economic analysis. If we want more people in employment, we need to make it easier and cheaper for business to employ them. We need to make it less burdensome and more rewarding to start small businesses and to make it easier and more advantageous for companies to expand and grow. Companies will then expand and small businesses will be started.

We must heed the arguments put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, North, who said that the key lies in removing the barriers to employment — removing regulation, allowing people to move to where the jobs are, and dealing with employment protection. It lies in dealing with national insurance contributions, the wages councils, planning, health and safety provisions, shop hours, licensing, rent Acts, VAT and the tax and benefit system which mitigates against employment. We should be looking to those methods to provide hope for those in the north-east and elsewhere.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): I shall question later the fundamental beliefs expressed by the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth), but I would first point out that the debate takes place in a context that differs from the one we expected a week ago. An increase of 2·5 per cent. in interest rates will add perhaps £4 billion in a full year to the £16·5 billion for which the Government have already budgeted. Even if only half that amount materialises, it will more than wipe out the surplus to which the Government look forward.

Yesterday's events are bound to have a large effect on the Government's economic policy for next year, especially on public spending. I shall seek to sow some doubts in the minds of Conservative Members about the framework within which the cause and effect works out through the medium-term financial strategy. It may not turn out to be as well conceived as some of them think.

The events of the past few days have not demonstrated the flaws in the operation of the Government's economic strategy. They have demonstrated the defects in the strategy. The problem lies in the volatility of financial markets which, given no steer by the Government, are wildly unstable. The destabilising effect on expectations does the mischief.

Suppose that the foreign exchange market is stable with a 10 per cent. interest rate in Britain. Pressures develop on the pound, so the interest rate is increased, say, to 11 per cent. Money as a store of wealth means that the expected earning power of a sterling deposit increases by 1 in 10. Other things being equal, the value of the sterling deposit increases instantly by 10 per cent. In the short term, that increase in value completely swamps the original increase in the interest incomes stream of only 1 per cent. a year. The interest rate has become irrelevant and has been swamped by the expectations effect to which it gave rise.

But the expectation must be fed. If the Government do not feed that expectation by shaping expectations of the future development of the exchange rate, the longer-term market will be driven by random movements in response to short-term changes in expectations. Those random movements — that drunken walk — will determine the medium-term prospects for the exchange rate and, therefore, for the whole economy.

This classical argument has been advanced for many years, although it has been developed more rigorously and mathematically in present times. The conclusion reached by not only the Opposition but the economic journals must be that the Government should provide some sort of steering. My hon. Friends say, "Good; let the Government intervene."

Reserves are small in relation to trade. At the low point at the end of 1976, United Kingdom reserves of $4 billion were down to four weeks' worth of imports. They now stand at $15 billion, which will finance only eight weeks' worth of imports. Although reserves are small in relation to trade, they are tiny in relation to foreign exchange transactions. Total OECD exports amount to about $4·8 billion a day, but foreign exchange transactions amount to about $60 billion a day — more than ten times the volume of transactions needed to pay for imports on current account.

Total United Kingdom reserves amount to less than two days' worth of the normal foreign exchange transactions in London. If the world had an incentive to take all its foreign exchange transactions through sterling, total British foreign exchange reserves could be exhausted in about six hours. The opportunity for foreign exchange intervention against market expectations is slender.

The Government's response is to say, "It is obvious what to do." The Government say that they should stick to money supply targets and secure a basic equilibrium in the financial markets around which they can operate abroad and at home. If the Government set targets for the exchange rate there is no way they can deliver, and so the Government's credibility is forfeited.

Is there no intermediate position? We should consider what happened yesterday. The Chancellor was so set in his belief about the futility of intervention that, after setting a minimum lending rate, he did not intervene. Therefore, Germany did not intervene, and the markets were left uncertain about the expected effect on the exchange rate. No lead was given.

The oil market has shifted from a deficit in 1976 of £4 billion in the balance of payments to a surplus of £8 billion today. A dollar per barrel change in the oil price reduces the United Kingdom's foreign exchange earnings on the oil trade by about £400 million per annum, or by about 0·5 per cent. of the value of our exports. The fall in the price per barrel of oil from $40 to $27 accounts for a large reduction of 6·5 per cent. in our total export earnings.

If a 1 per cent. change in the exchange rate resulted in a 1 per cent. change in exports, the total fall in the price of oil would justify a change in the exchange rate of, at most, 10 per cent. The fall in the exchange rate that has occurred has already discounted the effect of a fall in the oil price in the United Kingdom to below $10 per barrel. That is quite unrealistic in relation to any conceivable movement in the oil price.

The Government have put the argument qualitatively but have not spelt out the quantitative arguments. What should the Government do? They should give a lead to expectations. The Government are right to distinguish between not having an exchange rate target, and not caring about the exchange rate. But caring and doing nothing are meaningless actions. What are the Government doing? Why are they doing it? The Government are not giving the answers to the foreign exchange markets, so those markets are left groping around.

The Government's broad approach should be to say what they expect will happen, taking account of the fact that private agents will react to their announcement and speculate. If the Government calculate correctly, they will not play into the hands of private speculators.

Better results would be obtained if the speculators saw what was happening and played the game. The financial market would thereby be much more stable. But the Government cannot rely on that. The Government must reckon on the fact that the other agents—private agents and foreign Governments — will go on playing the competitive game. However, the Government can create a situation in which it is in the interests of the other parties to start playing the co-operative game.

On foreign exchange markets, the fundamentals are relative interest rates, rates of inflation, current balances, capital flows and intervention, and exchange rates, of which interest rates and intervention are the instruments.

We could move over smoothly from the present competitive situation to a co-operative solution, in which some parameters are left free, to be adjusted internationally by agreement, for the benefit of all. In the Bretton Woods system that parameter was the actual value of the exchange rate, but there is no reason why it should be. It could be some parameter in an interest rates and intervention rule, or it could be an exchange rate rule which could be adjusted by agreement between nations.

Having once started to play this game, there is a sanction by which nations could be brought to play this game. For if they ceased to play it, they would forfeit the support of other countries for their exchange rates, with drastic consequences to themselves.

My time is up. I plead with the Chancellor and his colleagues to begin to raise these matters in Washington. The right hon. Gentleman will find the most highly developed advocates of them in the research department of the Federal Reserve Board in Washington. If he does not seek allies in the United States, but seeks, rather, the defence of dogma, which is all that he has done today, he will serve this country extremely ill.

Mr. Richard Ryder (Mid-Norfolk): I was grateful to the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) for allowing me to ask in an intervention during his speech whether he was in favour of a higher or lower exchange rate. He refused to answer my question. I hope that when the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr Prescott) winds up the debate for the Opposition he will put that matter right.

> "Failure to reduce inflation further and damp down inflationary expectations could put recovery at risk. Prudent monetary and fiscal policies of the kind that have brought us so far will have to be sustained and, where necessary, strengthened."

Those are not my words, nor words plucked from the pages of a Conservative general election manifesto. They come direct from the core of the declaration issued at the end of the economic summit held in London last June.

That declaration was signed by western political leaders espousing such wide political beliefs as republicanism, liberalism, Christian democracy, conservatism and socialism. None of them, from their different political standpoints, could offer instant solutions to the complex international problem of unemployment. Had they been able to do so, I am sure that they would have seized upon those solutions straight away. Those world leaders recognised that reflationary policies could sabotage the careful progress made already and make unemployment worse in the long run.

The occupants of the Opposition Front Bench are perpetrating a hoax on people if they claim that unemployment can be cured quickly. Those who suggest that it can be so cured are not in touch with the realities of government. Their Socialist friends abroad, some of whom are having to grapple with the problems of office on a daily basis rather than dallying in the rhetoric of opposition, are pursuing largely the same economic policies as the British Government.

Only last week the French Socialist Prime Minister, Mr. Laurent Fabius, emphasised that the French Government would continue to curb public spending. He also said that he had no intention of raising public sector wages in a bid to court cheap popularity in the run-up to the 1986 French parliamentary elections. He ruled out pump-priming on the grounds that the Government would put inflation at risk and endanger France's external account. Mr. Fabius stressed last week the importance of improving the competitiveness of the French economy, and has throughout recent months made clear his intention to reduce personal taxation this year in an effort to increase job prospects for young people.

The same pattern is followed in Italy, where there is a Socialist Prime Minister, Mr. Craxi. In a remarkable speech delivered in Trevi just over a year ago, Mr. Craxi said that unless the public expenditure problem in Italy was tackled quickly the whole political and economic fabric of that country would be put at risk. As a result, he doubled prescription charges and cut disablement and supplementary pensions. That was the action of that Socialist Prime Minister. Moreover, in his 1985 budget, published last October, Mr. Craxi gave a commitment to reduce still further the public borrowing requirement in Italy and to reduce the health, education and social security budgets of the Italian Government.

There is a Social Democratic Government in Sweden. I fancy that their politics are closer to the heart of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook than to that of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen). The Swedish Government have given up subsidising failing industries, and recently one of the country's largest shipbuilding firms was allowed to go into bankruptcy. The Social Democratic Finance Minister, Mr. Feldt, pointed out recently:

"We have restructured old industries — shipbuilding, textiles, steel and mining — remarkable in a European context. Steel capacity has been halved, special needs restructured . . . shipbuilding is a fifth of its original size."

Mr. Feldt also announced his intention to reduce personal taxation so as to increase job opportunities in his country.

The Socialist Government of Spain is led by a bright young Prime Minister, Mr. Gonzalez. He has made clear his intention to introduce a modern social market economy in Spain with a smaller role for Government in industry and a more flexible labour market. He has also said that he wants fewer barriers to domestic and international competition. Last month, when opening his Socialist party's conference in Madrid, Mr. Gonzalez said:

"Without a sound economic policy there cannot be a serious social programme. We were not called on to govern in order to distribute scarcity and hunger."

He concluded his speech by defending his monetarist approach, which he said was vital to save Spain from crisis.

When the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East winds up, let him say why the policies being propounded by the British Labour party are inconsistent with those being implemented by Socialist Governments in the remainder of Europe. Unless he can do that convincingly, the British electorate will continue to believe that the Labour party's policies bear no element of truth.

The Opposition motion calls for that question to be answered. After all, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) conceded shortly after the last general election that Labour had lost because the people did not believe them. In the months to come, Labour MPs also have an opportunity to disprove that and to explain at the same time why their policies are inconsistent with those of their Socialist brethren in Europe.

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South): The Chancellor concluded his speech in a rhetorical flourish with a mixture of illusion, bravado and what the Russians call dezinformazia. He has rushed off no doubt to stem a further run on the pound caused by his speech. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Clark) is not here. He wrote a work on the British military high command in the first world war called "The Donkeys". Perhaps he has rushed off to do field research for its sequel, because the Government of which he is a member show the same obduracy as the British high command in the first world war, with the same disastrous consequences for the economy.

In his preoccupation with touring the Socialist horizon, the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder) forgot to read the Sunday newspapers at the weekend, which showed how an ailing company in America, Chrysler, was rescued and put on the road to success by a pro-capitalist President, so perhaps lessons are not learnt so simply as the hon. Gentleman would have us believe.

When I made my maiden speech here 11 years ago, the Walsall, South constituency which I described was prosperous, with unemployment under 5 per cent., with companies producing goods which were required and a town which half a century earlier was called a town of 100 trades. Many of those giants of industry are now but memories. Indeed, in the last few years the area has been struck by a major crisis, the industrial equivalent of the black death, because unemployment is over 17 per cent. Ten years ago unemployment in Walsall was below the regional and national level. Now, with unemployment in real terms higher than perhaps 25 per cent., I wonder where the goodies which have apparently been distributed —the Chancellor talks of more rewards to come—have gone in the few years since he took this job, with such disastrous consequences. No Saatchi and Saatchi public relations man can disguise the extent of the economic disaster that has befallen my constituency and the west midlands.

When one talks of economic crisis, one thinks of Wales, Scotland, the north-east and the north-west. When I became a Member of Parliament over 10 years ago, the west midlands was held to be almost the engine room of the British economy. Measures were taken to siphon industry away from constituencies like mine to so-called less prosperous areas. The decline of the last decade or so has accelerated over the last few years. I would never argue that the crisis in this country began when my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) left No. 10 Downing street, but certainly with the furniture van that brought in his successor there came a rapid acceleration of the decline.

We have seen under this Government an attack on the public sector. I speak unashamedly as a believer in a healthy private sector working alongside a healthy public sector. We have seen public assets plundered. We have not seen great success, as some people claim, with the British Telecom sale. I am one of the 54 million who are not now shareholders, but who until the sale were public shareholders. We are about to see the flogging off of British Aerospace so that the Government may get a little money to squander. Then there is to be the sale of assets such as the construction of warships, a sell-off which will probably be a disaster. The people who are thinking of buying will have to make up their minds in a couple of weeks whether to purchase.

Under this Government the maintenance of an infrastructure assumes a low priority. In my constituency no council house has been built for five years. There are 12,500 on the waiting list and 30,000 outstanding repairs to be done. The local authority, which is Conservative and independent-controlled, put in a bid for £37 million under the housing investment programme. It received £9·6 million. In 1978, the last full year in which we were in office, the allocation was £20 million. Yet six years later it has dropped to £9·6 million. There is a desperate need to improve the infrastructure housing and roads.

In the National Economic Development Council document referred to quite often, there is a reference to the backlog of maintenance and the consequence of delay. It says on page 6:

"The consequences of delaying required maintenance work can be well illustrated for roads. An average life for a roads' surface dressing may be four-eight years. A failure to renew this dressing . . . at the appropriate time can lead to the need for complete resurface at a cost per square metre some ten times greater than that for surface dressing."

That is a timely illustration of the need to enhance the infrastructure of our economy, not simply because it creates jobs, but because by doing so it cuts the costs that would be involved in future.

The once prosperous area which I represent now has the unemployment level of one of the worst areas. That I deplore. A further disaster that will make unemployment worse is the abolition of the county council in the west midlands. We have an authority which has sought successfully to create jobs. The council recently asked Cambridge econometricians to forecast what would happen by the year 2000 if the Government's policies were to continue. Then it asked the experts to forecast what would happen if different policies were pursued. The research projected that if present policies were pursued employment would fall by 225,000 by 2001. The alternative was not as dramatic as some would have liked to see. It forecast that about 180,000 jobs would be lost. The difference is that under the alternative policy we would see the creation of 127,000 jobs in the service sector, but only 15,000 service jobs if present policies continue. Perhaps there are alternatives. The research at regional level could be repeated nationally. There are agencies of Government, county councils, local authorities and organisations in constituencies which could play an even bigger role in job creation.

In transport, the object of a future Labour Government must be to try to undo the damage that has been done to the infrastructure. There is a need for higher investment in railways. The future of transport should not, as the Government propose in their buses White Paper, be handed over to the private sector, which has shown itself manifestly incapable of meeting demands.

My next point relates less to infrastructure than to substructure. In the west midlands we have suffered recently the effects of past industrialisation. Much of the west midlands has been undermined, not just by the Government's economic policies, but by coal mines which are now defunct, by limestone caverns and by ironstone mines. There are enormous consequences for the sale of houses, house building and factory expansion. In fairness, the Government commissioned a study by Ove Arup to identify what needs to be done. In the west midlands and in my area in particular it is a prerequisite for industrial expansion and for the peace of mind of thousands of people to start infilling some of the enormous holes undermining towns in the black country and the west midlands. Only the Government have the capability to mount that exercise.

The Government have been an unmitigated disaster, not just for the west midlands, but for the country. Most hon. Members who have spoken already have been critical of the pure monetarism that appears to have prevailed over the past few years. It may be easy for my hon. Friends on the Opposition Benches to advocate what might be done should there be a Labour Government. Perhaps it is on the Government side that pressure will be more important for alternatives within the present framework.

The Government strike me as being similar to a character in "The Wizard of Oz" following Dorothy or Margaret, collectively searching desperately for a brain, a heart and courage—courage to recognise the failures of their policies and to accept the recommendations of hon. Members who have spoken and who will speak later. The policies of the Government are in tatters. Before our economy collapses completely, let us not be beguiled by some of the beneficial things that are allegedly happening. Surely there must be a change of policy. I hope that even in a small way the debate will contribute to that objective.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): The worrying thing about unemployment is not just its present level. Despite 3 per cent. growth and the creation of new jobs at the rate of around 25,000 a month, unemployment is not only not going down but is still going up slightly. If those factors continue, with present demographic trends, we are unlikely to see any reduction in unemployment in the next few years. Just about the only encouraging thing about the unemployment picture is that, as an issue, it has now reached the top of the political agenda. That is not surprising because people find it difficult to accept that the Government can do nothing more about the nation's most serious social and economic problem than sit back and wait for things to get better.

I am no economist, but like many other people in Britain I find myself looking at a paradox of massive unmet demand for goods and services existing alongside mass unemployment. Like those other people, I ask myself whether it is really beyond our intelligence and imagination to devise some way of bringing together the unmet demand and idle resources.

On the other hand, those who simply call for a massive increase in public expenditure do not have the answer to the problem. It is difficult to argue that what is wrong with the economy is that there is shortage of demand. Just about the only thing that is booming is retail sales. The money supply is at the top of its target range. To argue that what is needed is a stimulus to demand helps foreign manufacturers rather than our own. At the same time, there are fiscal measures that we could take that would have the effect of creating more jobs without endangering the Government's overall economic strategy, but before looking at some of those specific measures I should like to examine the public sector borrowing requirement because it is central to the way in which the Government see their fiscal stance.

The Government are in serious danger of becoming obsessed with the absolute level of the PSBR. It has become a self-erected totem of fiscal respectability in much the same way as M3 was before, the sterling-dollar exchange rate has been and the balance of payments was in the 1960s. Perhaps it will go the same way. There is a danger that one is looking at a proxy for what is happening in the economy, finding one simple figure and following it.

The danger is that in concentrating on the absolute level of the PSBR the components that go to make it up are ignored. The effect on the economy of the different items of taxation and expenditure that go to make up the public sector's activities is far more important than the arithmetical difference between them. Does the incidence of various taxes encourage output and employment? Do various items of public expenditure help to reduce industrial costs? Is a particular item of public sector investment likely to show a good return? There is an enormous difference between borrowing money to pay increased wages in the public sector and borrowing money to pay for something such as the M25 road, which will have a substantial and beneficial effect in reducing industrial costs. What is important is not the absolute amount of the borrowing but the use to which it is channelled and whether that use is productive and will help to increase output and employment.

My other problem with the concentration on the PSBR is that I find it difficult to convince myself that small differences in the PSBR have much effect on interest rates. This financial year we have seen an overshoot of £1·25 billion in the projected PSBR, which seems to have had little effect on the market and interest rates. I suggest to my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Government that other factors are far more important in determining United Kingdom interest rates—oil prices, American interest rates and the view that is taken by financial markets of the prospects for domestic inflation. All those have a far greater impact on United Kingdom interest rates than marginal differences in the PSBR. I should have thought that £2 billion either way on the PSBR had far less effect on United Kingdom interest rates than a speech by Sheikh Yamani on oil prices or Mr. Henry Kaufman on the prospects for American interest rates.

Therefore, the Treasury has more room for manoeuvre on the PSBR than it thinks it has. If it planned a PSBR of £10 billion for 1985-86, it could do so with no adverse effect on interest rates if—this is an important caveat—the money were to be productively spent and the commitment to sound public sector finance were continued. If the Treasury adopted that stance, together with the £1·5 billion fiscal adjustment, that would give the Chancellor about £4·5 billion with which to construct a job creation package in his Budget. That is what I hope we shall see, because I do not see how one can avoid the conclusion that tackling unemployment must now come before tax cuts or raising tax thresholds; and every fiscal resource that is available to the Government must be directed to creating employment in the private sector directly or to stimulating output and employment by reducing industrial costs.

Particularly on Conservative Benches, but also in general, the debate has tended to be divided into those who think that the problem can be solved by increased public spending and those who think that it can be solved by continuing a tight fiscal stance and having tax cuts. In fact, there are other uses to which room for manoeuvre on public sector finances can be put. I shall suggest some ways in which I think the Government could use the £4·5 billion, or, in their own terms, whatever fiscal room they think they have to manoeuvre, to help to reduce unemployment.

First, I suggest that we have an increased programme of home improvements grants. I suggest the expenditure of an additional £1·5 billion. The net effect on PSBR would be less than £900 million after tax and social security adjustments are taken into account. On generally accepted figures, that could create about 125,000 jobs in the private sector, in work that needs to be done, which is unlikely to be done without help and stimulus from the Government.

Secondly, we should make a start on reducing the non-pay costs of employment. We abolished the national insurance surcharge, which was right because it was a tax on jobs. Why stop there? Employers' national insurance contributions have exactly the same effect. I suggest that the Government use some of the room that they have for manoeuvre for a phased reduction of employers' national insurance contributions, and I suggest lowering them by 1·5 per cent. a year over three years from approximately 10·5 per cent. to 6 per cent. Some 30 per cent. of national insurance contributions paid by employers is effectively paid by the Government because of the number of people employed in the public sector. Therefore, the cost to the PSBR is far less then it would originally appear to be. It is just under £1·2 billion for each 1·5 per cent. reduction. Such a reduction would both create jobs directly in the private sector and, through lower industrial costs, help to stimulate output and employment indirectly.

That leads to another matter that we should consider, which is the possibility of giving direct cash subsidies to private sector employers to employ people. If a married man with two children and a wife who is not working is unemployed, it costs the Government about £4,000 a year in social security benefit. If he were employed at average earnings, the Government's net tax revenues from him would be approximately £4,000 a year. Therefore, the difference to the Government in PSBR terms between his being employed and being unemployed is a staggering £8,000. Surely it makes sense for the Government to pay a private sector employer £6,000, for example, which is around 75 per cent. of the marginal cost of that unemployment, to employ the man on average earnings.

The rates of subsidy would be different for different types of unemployed people, but they could be calculated. I suggest that we consider seriously constructing a temporary system of subsidies, perhaps for net new jobs created in the next two years, with the subsidies being phased out over a period of four years. That would substantially reduce the cost of employment and therefore stimulate the employment of additional people. It would help to lower average industrial costs and thereby stimulate output.

Finally, we must be more aggressive in our industrial and trade policies in promoting the interests of British companies. We cannot sit around and allow British jobs to be destroyed by unfair foreign competition, and we must not allow foreign companies to capture markets by unfair trade practices. Although we have made some progress on that front, we should be more aggressive in the way that the French and Japanese have been in promoting their national interests. We should adopt the same attitude towards our national interests and the interests of our companies and employers.

I have suggested what I believe to be a modest programme of action which would be a start in the process of increasing production and creating more jobs. I do not believe, and doubt whether anyone does, that we can create 3 million new jobs overnight. However, we can and should develop practical and imaginative policies to tackle unemployment. We cannot appear to wash our hands of the nation's greatest social and economic problem.

8.9 pm

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): I wish that at least one Treasury Minister had been in the Chamber to hear the carefully reasoned challenge of the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) to many of the Government's dogmas. I also wish that the time limit allowed me to follow up some of his interesting leads. As it is, I shall speak briefly in support of the Liberal-SDP amendment. It contrasts sharply with the Labour motion, which argues something that we feel bound to oppose—a concentration of all of the resources of Government on the public sector. Our amendment is also in clear contrast to the tired and complacent phrases of the Government amendment.

Today's debate gave the Chancellor a most timely opportunity to show some leadership in the new circumstances that result from the exchange rate fracas and the hike in interest rates and the grim prospect for jobs that they involve. Aided by the blurred and blunted approach of the Labour Front Bench, the Chancellor missed that opportunity entirely and fell back on defensive remarks. The responsibility of Government for the level of employment coincides with an equally important duty—their stewardship of public assets. Whether they like the public sector that they inherited is irrelevant to that duty. They also have the historic duty of relieving the poorest in our society. Those are three fundamental objectives that no civilised Government can deny for long and they call for a substantial change in the thrust of Government policy.

If the Government need one, the recent chain of events has given them a good excuse for changing their policy. The Government's lamentably poor stewardship of public assets is a matter of common report from all parts of the country and all types of organisation. It is partly the House's fault as our primitive procedures never give us the opportunity, which every sensible business takes at least once a year, to review the state of our assets. We should as soon as possible have a system under which we do not vote public expenditure nor accept a Budget statement until we have had a comprehensive review of the state of public property.

There is plenty of information, which should have been available much earlier, from various private sources and research organisations such as the Policy Studies Institute, and now from the National Economic Development Council. The latter has drawn attention to a backlog of some £2 billion on hospital maintenance, the appalling state of the public sector housing stock, schools, roads and other assets. At the elementary level of repair and maintenance expenditure, let alone capital projects, the Government are falling lamentably short. Until we start to catch up with the appalling arrears in maintenance, there should be no dividend, as it were, to the shareholders who still have jobs and earn a regular income. No business would be allowed by its auditors to pay a dividend until they had been satisfied that the business was putting enough aside for the maintenance of its assets.

We must also consider proper provision for depreciation, including, in these days of rapid development, provision for obsolescence. We have out-of-date public buildings, especially hospitals, some of which are so ancient and difficult to clean that there is more risk of cross infection than from the disease for which a patient is admitted. They have ancient heating systems such as the one in this House which are prodigal with fuel and damaging to health. We must also consider the state of our housing stock.

I endorse heartily the appeal of the hon. Member for Lewisham, West for greater expenditure on house improvement grants. The Government seem utterly unaware of the plight of those people who, often at the behest of the Government, have recently become house owners, and now find that the entire household is without work and therefore have not the means to put the roof back or to deal with the broken chimney stack. There should be an improvement grant system, means-tested if need be, to enable our housing stock to be kept in reasonable condition.

More than 500,000 blue collar workers in construction industries are on the dole. Training opportunities for young people who should be entering construction industries are lamentably few. It ill becomes the Government to boast, as they have done again today, that they have launched what they call the greatest training scheme ever, when their policies are shamefully reducing the opportunities for training in some of our greatest building firms. For example, the chairman of Wimpey reported only yesterday that, whereas in 1979 he had 976 craft trainees, he now has only 260. His figures are even worse for professional trainees in, for example, design and estimating.

The proper maintenance of our assets and the provision of work and practical training for those who need it, some of whom have been waiting three years, are all related. I am dwelling on housing because it provides the greatest opportunities for lasting jobs. The need is eternal and the work is satisfying. As compared with road construction, which is not my hobby horse, house construction and improvement has been shown by various recent surveys to provide three times as many jobs per £1 million spent as road construction.

We should not be too proud to take lessons from the United States. The Federal Department of Housing and Urban Development has for some years operated urban development action grants. I do not have the most recent figures but, by 1982, that Department reckoned that $2 billion spent in Government grants had generated $15 billion of useful housing and development projects in less prosperous areas—not just the most distressed. There is much to be learnt from how other countries are tackling the joint problems of public need and lack of employment. It is high time that the Government adapted themselves to these present circumstances.

Mr. Ken Hargreaves (Hyndburn): As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the Government have had some success in reducing inflation; a success which has benefited every citizen, employed and unemployed. Unemployment is now the main worry of most people. There is a feeling that the Government are not doing enough to reduce it. Whether that is true, and whether the criticism is fair, matters little. The Government must redouble their efforts to reduce the number of people who are unemployed. They must, in their own interests, ensure that the public are aware of the effort that they are making.

I believe that the Government are interested in reducing unemployment, just as they are interested in keeping public expenditure under control and about promoting owner-occupation for people in lower income groups. Increasing spending on improvement grants is the only way in which the Government can achieve those three objectives at the same time. Money invested in that sector of housing is not contrary to the Government's current economic policies. Spending of relatively small amounts of money now will not just provide jobs in the housing construction industry and in manufacturing, but will reduce the need to spend larger sums later and allow owner-occupiers to remain in the private sector.

[Mr. Ken Hargreaves]

In mine and similar constituencies, we improve our present substandard housing and keep it in the private sector, or we allow it to deteriorate still further so that eventually it must be demolished and replaced by council houses at five or six times the cost of improvement grants. That cannot be in line with the Government's public expenditure policy. Given that the Government are rightly committed to widening owner-occupation and to selling council houses, it cannot make any sense to allow existing owner-occupied properties to fall into disrepair, to be demolished and replaced by council houses.

Unless the Government alter course, they will in the long term fail in two of the three objectives that I have mentioned. Even if they are successful in the third—reducing unemployment—they will have ensured the need for a massive surge in public expenditure on housing and a shift back from owner-occupation to public sector housing.

The 1983 Conservative party manifesto clearly said:

"Our goal is to make Britain the best housed nation in Europe".

What is the position today? Given present resources, the chance of even approaching that manifesto promise, let alone achieving it, seems impossible. In England alone over 4 million houses are defective in some way, 2 million of them requiring repairs costing between £2,500 and £7,000. The cost of putting all those deficiencies right was estimated at some £30 billion in 1981.

I realise that the Government have made it a cornerstone of their policy to ensure that public expenditure does not consume too great a proportion of the nation's wealth. Progress towards making this country the best housed in Europe depends upon the provision of a sound economic base and on the creation of productive employment—not just the making of artificial jobs—and I look to the Government to provide a balanced programme for housing, to provide the public finance necessary to pump-prime housing strategy, and to do it in a way which attracts additional private investment to an area of spending which is extremely labour-intensive and in which jobs could be quickly created.

I was greatly flattered last week to receive a letter from the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) acknowledging the fact that I was a Member of Parliament who put common sense first. I am most grateful for that comment, despite the fact that it probably ruined whatever slight chance of promotion I had inside the Conservative party. Having resisted the immediate temptation to join the Liberal party where promotion is much easier to obtain, I have to disappoint the right hon. Gentleman further by informing him that the same common sense tells me that it is as easy for the Liberals, who have never had power, to tell the Government what policies they should follow as it is for the Labour party, which will never have power again, to advise the Government.

Anyone can condemn and criticise, but on improvement grants, for example, such condemnation and criticism come ill from the Labour party, during whose term of office from 1975 to 1979 only 67,000 improvement grants were made each year in England—only half the number made by the previous Conservative Government from 1970 to 1974, and less than one third of the 230,000 made in 1983. Criticism comes equally unfairly from the Liberal party, which kept such a disastrous Labour Government in power.

Conservative Members who recognise what the Government have achieved and who welcome it are entitled to say that they want them to do even more. In my constituency, £223,000 was spent on improvement grants in the last year of the Labour Government. Under this Government we shall spend £1·8 million this year. That is an increase which is greatly appreciated in terms of the number of houses dealt with and the significant effect that it will have on reducing unemployment, but even more needs to be done if we are to make inroads into our severe housing and unemployment problems. It would be disastrous to do less, and a tragedy if we do not take the opportunity to do more.

I hope, therefore, that, while the Government will ignore many of the comments from the Opposition Benches, they will listen to the worries of many of their supporters and provide a reasonable balance between the rumoured tax cuts and increased spending on labour-intensive projects in areas of greatest need, which would do much to reassure people that we are determined to do everything that we can to reduce unemployment.

8.26 pm

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): I wish not to talk about the sterling crisis or economic policy, but to register the despair and despondency felt by thousands of my unemployed constituents. I should not need to do that nor to lay out the bare facts of the level and scale of unemployment in my constituency, but, given that many people in the south and many Conservative Members representing southern constituencies do not know or understand the scale of the problem in areas such as mine, I feel it incumbent upon me to make it clear to them.

I represent a constituency in which more than 10,000 people are unemployed — a 27 per cent. rate of unemployment — where over 6,000 of them are long-term unemployed, and where in the relatively small town of Kirkby, with a population of between 40,000 and 50,000, there are now over 7,000 men, women and young people unemployed. There are a mere 56 vacancies at the jobcentre and no vacancies — nor have there been for several years—at any of the career offices.

In the borough of Knowsley in 1983 only 10 per cent. of school leavers went into full-time employment and last year only 6 per cent. Over half of the 18 and 19-year-olds have never had a full-time job. The overwhelming majority of my constituents leave school, get married and have children while on the dole and they are never likely to have a job. Their youth, their life, their aspirations and opportunities have been blighted, if not destroyed.

Knowsley is a constituency and a borough that has faced a horrendous and unremitting catalogue of factory closures and redundancies, where currently the only economic activity seems to be that of derelict land reclamation which, in effect, amounts to demolishing factories built 10 to 15 years ago and levelling the ground for some other unspecified activity in the distant future.

As every hon. Member will be aware, the figures do not give an accurate picture of the scale, the depth or the terrifying social consequences of unemployment which are currently a reality in parts of my constituency.

It is not just that whole families are unemployed, or that not one person living in multi-storey blocks of flats—perhaps seven, 12 or 14 storeys high—is in full-time work, or that people in an entire street are unemployed. There are two boroughs located in my constituency where only 25 per cent. of the economically active are in full-time employment. As one would expect, the result of such long-term unemployment is massive, demonstrable and conspicuous poverty and deprivation.

The poverty and deprivation are illustrated by a great variety of factors. I shall give two examples. Sixty-eight per cent. of all schoolchildren in the borough are in receipt of free school meals, 61 per cent. of the school population is in receipt of some help with school clothing, 80 per cent. of council tenants, in virtually a 90 per cent. council tenant borough, receive some help with housing benefit and more than 50 per cent. of all households are in receipt of state benefit. We have even reached the stage where Fine Fare is no longer viable in my constituency and has had to close down. We have moved on from the closure of factories, social clubs and the local newspaper to the closure of a supermarket which is selling basic food and necessities. To the despair of the population, it was no longer viable and had to close.

Whole areas of both Kirkby and, more horrendously, Cantril Farm, or Stockbridge village as it is now called, contain shops which are boarded up, which have no goods to sell and which no longer function. Nobody in Maidstone, Dorking or Guildford can have any conception of what it is like to see only three shops open in a purpose-built shopping centre which was created only 10 or 15 years ago: a video shop, a baker's shop and a betting shop. Every other shop has corrugated iron across what used to be its windows. This is more reminiscent of Belfast than of a mainland town in Britain. The despair, despondency and distress caused by this ever-deepening poverty is shown very clearly by the vandalism and destruction of our public assets.

Both in this debate and in other debates many hon. Members have alluded to what might be the social consequences of continuing to tolerate such unacceptably high levels of unemployment. Those social consequences are already evident in my constituency. Very few weeks pass without there being some kind of—I use the term in inverted commas but it is used in the full meaning of its term by the police and other members of the local community—"riot" in one part of the constituency. Young unemployed people now burn down schools. They are burnt down with amazing rapidity in Cantril Farm, for example. They then stone the firemen, the ambulance services and the police when they arrive. It has become their only way of showing their frustration and despair. Perhaps it is also their only means of amusing themselves. The way in which this is being allowed to happen without proper public comment, acknowledgement and debate is frightening. Those in the south who speak about an economic revival through tax cuts have no conception or understanding of the depths of despondency in my constituency and other areas like it.

My constituents are not fools. They know that it does not have to be like that. They know that they do not have to be unemployed and that they could have the same opportunities and advantages as are enjoyed by people in other parts of the country, especially the south. They know that it is foolish to have 40,000 people in Merseyside on the waiting list for hospital treatment while hospitals are empty and nurses and doctors are unemployed.

They know that it makes sense to match the need for medical attention with the available resources and that it is absurd that there should be such overcrowding, inadequate housing and homelessness in my constituency, let alone on Merseyside, while their brothers, fathers, relatives and they themselves are unemployed construction workers. They know that it makes sense to use their skills and abilities in repairing the housing stock. They know that it is absurd that such an inadequate social provision should be tolerated while thousands of their fellow citizens are idle. They know that it is possible to put the two together. They know that a totally different world exists in the south and in other parts of the country and that they have been written off.

It would be both obscene and a betrayal of those people if it should be suggested that economic revival or job creation could be brought about by tax cuts. Even more importantly, we cannot go on telling people that they do not count and that they are worthless. We cannot continue to make them feel that they do not belong to this community, that they have no part to play in our society and that they will never be the beneficiaries. Very soon they will take their revenge, and so they should.

8.35 pm

Mr. John Watts (Slough): We have heard from the Opposition Benches yesterday's arguments from yesterday's men. I recall that expansion of public spending and borrowing was the Labour Party's prescription for unemployment in June 1983, but their claim that a massive expansion of public spending and borrowing would achieve a substantial reduction in unemployment lacked credibility and lacks credibility now. The seeds of unemployment were sown in those years of rapid growth in public expenditure at a time when the economy was stagnating. As public spending consumed an increasing share of our national resources we saw also the performance of our economy go into inexorable decline. It was to reverse those inexorable trends of rising public expenditure, borrowing and inflation and the continuing economic decline that a Conservative Government were elected in 1979.

In 1983 we were re-elected with a massively increased majority, of which I am happy to be a part, to complete the task of reversing those destructive trends and setting the economy on a soundly based course of sustainable growth. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer reminded the House earlier, the economy is now into its fourth year of recovery. That sustained growth has been achieved without any resurgence of damaging inflation. The present policies of the Government, which have given the highest priority to defeating inflation and controlling public expenditure and borrowing, have created an extra 300,000 jobs in the past year.

I am not persuaded that a return to the policy of expanding public spending is likely to produce a more rapid expansion of employment. Indeed, the simulation on the Treasury model of the effect of the £1 billion increase in local authority capital expenditure showed an increase in employment of only 24,000 jobs, at a cost in excess of £40,000 per job. If, as the right hon. Member for Birmingham Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) argued, the whole of the £1·5 billion fiscal adjustment were used in this way, the net effect would be the creation of only 36,000 new jobs. I consider that to be no great prize.

[Mr. John Watts]

The major achievement of the Government's economic policy has been to combat inflation. I believe that that must remain the first priority. But the achievement has been somewhat more modest when it comes to reducing taxation, even though income tax thresholds have been increased substantially in real terms. When comparisons are made between our economic performance and those of the United States and Japan I find it to be more persuasive that the substantially lower levels of taxation enjoyed in those countries have more to do with their economic success than with any higher level of borrowing.

Reducing taxation must be our top priority. It is not an insult to the unemployed to recognise the need to remove tax disincentives from taking relatively low paid employment. The priority which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor attaches to raising income tax thresholds is right. However, I would also urge him to have regard to another similar disincentive, that which arises from the incidence of national insurance contributions.

I urge him to consider two changes. First, he should change the system whereby the total income becomes liable to contribution once the threshold is crossed. That results in a confiscatory marginal rate of tax and is every bit as much a disincentive to taking relatively low paid employment as is the incidence of income tax.

Secondly, following an argument similar to that advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples), I ask my right hon. Friend to consider providing an incentive by way of remission of employers' contributions to businesses which increase employment. What I have in mind is not an across-the-board reduction in rate or any specific payment of subsidy, but rather a system where perhaps a ceiling is set on the amount that a company would be required to pay in employers' contributions. That should be set at the level paid in the previous year so that the company will have, so to speak, a year's tax holiday from paying the employers' part of the national insurance contribution that related to any increase in its payroll costs.

If that were done, it would not only provide a direct incentive to increase employment, but it would also have the effect of reducing unit labour costs. I am reminded of my right hon. Friend's assertion in the debate on unemployment in October 1984 of the connection between reductions in the level of real earnings and increases in the level of employment in the economy—that for every 1 per cent. reduction in the level of real earnings there is an increase of between 0·5 and 1 per cent. in the level of employment, between 150,000 and 200,000 jobs. A further reduction in employers' national insurance contributions in the way that I have suggested would achieve a similar result.

I commend my right hon. Friend's rejection of siren calls for a return to voodoo high expenditure policies, whether those calls come from the Labour Benches or from below the Gangway. Such policies have not achieved conspicuous success in the past and I have no reason to believe that they will be more successful now.

For my part, I shall continue to support the economic strategy on which I fought and won my election campaign in Slough in June 1983.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): The hon. Gentleman will not be here long.

Mr. Watts: Time will tell whether I or Labour Members are right.

That strategy is one of continued lower inflation, firm control of public spending and borrowing, and progressively lower taxation to provide the best recipe for sustaining economic growth and increasing employment opportunities.

8.42 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I do not intend to follow the hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts), but his speech was a manifestation of the state of mind that Back Benchers of a faltering Government get themselves into, whistling in the wind to keep their own spirits up. It is potentially a manifestation of the bunker mentality which is coming over the Government as they attempt to talk up a recovery which is faltering. It was never a real surge of growth, but a rather small bounce back from the immense depression and deflation which they inflicted on the economy between 1979 and 1981. If the Government have an economic strategy, it is essentially the belief that since phoenixes rise from ashes, the more ashes we create the better the health of Britain's economy will be.

Nor do I intend to speak at length in praise of the Opposition's motion, because that is so obviously straightforward that there is no more to be said about it. We are in a situation which Galbraith described in the 1950s, which I then thought applied to America rather than to Britain, of private affluence and public squalor. That description is beginning to describe what is happening in Britain under the Government. Thanks to that, there is so much to be done by public spending that the motion speaks for itself.

However, we must emphasise the other side of the story. We need to emphasise the problem of manufacturing and, yes, the problems of the private sector. The Labour party is the only real friend of the private sector, particularly manufacturing industry, in Britain. It is the only party whose policies can provide should be dedicated to provide, and will be dedicated to provide, the climate of expansion, growth, buoyancy and optimism, and the framework which industry needs if it is to expand, to grow, and to bring down unemployment.

The Government, the so-called friend of the private sector, have done the exact opposite. They have inflicted immense damage on industry and the private sector. The Prime Minister's economic policies are not really economic at all. They are a system of morality. The right hon. Lady wants, not growth, but a discipline on the economy. Unfortunately, in a modern, complex, capitalist economy, discipline is the enemy of that which is needed to provide the dynamic for the future — investment. Investment needs the expectation of profit. It needs the climate of optimism and the expectation of growth ahead. All that the Government have generated is depression, discipline and gloom, which are the enemies of the investment that we need to get us out of our difficulties.

The real agency of mismanagement under the Government has been the exchange rate. The value of the pound as against other currencies, the means which adjusts our relationship with the world, is essentially an instrument of economic policy. It is not something to be put aside and neglected entirely; nor is it the phallic symbol which Conservative Governments in the past have seen it as.

It is a test of the stupidity and intellectual failure of so much of British industry that it has not seen the importance of the exchange rate and the importance of bringing that exchange rate down to improve our competitive position in the world and to give to industry and the economy the only boost which can now get us back into a competitive situation. The fall, which has really been a rise in the dollar, should have been welcomed by the Government, and, indeed, by the country, because it was taking us back towards a competitive situation. Unfortunately, the Chancellor lost his nerve and decided to increase interest rates to defend the pound, as if the pound, having been neglected by the Government for so long, was suddenly a sacred symbol again.

Yet the Chancellor has done that just at the moment when the decline against the dollar was opening up substantial opportunities in America to British exporters. We were not seizing them as avidly and successfully as the Japanese or Germans, but the opportunities were there and British industry was responding to them. The right hon. Gentleman is trying to choke off those opportunities, and at the same time he has failed to recognise that the pound is still substantially over-valued against the currencies of those countries which are now our major industrial competitors, particularly West Germany and Japan. We are still substantially over-valued in real terms against West Germany.

At the end of 1976 the Labour Government pledged themselves to the IMF to manage the exchange rate to maintain the competitive position of British industry at home and abroad. Yet the pound is now in real terms about 40 per cent. over-valued against the deutschmark. How can we maintain a competitive position against West Germany? It is no wonder that we are running such a huge deficit in manufactured trade with the EEC—a deficit which this year will almost certainly be over £10,000 million.

We are essentially becoming an industrial and manufacturing colony of West Germany, not a great manufacturing power in our own right, thanks to the way in which the exchange rate has been mismanaged by the Government. The effect has been felt by manufacturing industry. That is where the jobs have gone. That is where the expansion needs to come. That is where our efforts need to be concentrated. To fulfil those efforts we can only use the exchange rate to get us back to a competitive situation.

The surge in unemployment has come, not in the public sector, but in the manufacturing sector of the economy. The jobs have been lost there. The number of jobs lost in manufacturing is almost as great as the total increase in unemployment. In the five years to June 1984 we lost nearly 1,700,000 jobs in manufacturing. That has been the basic cause of the rise in unemployment. In the five years to the second quarter of 1984 employment in manufacturing in the United Kingdom dropped by 22 per cent., compared with a fall of only 7 per cent. in the United States and an increase of about 5 per cent. in Japan. Whether a developed economy loses manufacturing jobs depends upon how the economy is run and with what aim. The loss of manufacturing jobs is a uniquely British failure, caused largely by exchange rates.

The problem is therefore to get the pound down. To do that, we need to spend. Recessions arise from no other cause than a deficiency in demand, which means a deficiency in spending. The only way to get demand up again is to spend. Whether that spending comes from the Government or the private sector is immaterial. The Labour strategy would be a combination of both. There must be an increase in spending to redress the deficiency in demand. In my view, that increase in spending must be financed not just by borrowing and taxation, both of which merely transfer purchasing power from one section to another, but by the creation of additional purchasing power—as has occurred in the United States thanks to the inflow of funds from overseas. Conservative Members who believe that unemployment is inevitable should consider that in the United States that process has created 7 million jobs in little more than two years.

In this country we might need to print the money, but we must have that increase in the money supply to boost purchasing power so as to achieve an expanding economy. With the old-fashioned gold standard, if the economy was depressed gold would flow in, thus enlarging the credit base and increasing the money supply so that interest rates fell and investment picked up. That was an automatic adjustment mechanism. The Government are doing exactly the opposite. Instead of printing the money and expanding the money supply, they have been over-funding and taking money out of the economy, largely so that the Chancellor could achieve monetary targets which were mere fetishes bearing no relation to the economy, as well as helping his banking friends.

Expansion in the sense that I have described may produce a surge in demand for imports, but there is no harm in that if those imports are used to create jobs and investment in this country. Even if they merely reduce the balance of payments surplus, they will bring down the pound, and by bringing down the exchange rate will make industry and the whole economy more competitive. There is no inevitable, fatalistic correlation between being an oil power and going into industrial decline. Whether manufacturing industry declines depends——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I call Mr. Alan Howarth.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): It is said that the Labour party motion on the supremely important subject of unemployment amounts to no more than a recycling of the illusion that we can spend our way into prosperity and into jobs. The hard-won experience of a generation should have taught us that that is not so, that to concentrate resources in the public sector is to use them relatively inefficiently and unproductively, that a spending boost born out of panic generates few and temporary jobs and that the increases in taxes, interest rates and inflation caused by such a boost are damaging and destroy jobs elsewhere in the economy.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) referred to Lord Halisham's expedition to the north-east, but in 1963-64 public expenditure represented 34 per cent. of GDP, whereas in 1983-84 it was 43 per cent. Somewhere in that progression or deterioration we crossed the critical threshold beyond which high and stable employment, which should always be a cardinal objective, is no longer to be had and political stability is even at risk.

It is strangest of all that the Labour party should put down this motion at the very time when the Government, whom the Opposition condemn for heartless stringency, are being given a rather rough time by the markets, which suspect a certain fiscal laxity. One wonders where the pound and interest rates would be if the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) were Chancellor.

I wish to refer briefly to four elements which should be part of our strategy for jobs. I believe that the Government can do significantly more and that there are more levers to pull than my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has recognised.

First, we should renew our attack on inflation and be more consistent about it. It is no coincidence that in the years since the war peaks of inflation have been followed by new peaks of unemployment. The reasons are clear. Inflation saps the profitability of companies, reducing the capacity and willingness of managers to invest. It induces aggression in pay bargaining. It drives up interest rates. In all those ways, inflation destroys jobs.

Unemployment is properly the intense preoccupation of all of us. There can be no Member of Parliament who is not urgently concerned to find ways to reduce unemployment and the unhappiness that it brings. It does not follow from that, however, that we should somehow subordinate our attack on inflation to policies to reduce unemployment. On the contrary, the two are inextricably tied together. I am concerned that the Government have slackened their drive to reduce inflation. It was 3·7 per cent. annualised at the time of the general election. In the year ending last November it was 4·9 per cent., and it is predicted to be 4 per cent., 5 per cent. or even more in the coming year. I am even tempted to suspect that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has become something of a crypto-reflationist. His last Budget marked a certain shift away from the emphasis on control of public expenditure and the reduction of inflation towards a preference for tax cuts and growth. At that time inflation was predicted to be 4 per cent. in the second quarter of 1985. The autumn statement marked a further shift in the same direction and the prediction rose to 4·75 per cent.

I believe that my right hon. Friend has run certain risks in the reflationary direction. He has made it clear that he is impatient to bring interest rates down — naturally enough, but in my view somewhat impetuously—and he has made it clear that he has been happy to see some devaluation of the pound. He has also held out the prospect of tax cuts. The markets have now made it clear to him that he has dared too much.

It is appropriate that we should now renew our quest for honest money. Unless we have financial stability and money in which people can be confident, our economy will be on shifting sands and less able to generate jobs than it otherwise could be. I suspect that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not disagree with me about any of that.

I agree with my right hon. Friend that if we are to have more jobs we must have lower taxes. High taxation drains the lifeblood from the private sector, which is the source of the wealth of our economy and of our capacity to employ people. I am glad, however, that recently my right hon. Friend has displayed caution about the prospects of tax cuts being deliverable in the spring. I have been worried that tax cuts should be held out as a prospect, not on the basis of securely limited public expenditure, but on the basis of oil revenues at a peak and asset sales, similarly at a peak. We would be left with a structural PSBR too high to be consistent with the requirements of low interest rates, stable sterling and low inflation.

The problem has been that the public sector has been recalcitrant to reform. The Chancellor's strategy has therefore been to hold public expenditure steady in real terms and to allow the growth in the economy to express itself in the private sector. I doubt whether that strategy is politically achievable. Pressures for higher public expenditure surround us at every point on the battle front. I do not believe that our economy is as stably based as the Chancellor posits. A choice must therefore be made. Either we move with great national reluctance down the path to Socialism, along which the Labour party beckons us, or we move towards a Conservative society based on greater freedom and responsibility.

I had hoped that my right hon. Friend would invite the country to debate the role of the state and respective commitments of the public and the private sectors. I had hoped that the debate would be led by the Conservative party in its manifesto at the general election and that it would be developed in the Green Paper on the next 10 years, but that was a disappointing document. It is not too late—indeed, it is more critical than ever—to develop such a debate.

I am in favour, not of sudden or draconian action, but of gradualism. The debate should be conducted in calm, humane and reasoned tones. I do not underestimate the opposition that there would be from vested interests, entrenched orthodoxies, the faint hearted and the factious, but I believe that the debate is necessary.

Notwithstanding my reservations about the difficulties and the unsatisfactory condition that we face in public expenditure, if it is judged responsibly that we have scope for tax cuts this spring, I hope that my right hon. Friend will look for the most employment-effective tax cuts. I shall suggest two.

Many hon. Members have referred to the opportunities that might be found in the reform of the national insurance system. If the threshold for the employers national insurance contribution is raised to £6,000, it will become 10 per cent. cheaper to employ 40 per cent. of British workers. That would make a significant difference. I do not believe that we shall have lower pay settlements as a result of rather bleak rhetoric and exhortation, but if we make it cheaper to employ people, more people will be employed.

Secondly, it is worth mentioning a further valuable opportunity. VAT is levied on firms with an annual turnover of more than £18,700. In 1983-84, 93·3 per cent. of net VAT payments were made by the 24 per cent. of VAT registered businesses with taxable turnovers in excess of £100,000. The benefit to the Exchequer, after the cost of collecting VAT on three quarters of businesses, is therefore very small. At the same time, the administrative burden of completing VAT returns is a drain on small businesses, which should be the main source of new jobs. To raise the VAT threshold for businesses to a turnover of at least £100,000 is, therefore, attactive and should be given high priority.

Thirdly, I hope that the Government will do more to call off the bureaucratic harassment of businesses. It is disproportionately hampering to small businesses, the principal asset of which is the energy of the boss. Yet in this country someone running a small business must put up with a barrage of statutes, statutory orders, European Community regulations, local government regulations and the ministrations of, at the last count, 2,167 quangos. No wonder the contribution to employment by small businesses is less than it might be. I hope that the Government will be willing to consider taking discretionary powers to exempt small businesses from a range of bureaucratic requirements.

I shall not enlarge on the scope that exists for reforming the labour market, which is the fourth area in which our strategy needs to be energetically developed, other than to observe that trade unions, by forcing pay above what the market will bear, and by resisting technological change, are still destroying job opportunities. We must find a fairer balance between employers and unions. Similarly, wages councils are asking for more than the market can bear. That hurts the employment of the young and the unskilled especially.

The Government have no magic wand to wave, but, by pursuing a vigorous and coherent approach in these four areas, they can hasten the structural reform of the economy and bring closer the moment when there will again be enough jobs to go round.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): I wish that the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth), who has 3,000 unemployed people in his constituency, would visit my area and explain to the 20,000 unemployed there—unemployment has increased by three times since the Government came to office—those sorts of solutions. It is no surprise that the Secretary of State for Employment allowed some of his time to the hon. Gentleman, because he is one of the few hon. Members to support the Government's policy on unemployment.

The debate is about the increase in mass unemployment in the United Kingdom after five years of Tory policies, three of which the Government claim to be years of recovery. It is also about the Government's priority for reducing unemployment. Since 1979, we have witnessed the trebling of unemployment, despite the Government's efforts to massage the figures downwards by recording only those who claim unemployment benefit and those not on Government schemes. The reality is that almost 4 million people are unemployed, which cruelly exposes the Tory election poster, showing queues of unemployed people, which said, "Labour isn't working." That Labour Government could at least claim that they left office, despite an increased working population of 900,000, with 310,000 more people in work than when they came to office in 1974, although I admit that they were extremely dissatisfied with unemployment at 1·2 million. If we enjoyed unemployment of 1·2 million today, that would have been welcomed by most speakers in this debate and by most people outside the House, with the exception of the Government's spokesmen, as was revealed in the deplorable speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the beginning of the debate.

There is clear evidence that since 1979 the Government have contributed directly to increasing by 2·5 million the number of unemployed through their obsession with the public sector borrowing requirement and cutting public capital expenditure, which they believe will secure lower inflation. For every 1 per cent. reduction in inflation since 1979, the Government have contributed to throwing half a million people on the dole in order to create what they call an honest money policy. That honest money policy has been cruelly exposed on the currency exchange market during the past few days.

Mass unemployment was the expected result of such a policy. Indeed, I would argue that it was the Government's intention to create unemployment on that scale as an instrument of policy to achieve lower inflation. Most people predicted that it would happen if they pursued those policies. The policies are being pursued in the name of outdated theories, and are financed solely by the squandering of a massive amount of oil wealth which, a few years ago, everyone believed would be a blessing, but which is now talked of, at least in this debate, as though it were the curse of the British economy. It is clear that oil revenue has financed the experiments with our economy, of which the main cost has been 4 million unemployed.

Today we stand witness to the abject failure of Government policy to increase sufficiently production, demand and investment, which are essential prerequisites for the reduction of unemployment. Earlier today the Chancellor quoted from the OECD report—I hope that he will be able to join us before the debate ends—but he did not quote the essential part of the report that deals with the amount of investment that has been made in Britain. The reality is that the investment per head in the United Kingdom compared to the rest of the OECD countries is worse than that in 18 other countries, and only Portugal and Greece come after us. That is one reason why we have a worse level of unemployment than that experienced by other OECD countries which have also suffered from the world depression.

We have been told today that the Government do not have a bottomless purse of public expenditure to solve this crisis by spending our way out of it. That point has also been made by Labour Members. However, the debate today has been about the availability of resources under this Government. The argument as to whether we are prepared to spend millions or billions to reduce unemployment is not the issue of the debate. As various hon. Members have pointed out, the issue concerns the amount of resources that the Government acknowledged in their autumn statement to be available for either tax cuts or for reducing unemployment.

The essence of the dispute in this debate has been whether the £1·5 billion should be used for public expenditure or given in tax cuts. We know that unemployment can be reduced by either of those courses. The dispute is about whether we can reduce unemployment more by using public expenditure or by cutting taxes. We wish to make it unequivocally clear that any available resources should be used to increase public capital expenditure because that reduces the level of unemployment far more and at a faster rate than by simply giving the money out in tax cuts.

All this is apart from the morality of the argument of whether we should give more money to people who are better off rather than use it to help those who are worse off, those suffering because of the increased level of unemployment. There is also the increased number of those who have been unemployed for over a year, with more than 1 million in that category.

It was interesting to listen to hon. Members and to see how the level of unemployment in their constituencies was reflected in what they said. I am not saying that those hon. Members with low unemployment in their areas had no concern for high unemployment and its attendant problems, but there is a remarkable correlation between a low level of unemployment and the hon. Members who have spoken in favour of the Government's policies. The constituency of the hon. Member for Stratford-upon-Avon has an unemployment level of about 3,500. The hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) represents an area with a similar level of unemployment, and he said that he did not want the Government to deviate from their policies. The Secretary of State for Employment and the Chancellor of the Exchequer have similar rates of unemployment in their constituencies.

However, in my constituency unemployment is 8,000, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) has about 10,000 unemployed. In Slough, Stratford-on-Avon, Blaby and Bridgwater over 30 per cent. of the unemployed have been without a job for more than a year. In the Labour constituencies that I have mentioned, over 52 per cent. have been unemployed for more than a year. My hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) has 50 per cent. unemployment in some parts of his constituency, with 60 per cent. of the children on free school meals.

The social consequencies of long-term high unemployment have been vividly illustrated in the debate. I calculated the total levels of unemployment in the areas represented by the Labour Shadow Cabinet and those represented by Ministers in the Cabinet. The same relationship is evident. There are twice as many unemployed in the constituencies represented in the Shadow Cabinet as in those represented in the Cabinet. I believe that that has an effect on the Government's attitude in determining their priorities as between tax cuts and public expenditure.

In reading to prepare for the debate, I was strongly impressed by the booklet by the "Weekend World" television programme in which the interview with the Chancellor was reported. The Chancellor said:

"Thinking that Government can determine the level of employment—that is totally false".

I do not think that any hon. Member has doubted today that the Government can use their resources to increase employment and reduce unemployment. It is a question of whether they have the will and the desire to do so. I think that the Chancellor is completely wrong in adopting the position he has. The Government can influence the level of employment to a considerable degree.

The Chancellor was heard to make disparaging remarks about the computer models by which one can make certain comparisons. He made great play of the Labour party's policy before the election and the effect of devaluation on some of the policies that were drawn from such computer models. If we do not use objective criteria and attempt to evaluate what the models tell us, we shall fly by the seat of our pants, and the Chancellor has not been doing very well this week in making just such judgments. All the information contained in these models and, indeed, in the Treasury's own model, with which we must work quite considerably, shows that from twice to five times the number of jobs can be created by public expenditure programmes rather than by tax cuts. It is a matter for the judgment of hon. Members and particularly of the Government who have the power to decide which course of action they are prepared to take.

Listening to the debate one would think that we were entirely at the mercy of market forces and that it was not Government policy that had created unemployment in the country. Many Conservative Members have regularly and consistently voted for policies which have deliberately increased unemployment, partly in the belief, as the Chancellor said tonight, that the public sector industries are over-manned. Whether that is true or not, one of the consequences of tightening the financial targets and borrowing of those industries is to shake people out. That has taken place on a considerable scale, and Government claim credit for it.

The Government say to the rail industry—and this is what I find most offensive—"Yes, you can have your electrification programme". They do not give the industry more money to improve services or to extend electrification. They simply say, "Throw more people on the dole and that is the way you'll pay for the investment." That is what British Rail is now doing, and the state then picks up the tab for more people on the dole. They do not thereby boost demand but, rather, increase the burden on the Government and on public expenditure in supporting those policies. When one considers what the Government have done in roads, hospitals, education and the water boards—and much of this has been said in the debate—even if the level of public expenditure can be shown to be the same in the capital areas as in 1979, frankly, it is not enough. That is not the benchmark. Unemployment then was at the level of 1 million. Unemployment now is approaching 4 million and is likely to continue to increase. In those circumstances, one has to make a proper assessment of public expenditure.

I advise anybody who has any doubt about the deterioration in the country's infrastructure not necessarily to read the TUC report or to rely on the CBI report, but to read the Neddy report which only this week described the state of the infrastructure—the deterioration in the roads, the costs involved, the running down of the water and sewerage systems, all of which involve national public sector investment to a considerable extent. There is a whole range of choices which can be taken into account in these public expenditure options.

As to voting for tighter financial targets and reducing by £300 million the amount invested in regional policy, we have seen that regional expenditure has created jobs under both Tory and Labour Governments. It might not have produced enough and might have produced them more expensively than others, but there is no doubt that it created extra jobs. But we spent less in real terms on regional policy in 1984 than we spent in 1964, when unemployment stood at 500,000.

Mr. Maples: If public sector capital investment is such a good thing, why did the last Labour Government cut it by 40 per cent. in real terms?

Mr. Prescott: I have to admit that the figures are clear. I do not know about the precise quality of that public expenditure, or whether the figure was 40 per cent., but there were cuts in public expenditure. As a result, there was an increase in unemployment. I shall not run away from the point—how can I? The figures on public expenditure are there for all to see. But the hon.

Gentleman will have to accept that public expenditure influences unemployment and that the Government have the choice of using the £1·5 billion that they say is available in that way.

The hon. Gentleman served with me in Committee on the London Regional Transport Bill. He should have realised that supporting that Bill would lead to more unemployment, fewer buses on order, and so on. But all that is now clear. The Bill was enacted simply to save £500 million of public expenditure, and as a result thousands more will be thrown out of work. I just ask the hon. Gentleman to question what he was doing in Committee. The answer is that he was voting for unemployment.

The point about public expenditure on a national level is equally true of public expenditure at the local authority level. We have already heard a lot about housing, roads and so on. Public expenditure is involved in all of those areas, yet the Government have sought, by financial controls, to reduce the amounts of money available to authorities. One particularly offensive effect of the restraints on local authorities is that the local authority enterprise and employment units that have been creating jobs at £3,000 a time have been cut at a time when the Government's enterprise zones produce a job for about £80,000 a time.

Therefore, the Government and their Back Benchers have been voting for constraints on local authorities despite the fact that those authorities can legitimately point to the number of jobs that they have created. Thus, the effects of public expenditure at the local and national level, and on both the public and private sectors, are clear. After all, we have all received letters from the private sector calling for expenditure in the public sector because, in the main, all the orders involved are private orders. Both sectors produce wealth and jobs. The money comes from the Government via the taxpayer.

The House is asked to make a choice in the order of its priorities as between public expenditure and tax cuts. I would be more convinced of the Governments' policies if they believed that we must get out of what some call the old smokestack industries and into the sunrise industries. Last night, a television programme showed miners in Scotland talking in silicon glen. They could not see any prospect of jobs, even if they left the mines. Why? The answer is that the Prime Minister's adviser, Professor Ashman, has produced a report for NEDC that talks about the crisis in our information technology industries. He says that the sun has set on the sunrise industries. Indeed, the Chancellor is reported as saying, "Please don't use such purple prose in my presence." Last night on television he was quoted as saying that, but I do not know whether it is correct.

The Government have put £200 million into information technology and have now ordered a moritorium on investment in it. The Germans have put £800 million into information technology—four times as much. The Government believe in their privatisation programme, but it is a pity that the money that they secured from selling British Telecom—about £4 billion — was not invested in the information technology industries to provide a way forward for the new type of industry needed in this country. I wish that the Government had given to the information technology industries the almost £400 million they gave the bankers to float off the deal instead of paying their friends in the City to privatise an important and essential industry. If the Government had done that, their privatisation programme would have made more sense than feeding public borrowing to support the high level of expenditure needed to maintain massive levels of unemployment.

The Chancellor will go to the United States this week to convince the Government of his policies—I hope that he does better than he did today—and will come back telling us about the importance of the service industries. Britain has increased the number of jobs in the service industries. The problem is that she has allowed her manufacturing industries to collapse, whereas such industries have increased in America, even though they may have been assisted by deficit financing, as the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) pointed out. That policy has led to greater growth and lower unemployment in America, but apparently the Chancellor considers that approach to be voodoo economics.

The Secretary of State for Employment makes great efforts to increase training. He claims that the expenditure of £2 billion is a fourfold increase; and so it is. It is, however, a threefold increase on the amount we spend on the dole, but we do not claim that as a success. More youngsters cannot obtain jobs. We massage the unemployment figures, and we must pay for that action. The Neddy report shows how much our major competitors in Germany, France and the United States spend on their labour forces which are already twice as well qualified as Britain's labour force.

Training is desperately needed for the new types of industry in Britain at a time when, according to a CBI survey, every industry is screaming for more resources and skill training. I am a little contemptuous when I hear the CBI say that, because it led the campaign to reduce the number of training boards so that it did not need to pay the levy. The Secretary of State for Employment complains that employers do not pay enough towards training. We knew that in the 1960s, and training boards were set up to make employers face up to their responsibilities.

The Government are even wrong in their attitude to training our labour force. They claim that they are spending £2 billion, but that is not enough. If resources from the £1·5 billion are to be available, much more money could be put into training. That could be done by extending the youth training scheme to provide more quality training for at least two years, as is done by most of our competitors. No doubt some of those ideas are being considered by the Government.

Britain's performance in training has always been poor compared with that of its competitors. The Government are the only body able to change that position, because our industries have refused consistently to do anything about the quality of training. One or two firms may throw in training schemes, but the fact is that there are now half the number of engineering apprentices that there were many years ago.

The Government have abolished the boards that imposed the training levy and have closed the skillcentres. We are desperately short of skills, training places and instructors, and there are plenty of people on the dole who want training. At the Government's behest, the Manpower Services Commission, to meet the obligation to break even financially by 1986, is closing 29 of our skillcentres. Five of those centres are profitable. I never thought that profitable training centres would be closed under a Tory Government. Some of those centres specialise in technology and some in youth training. Some of them are concentrated in the coal mining areas. The skillcentres say to the miners, "Readjust to the new economy. Come out of the uneconomic areas." The training centres, which are supposed to retrain people for the new industries, are being closed down by Government agencies.

We have been reminded of the information on social trends that has been produced this week. It is clear that there is a direct connection between sickness, drinking, smoking and suicides, which have increased at a phenomenal rate, and unemployment. The facts are there to see. Those are the social consequences of mass unemployment. Those consequences are not paid for by Conservative Members. They are paid for largely by the people in areas of high unemployment.

That is the real cost of five years of Tory policies. I am glad to hear talk of some Tory Members deciding to revolt, though I do not expect to see them in the Lobby revolting tonight. I am reminded that following the 1979 general election the Prime Minister, on reaching 10 Downing street—in her "spitting image" voice, reminding one of being invited into the parlour by the spider—quoted St. Francis of Assisi. Her quip was carried in the Daily Telegraph of 5 May:

"Where there is despair may we bring hope."

Today there is little hope for the unemployed, little hope for the sick and the needy, and little hope for those in the wages council industries; and some are suggesting that the councils should be abolished as a means of solving our problems.

Because they are worried about their policies, the Government have made a policy change. They have brought in Lord Young. I am not sure who is now dealing with the problems of and policies affecting unemployment, the Secretary of State for Employment or Lord Young. At present, Lord Young is making most of the announcements. It is clear that he has the prestige spot; he is to appear on the Jimmy Young show on 30 January. Will the right hon. Gentleman have that distinction?

The Secretary of State must agree that Lord Young was the first to advocate that the way to get more youngsters into training schemes, even if they did not want to join them, was to conscript them, suggesting that if they still refuse to join they should have their benefits suspended. That was Lord Young's first idea. His second idea, it seems, is the abolition of wages councils. We are talking about the sort of bodies that are concerned with industrial wages of £50, £64 and so on. I do not know whether the Secretary of State intends to abolish the wages councils, and perhaps he will say tonight whether he intends to notify the ILO of his decision to abolish them.

In any event, why did the right hon. Gentleman not abolish the agricultural wages council? He had an opportunity only last year to do something about that. Is the farming lobby so influential in the Tory party that he does not want to do anything about that council? Or is he concerned only with industrial workers? I am not advocating a reduction in the agricultural council wage; it is little enough that the workers get now. Nevertheless, we should be told why there is a difference in approach—that is, if the Government are proposing to abolish wages councils.

I hear that the farmers have made a 20 per cent. profit this year. I hope that that will be borne in mind when they talk about what their workers are paid. I wish there was as much pressure from Tory Members for giving agricultural workers a decent wage as there is backing for the subsidies given in support of that industry.

Our salvation now appears to rest on small firms. Tonight we have heard how we must get the small firms going again. Are not Tory Members aware that there have been record numbers of bankruptcies, among small and big firms, since the Conservatives took office?

We hear talk of a survey by Lord Young. What is he really doing? I have the documents with me and I gather that he is considering, as a solution to our problems, scrapping the conditions placed on small industries for unfair dismissal, redundancy pay, aspects of race relations, equal opportunities, truck Acts, working environment, maternity leave — [Interruption.] Some Conservative Members may think that such action is jolly good for many ordinary folk, but it is no good for those who work in low-wage industries. That is especially true of industries in which health and safety authorities have warned the Secretary of State that the greatest threat to safety arises in small industries.

After three years of legislation attacking the trade unions, the Government are turning for a solution not to a change in policy but to an attack on the statutory rights and conditions of workers. Parliament gave them those rights and conditions because they were not strong enough as groups of workers to secure them by ordinary trade union negotiations.

After the 1979 election the newspapers told us that the Prime Minister had quoted St. Francis of Assisi:

"Where there is discord may we bring harmony."

Considering her record in government, she should have quoted the part from the prayer that she must deliberately have omitted:

"Lord make me an instrument of thy peace."

The iron lady, who is more concerned with resolution than charity, has no concern for the problems that we face. She is leading us to a society more divided between the north and the south, the rich and the poor. That is the result of the Government's policies.

The motion gives a clear opportunity to the House to vote for public expenditure on capital programmes that everyone outside the Government says will increase employment. To increase employment is the major priority. There must be a clear signal from the House. If it backs Tory policy, it will be saying apparently that the rich are not rich enough and the poor are not poor enough. If the Government continue with this policy, there will be social discord of a kind not seen since the 1930s.

9.35 pm

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Tom King): The debate has dealt particularly with investment and infrastructure. It has generally been well attended apart from a period in the middle when the Chamber was rather empty. I have considerable sympathy for the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright), who suggested that one aspect of infrastructure on which there might be greater investment was the House of Commons heating system. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), in his closing speech for the Opposition, made a contribution to try to improve the position; it generated more heat than light on the motion before us.

The motion that the Opposition have chosen to put before the House today condemns what they call "the Government's wilful refusal to implement policies which would result in a reduction in unemployment".

That is a serious charge to level against the Government. It might have carried greater credibility if it had been moved more convincingly by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who chose to be at his most bombastic and at times abusive to the Chancellor. He delights in a choice of adjectives to describe his opponents. Perhaps the most appropriate adjectives to describe his speech would be flatulent and fraudulent. If we may once again with some pleasure use a cricketing metaphor in regard to the right hon. Gentleman, every question he was asked removed his middle stump; and he showed total incapacity to answer the questions that were put to him.

In his opening remarks the right hon. Gentleman sought to suggest that the debate should be conducted with a high standard of honesty. He went on to allege that my right hon. Friend had suggested that £3 billion of funds and resources were available and then had failed to substantiate that; he suggested it might have been said by his agents.

The motion accuses us of wilful refusal. It is a motion that any opposition could propose in any assembly building in Europe at present. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder), in a well-informed and researched tour of the Socialist leaders of Europe, showed how totally fraudulent was the allegation made by the Opposition. My hon. Friend was able to point to the speech of Mr. Fabius, the Prime Minister in President Mitterrand's cabinet, to the Prime Minister in Spain, to Mr. Craxi and to the difficulties they all face equally in tackling the intractable problem of unemployment.

At the end of his speech, the right hon. Gentleman's case seemed to be based on his policies for investment, taking the infrastructure route, which would create some 36,000 more jobs over a two-year period than my right hon. Friend the Chancellor alleged would be created by the approach of reductions in taxation. That did not seem to me to be a comprehensive approach to what is undoubtedly a major problem, with the appalling levels of unemployment, including long-term unemployment, that we face.

Of course, the debate has been overshadowed by the recent position of sterling, and I believe that the House will accept that that is a clear warning of the limitations in our freedom of manoeuvre in tackling the problem.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) described the situation in the north-east which, with parts of the south-west and Ayrshire, in particular in Scotland, faces some of the most appalling problems in unemployment. I would not seek to argue with him in his use of adjectives to describe the appalling nature of the problem. However, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East did not need to embroider his case by seeking to distinguish between unemployment in constituencies of members of the Cabinet and of the Shadow Cabinet. I have said at the Dispatch Box more times than I care to remember that every Member of the House accepts that the present levels of unemployment are far too high and that unemployment is a major problem.

In approaching the debate and comments made by right hon. and hon. Members, I should like to start not in a divisive sense, but on what I hope is common ground on which we stand. I hope that it is common ground that we must achieve the lowest level of inflation, and that for our industry to be competitive we must have low inflation. I hope that it is common ground that we must see a continuing improvement in productivity and performance in our industry. I hope that it is common ground that we must see increasing investment. I hope that, in spite of some of the remarks by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, we have common support for the need to increase the content and quality of training.

I hope that it is common ground that we support the need for substantial investment in infrastructure. I hope that it is common ground that we face genuine problems with the power of the dollar. My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup and the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) commented on the challenge faced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his journey to Washington tomorrow. The House will recognise the vital need for recognition in the United States of the problems posed by its deficit, and I am sure that hon. Members will wish my right hon. Friend god speed in his important mission.

I hope that it is common ground that we cannot isolate ourselves and oil prices in the North sea from world markets. I say to the right hon. Member for Devonport that I agree with the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). His suggestion that somehow we would connive with OPEC at an artificial sustaining of a higher oil price was not realistic, and could not be sustained.

This is where the arguments will now lie. I hope that there is common ground that there is ultimately a limit to the level of public expenditure beyond which the Government cannot go without a risk of increasing inflation and even higher interest rates which would be counterproductive in the loss of employment that they would cause. We must ask ourselves what is a reasonable level. That is a Government judgment. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook carefully went no further than the figure that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor gave in his autumn statement. When considering public expenditure, the creation of employment and the alleviation of unemployment, we must start from the soundest possible base. In the light of the problems of the past 48 hours, it is easy for people to get a misleading impression of the basic strength of the economy.

I was impressed by the adviser to the Senate Finance Committee, who was interviewed on the "Today" programme this morning. He said that there is a feeling in Washington that the fundamentals in Britain are strong and that Britain is basically on a stable path. When asked whether the pound would continue to weaken against the dollar, although he made it clear that his answer was speculative, he said that, although the pound might weaken slightly, there was every reason for it to strengthen.

It is important to be aware of the background. If Opposition Members are worried about unemployment, they must accept that we must have a strong economic base. We have achieved lower inflation. It is now 4·9 per cent., though it must be lower still. That level is still a great improvement. There has also been an improvement in productivity, which is now three times its level between 1974 and 1979. In the past three years, it has been twice that of France and Germany. In 1983 we had the highest growth in the European Community. Although that has been depressed by the miners' strike, the latest forecast is that, in 1985, we shall again lead Europe. The combination of growth and low inflation gives us the best prospects since the 1960s. We have good retail demand and the prospect of high fixed investment, which increased by 8 per cent. last year and is forecast to reach the highest ever level next year.

We have good export volumes. I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members who have suggested that manufacturing exports are dead on their feet will take great pleasure at the 14·5 per cent. increase in manufacturing exports. We now have industries' best profit performance since the 1960s and the longest period of sustained growth since the war. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook suggested that what I have described is a picture of a weak economy. That opinion does not carry much credibility with anyone who studies the figures.

Against the background of a sound base, we face the problem of unemployment. There must be an improvement in inflation. We must recognise the problems caused by continuing excessively high increases in earnings. We must face problems arising out of the miners' dispute. It is interesting that when Mr. Jimmy Reid lectured the Leader of the Opposition on the Labour party having no alternative but to stand up and fight Scargillism, the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), once again, walked away from the problem and his responsibilities.

We have halted the haemorrhage in the loss of jobs and started to create more jobs. The latest figures show the highest level of vacancies for the past four years. The largest private agency has forecast the best recruitment prospects for five years. There is an improvement in job prospects.

We face a major problem with the increase in the working population and the long-term unemployed, and the biggest industrial and economic upheaval since the industrial revolution. It is against that background that we must determine the best way to face change and bring hope to our people. It makes demands on us all — Government, individuals, and unions. It is the duty of the Government and Opposition parties to tell people the truth and not to perpetrate on them the fraud that there is some easy solution.

"Our country is engaged in a critical process of economic and social modernisation . . . the . . . people are sufficiently mature to understand that any action leading to recovery requires time and continuity. When one is a Prime Minister or a Minister of whatever political persuasion, there are economic realities and national interests which transcend the political divide."

Those are not my words or those of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They are the words of a Socialist Prime Minister of France telling the truth to the British people and talking more directly than any Socialist Member of the House has been prepared to do.

In the present circumstances, the Government have a duty to make the possibilities clear to the people and to help in any way that they can. It is not, as the House has argued today, whether we are for or against infrastructure. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made it clear that in the coming year we will have the highest level of fixed investment. There will be some £24 billion of capital expenditure and a further £5 billion of vital maintenance and renewal expenditure. Substantial investment will be made in housing, roads, railways and sewerage. The argument is whether there should be more and whether it is the most cost-effective way to ensure more jobs.

The biggest single extra investment that the Government have made in addition to the more conventional investment is in my Department's programmes. The Government, as the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East mentioned fairly, has quadrupled investment in training, helping people obtain jobs and tackling the skill shortages that exist, where training has a vital role.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: In so far as the community programme is a cheap way of reducing unemployment, can the Secretary of State show some flexibility on numbers and show the way for movement there?

Mr. King: The hon. Member will be aware that at the time of the autumn statement I announced new measures to improve the quality of the community programme to ensure that next year the long-term unemployed would also have the opportunity to train on that programme to help them into work.

There is no question of this Government sitting back and arguing their case from a doctrinaire standpoint.

I have dealt with the suggestion that we are not investing in the infrastructure. On the programme to help the long-term unemployed by increasing self-employment, I announced recently a further expansion of the enterprise allowance scheme. I have made it clear that we are prepared to examine every approach which may help to improve employment. My hon. Friends the Members for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) and for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) referred to the contribution which could be made by an adjustment of national insurance contributions. This is a matter to which I have previously referred. I have also referred to deregulation, as has my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth).

We are anxious to ensure that everything which can be done to help people to obtain jobs is done. We are particularly anxious to help young people to gain employment. We are determined to do what we can to create better opportunities for more people to set up their own businesses. We want to examine how we can further develop the enterprise allowance scheme, which has been such a success. We are determined that every opportunity for employment in all its aspects should be given. We shall examine the ways in which we can help those in our society who are most in need. This requires a contribution from us all. I hope to have the support of every hon. Member and also a substantial contribution from trade unions and employers in order to improve, by training, the skills of the people of this country. There are skill shortages, particularly in new technology.

I have been able to demonstrate the enormously improved profitability of British industry. Because of the problems we face, and because of the contribution that the Government will make, I hope that British industry will be prepared to contribute to the training that is necessary in order to ensure that existing opportunities are taken. Although the volatility of the exchange rate causes certain difficulties, it provides an exceptional opportunity for British industry to maximise its exports and increase the job prospects of the people of this country. I hope that every employer will grasp the opportunities that are provided by the exchange rate. I hope that the unions will recognise the contribution that they can make to the improvement of the productivity of British industry and that they will ensure that we achieve maximum competitiveness.

We debated this subject on an earlier occasion, and I was able to announce a number of measures that the Government had taken to improve the prospects for the long-term unemployed. I said that I did not want people to be under the illusion that this was the end of our approach to the deep-seated problem of unemployment. It is the most difficult and serious problem that faces the Government. On that occasion I made a number of announcements. I said to my right hon. and hon. Friends, and I confirm it tonight, that further work is proceeding on a number of other approaches to the unemployment problem.

To those who seek to criticise us, facing the most difficult and modern scourge of unemployment, I give the assurance that we shall not rest until we see a real improvement for the British people.

Question accordingly agreed to.

MR. SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House rejects the Opposition's doctrinaire commitment to higher Government spending and endorses the Government's determination to pursue responsible fiscal and monetary policies, which, along with its policies to improve the efficient working of the economy, provide the only secure basis for ensuring continuing low inflation, steady growth and rising employment.

Consumer Protection

10.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Alex Fletcher): I beg to move,

That the draft Food Imitations (Safety) Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 11th December, be approved.

Mr. Speaker: I have not selected the amendment.

Mr. Fletcher: The proposed regulations replace and extend the Scented Erasers (Safety) Order 1984, made on 30 January 1984. They revise the size criteria, introduce severance test procedures, cover appearance and taste resemblance, in addition to scent, and extend to certain other products.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Why?

Mr. Fletcher: I hope to explain what we are doing to my sedentary questioner.

But I am pleased to see from the terms of the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) that he takes as his starting point the existence of a safety problem for which a solution must be found. I know that he will appreciate that the House cannot make drafting amendments to the regulations tonight. The regulations must either be approved or not. But I shall endeavour to show my hon. Friend that the solution to the problem with which he is concerned lies in the draft regulations. As I know of my hon. Friend's keen interest in EEC matters, I assure him that the regulations are not in any way inspired by the European Commission.

The definition of "safe" contained in section 9 of the Consumer Safety Act 1978 is "such as to prevent or adequately to reduce any risk of personal injury".

That is what we must keep in mind when considering the need for regulations made under the Act.

After careful consideration we reached the view that there is a need to remove from supply certain products which, by that definition, cannot be considered safe particularly for young children, because by wilfully and unnecessarily imitating food, they increase the risk of choking presented by all small objects.

Mr. Forth: Will my hon. Friend explain why he is not banning other items that can be equally, or more dangerous to children's health? That would help the House enormously.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Marbles.

Mr. Fletcher: As I shall point out, the problem is that of course there are many objects that small children, especially those under the age of three, swallow or push up their noses. Indeed, my statistics show a greater incidence of the latter than the former in this instance. The danger is bad enough with ordinary products, but I propose that the House should continue to refuse to accept the products that wilfully and unnecessarily look like and smell like food. The resemblance has nothing to do with their purpose, and that is the danger. Some of the products actually encourage children to put them in their mouths. Again, that is the danger, and that is what the regulations are concerned with.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: If these food imitations are so dangerous to children that they could choke and die, why is my hon. Friend the Minister going to allow them to be sold if they are in dolls' houses? Why is he allowing them to be sold for export? If they are killer rubbers, is it not shameful that he should wilfully allow them to be manufactured in Britain and sent to Ethiopia?

Mr. Fletcher: I shall take my hon. Friend seriously on this point. Most of the goods under debate are imports. Indeed, the majority of them are imported from far eastern countries. Most countries in Europe and elsewhere already have similar regulations to those that I propose tonight.

I stress that these regulations need cause no concern to suppliers of toys, novelty and stationery items if the goods they market do not imitate food. One is bound to ask why should such goods look, taste or smell like food? What is the point of making a pencil sharpener look like a strawberry or a rubber shaped like a typewriter smell like bananas? Any ordinary adult finding such items in the shops will react with surprise, but if he or she is the parent of small children that surprise is likely to turn into concern and annoyance, because parents are well aware of the habit of all small children of putting things in their mouths. Parents have every right to be concerned when small objects appear in the shops that positively invite children to pop them into their mouths.

Of course, consumers constantly demand novelty, and suppliers rightly exercise ingenuity in responding to that demand, but suppliers must be responsible. The unfortunate fact is that some suppliers are not thoughtful or careful enough for the public to be protected without regulations of this kind. For that reason, responsible manufacturers and traders look to Parliament for guidance on particular aspects of safety. In most cases, my Department or the trading standards officers approach suppliers and ask them to take goods that they consider dangerous off the market, and the suppliers co-operate. Only exceptionally do the actions of suppliers of such products require an order of this kind to persuade them not to maintain dangerous goods on the market.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): What is the evidence that the product which the regulations seek to ban causes the damage my hon. Friend suggests? What will happen to those people who had substantial quantities of this product in stock at the time my hon. Friend introduced these regulations 12 months ago and still have the product in stock?

Mr. Fletcher: If my hon. Friend will allow me, I shall come soon to the question of evidence. Those traders who have found themselves with stocks of goods that they cannot dispose of—I regret that fact as much as any hon. Member—had 18 months of warning of the views of the Government and local authorities on the safety of these products.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: That is not true.

Mr. Fletcher: My hon. Friend must not say that that is not true. That point was established by a Standing Committee, and in July of this year an attempt was made in a judicial review to challenge the Government's actions. I am sure that my hon. Friend will wish to know that the judge found in all the challenges made, including the challenge about consultation, that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had acted correctly. I do not like, even from a sedentary position, the suggestion by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) that I am trying to mislead the House.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point) rose——

Mr. Fletcher: If my right hon. Friend will forgive me, I should like to reply to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East. Ample warning was given. There was ample opportunity for traders to heed the views of the Government and local authorities that these products were dangerous to children. The fact that traders ignored those warnings has resulted in a number of them incurring a financial penalty. I regret that fact, but the fault is that of the traders and not that of the trading standard officers or my Department.

Sir Bernard Braine: I wish to press the point that has just been made. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has just told the House that traders were given 18 months' warning. We are anxious to learn of the evidence before that time showing that regulations of this nature were necessary. What additional evidence was presented during the warning period showing that the decision taken in principle to introduce these regulations would be justified? My vote turns on the case my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State makes to the House showing that action was necessary before the warning period and that experience during the warning period revealed that the initial decision was justified.

Mr. Fletcher: Warnings were given—the trade was advised — by my Department, by my predecessor as Minister with responsibility for consumer affairs and by local authorities, and there was the withdrawal of these products to a considerable extent from the market. But, despite the warnings that had been given, these products arose again, and in larger numbers, and at that point, after asking the trade — as we ask many traders and companies to withdraw products if we consider them to be dangerous—to withdraw them and after those warnings had failed, action was taken.

This is the seventh occasion since the passage of the Consumer Safety Act 1978 when a prohibition notice of this kind has been made forcing companies to take goods from the market. On many other occasions none of this heavy legislation—and I am the first to admit that we should not be considering a matter of this kind in the House of Commons — has been necessary. On only seven occasions has it been necessary to introduce legislation of this kind.

If people will not take notice of warnings and if the best advice that we in the Department have—medical advice and advice from the laboratory of the Government Chemist and others, including trading standards officers and local authorities — is that products such as these are dangerous, something must be done. Here is a chocolate that looks and smells like a chocolate but happens to be an eraser, when its function as an eraser does not require it to look like a chocolate. Kiddies who will normally put things in their mouths are surely much more tempted to do so when erasers are in that form.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): My hon. Friend has referred to warnings having been given during the last 18 months. Would he consider the letter of 29 March 1984 sent out by a Mr. Rider of his Department to a number of suppliers and retailers—going behind the backs of the suppliers, as it were—to have been one of the warnings? The link between scented products and glue sniffing was the real problem.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I am anxious to help the House, but I must remind hon. Members that this is a short debate and that we have had more interventions than we have had Minister's speech. I hope that we can now proceed.

Mr. Fletcher: That letter, if dated 29 March 1984, would have been sent out after these goods had been banned, so it was not a warning. The goods were banned in January 1984, which is why this instrument is before the House tonight. [Interruption.] I cannot explain a particular letter sent out by my Department in March 1984. I thought that the substance of my hon. Friend's argument was that he was trying to demonstrate that inadequate warning had been given. I have explained that that letter was written after the time warnings had been given. The letter to which my hon. Friend referred was written in the normal course of business between my department and a supplier, and I do not think that my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) is objecting to what I have said.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Who was warned?

Mr. Fletcher: I gather that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East insists that there was insufficient warning. I repeat that this matter was debated in Standing Committee last year and was part of the case brought in the High Court against my right hon. Friend. I would not expect to convince my hon. Friend about the former, but in the latter the court ruled in favour of my right hon. Friend on all counts and awarded costs in his favour. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East is aware of these facts.

During the last year the Department carried out extensive consultations with the trade. In all, 104 bodies were consulted. They included 30 trade associations and 16 individual firms. Half of the 104 responded; 2 had no comment, 39 were generally in favour and 11 opposed the concept. By not responding, the 52 bodies which sent no reply can be assumed to support the principle or to have no firm views. The 11 opponents among the 104 which were invited to comment were all traders. Some, if not all, of the concerns of the trade associations whom we consulted have been met by subsequent amendments to the regulations and all comments received have been fully considered in determining the form and content of the draft regulations.

In regard to available accident statistics, the increase in the number of accidents involving erasers in the statistics available for 1983 and 1984 provided by the Department's home accidents surveillance system confirm that action is needed. The 1984 total, which is not yet complete, is 16 accidents in which erasers were swallowed or stuck in the noses of children. This is a survey of only 20 hospitals in England — that is about 7 per cent. of hospitals. It means that 16 erasers—

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Of what kind?

Mr. Fletcher: Of all kinds.

Mr. Hogg: How does my hon. Friend know they were of all kinds?

Mr. Fletcher: I do not think they were all the one kind of eraser. There were several kinds of eraser involved.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I am grateful for the fact that the Minister has given us that extra information. When the companies have written to him, and when I have written to him to ask for more information about the 20 accidents referred to previously, he has replied that it would be too expensive to find out what type of eraser was involved.

Mr. Fletcher: We have some more information although I cannot say exactly what sort of eraser was involved in each accident. That information is not available. The right hon. Gentleman is correct.

The point remains that 16 children were admitted to hospital. These are just hospital cases in 7 per cent of hospitals in England where erasers where swallowed, stuck in the throat or stuck in the nose and therefore the children required medical treatment. Obviously it does not take account of the number of cases where parents or schoolteachers rescued children from danger of choking.

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): This seems to be the crux of the matter. How many children were admitted to those 20 hospitals with foreign bodies pushed into some bodily orifice? Was it a small proportion or a high proportion?

Mr. Fletcher: There should be no ambiguity about this. I have already conceded that children swallow all sorts of objects; for that matter, so do adults. I ask my hon. Friends to bear in mind that the danger we are trying to deal with is the manufacture of products which deliberately attract children to swallow them or to put then in their mouths or noses.

The regulations deal with food imitation. Like Germany, France, Greece, Ireland and other countries, we are saying that we should ban a flood of objects of this kind from Far Eastern countries. That is the object of the regulations. I see no benefit to the economy in the import of erasers shaped like lemons, strawberries, oranges and chocolates. It should be remembered that the home accidents surveillance system covers only home accidents that are treated in hospital. As I said, many are dealt with speedily by parents and schoolteachers and therefore are not recorded.

In taking action, the House will do two main things. First, it will keep known imitation food products, which are mainly scented erasers, off the market and avoid a potential increase in the number of accidents associated with them. Secondly, it will pre-empt the introduction of other products which imitate food. As I said, they can hardly be said to be making any contribution to the British economy.

In making permanent regulations, it is logical to cover not only scented erasers but other similar products that are equally dangerous, and to include other means of food imitation.

In order to cause the minimum restriction on trade, the product coverage has been confined to those items known to exist, or which can reasonably be surmised could exist, in food imitation form, whose utility does not require them to bear any resemblance to food and to which children have ready access.

I have adopted a targeted approach so that the trade should know with certainty what would and would not be permissible. My target is not the traditional toys of long standing, but the new and more dangerous products that have come on to the market in recent years, and almost all from the far east.

The regulations contain three simple tests, all related to the size of objects. The main test is a truncated cylinder. I am sure that my hon. Friends will be interested to know that it was originally developed for consumer safety purposes—to test goods that should not be swallowed—in the United States, hardly a nannying economy. It is now internationally recognised as a guide to the size of toy products that are suitable or not for children under the age of three.

It is a better test than that specified in the Scented Erasers (Safety) Order, whereby an eraser was banned if it had at least two dimensions each less than 45 mm, because it is directly related to the size of object a child could swallow. Trading standards officers favour the use of this simple, inexpensive, gadget as the main test of size.

There is also a potential hazard from larger objects from which small children can detach smaller pieces by biting or pulling. Therefore, two severance tests are necessary to simulate the abuse things are likely to receive in the hands and mouths of small children.

I remind my hon. Friends that the Government, in a White Paper published last July proposed to strengthen the legislation on the safety of goods. It is proposed that a general duty be placed on all suppliers to ensure that their goods are safe in accordance with sound modern standards of safety. Of course, they will mainly be BSI standards.

In addition, powers are proposed to enable enforcement officers to seize or freeze and thus prevent the distribution of suspected dangerous goods and to allow customs and excise to notify the importation of such goods. All these measures will have the effect of diminishing the need for safety regulations and prohibition orders and notices of the kind that we are considering tonight.

Finally, the House will wish to know that there is legislation in a number of countries banning small objects that imitate food — in France, West Germany, Switzerland, Sweden, The Republic of Ireland, Greece and Australia. Belgium, Denmark, The Netherlands and a number of other countries are proposing similar action shortly.

I invite the House to support the regulations.

10.53 pm

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): When I listened to the winding-up speech on fluoridation last night, I reached the conclusion that it was hardly possible for a Minister to make a speech more calculated to ensure a rebellion on his own Back Benches. We have now shortened our time scale in politics and discovered that a day is a long time. I congratulate the Minister on exceeding my expectations in his speech tonight.

I begin from the rather humble position of not wanting to intervene in the argument, which the Minister will clearly enjoy, between himself and his parliamentary friends——

Mr. Fletcher: The right hon. Gentleman knows that I was happy to give way to my hon. Friends. There is no danger of his speech being interrupted by his hon. Friends.

Mr. Williams: There is a very good reason for that —I told them to go home. I shall explain a little later why I told them to do just that.

As one who used to be a Minister with responsibility for consumer affairs, I take a pragmatic view of these matters. I agree with what the Minister is doing. I do not agree with the proposition that is implicit in some of the criticism—that we must wait for some poor child to die before we accept that there is a hazard. It is the duty of parliamentarians to identify a hazard and eliminate it if possible. It is irresponsible to ask "How many deaths have there been?" If, as a result of what happens tonight there are no deaths, we will be able to say that this was one of the House's more successful ventures.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): The only time when, as a child, I choked on something and had to go to hospital, it was on a square sweet, which fulfils all the criteria laid down by my hon. Friend the Minister. Presumably neither the right hon. Gentleman nor my hon. Friend proposes to ban sweets on that count. Where does the right hon. Gentleman draw the line?

Mr. Williams: My understanding is that the average sweet is soluble and therefore more likely to be survived. If the hon. Gentleman wants to extend the scope of the regulations, he should table amendments to that end.

It seems self-evident that if objects look and smell like sweets to adults, they will certainly look and smell like sweets to young children. It is inevitable that, unless we take appropriate action, there will be an accident, for which we will all feel ashamed if we reject this proposal.

I want to support the Minister. Indeed, I bailed him out in the rebellion in the Committee of March last year. I used our vote, or the threat of it, to enable the Minister to get the legislation through because I thought it was needed, although he presented it ham-handedly and unconvincingly. The hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) will recall that we thought we had extracted an assurance that, if we let the regulations go through, there would be immediate consultation and an amending regulation would be introduced within 12 months. We did not think that we should have to wait for so long as we have done.

Mr. Fletcher: We intended to introduce the regulations as quickly as possible. We started consultations after the Committee debate, but were immediately involved in a case in the High Court, which prevented consultations from starting until after July, as we were obliged to defend the charges.

Mr. Williams: That is not a credible argument. Indeed, the High Court case rendered consultation more necessary, to prepare the Government to present a perfect proposal if the court turned the hon. Gentleman down. Although that case might have prevented discussion in the House, I cannot believe that it interfered with the process of consultation. It is more likely that the Department diverted consultations to glue sniffing and other matters.

The Opposition would have supported the regulations had that been necessary, but I told my right hon. and hon. Friends to go home. The Government have been less than adept in their presentation. The matter has been incredibly mishandled. Even the consultative process has been a sham. Although we might disagree with people, if we are to have a meaningful consultative process we must consider their arguments carefully.

Mr. Fletcher: I did.

Mr. Williams: The Minister says that he did. I had a letter from the suppliers whom I had attacked in Committee. They said that the Minister had quoted 20 accidents involving erasers from the hospital surveillance system that I set up in the late 1970s.

Mr. Fletcher: A worthwhile system.

Mr. Williams: I do not receive many compliments, so I am happy to receive one, from whatever source.

The Minister was asked how many of the 20 were attributable to scented erasers. He replied to the industry and said, in effect, that he saw no point in finding out. Even by ministerial standards that savoured of high-handedness.

I thought that I would try a little parliamentary comradeship and therefore I dropped the Minister a note, in the kindest and politest of terms, asking him for clarification about the 20 cases. The answer that I received was:

"I do not think it necessary to pursue the further reported accidents to justify the action that has been taken. That would be going to unnecessary expense with no guarantee of establishing any meaningful statistics."

"Unnecessary expense" to find out about 20 cases? The people who are losing £200,000 of stock would have paid for the inquiry if the Minister had given them a chance to do so.

"Unnecessary expense with no guarantee".

Does there have to be a guarantee? As he was calling those cases in support of his argument, surely the industry was entitled to have them thoroughly investigated, but as there was no guarantee of establishing meaningful statistics, the Minister was not willing to do that.

One is left with a further suspicion. The suspicion in my mind, and, I am sure, in the minds of the Minister's hon. Friends, is that he did not go ahead with an analysis of those 20 cases because he was afraid that they would come out the wrong way. Strangely enough, only a few moments ago the hon. Gentleman referred to a different number. I shall not quibble about which number is correct, because it may not be relevant. The numbers may have been over a different time scale.

When I asked the Minister what types of eraser were involved, he told me that they were of all types. When I intervened to ask how he knew that, he said that they must have been. He does not know. It is of some significance when the Minister gives the House a categorical assurance——

Mr. Fletcher: It was not.

Mr. Williams: It was not a categorical assurance, but the Minister was trying to persuade the House. Is he saying that if the accidents had been analysed it might have been found that the erasers were of all types?

Mr. Fletcher: No.

Mr. Williams: What is the Minister saying?

Mr. Fletcher: I said that the possibility of going back to these cases and establishing what type of erasers were involved was extremely remote. It was not a lack of willingness to go back but a doubt whether any substantial evidence would be available. That was the first consideration. Secondly, when the right hon. Gentleman asked what type of erasers they were and I replied that they were of all types, I was saying that one could safely assume that more than one type was involved if there were a number of accidents. That is the point that I was trying to make.

Mr. Williams: The Minister said that he was afraid that the information might not be available. Surely the Government, even with their present economy campaign, could have afforded 20 second-class letters to find out whether there were any records, even if they did not explore further. What the Minister says does not wash. It does not bear analysis.

Mr. Christopher Hawkins (High Peak): The right hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. First he says that he thinks the Government are right not to wait until someone dies, which is a view I am delighted he has taken and completely endorse, and then he complains that the Government have not analysed the statistics to discover how many scented erasers are involved. The hon. Gentleman's argument was that Parliament's job was to decide whether, on balance, these were likely to be the cause of serious accidents. I totally accept his argument that they are very likely to be the cause of serious accidents.

Mr. Williams: I was not basing my position on 20 cases, but the Minister was. The Minister might care to look at his correspondence and at the information that he sent to the suppliers. It was the Minister, not me, who came here and put forward the proposition. It is his evidence, not mine. I started from the position that I was in favour of what he was doing, but I still say to the House that it is entitled to clear information. The hon. Gentleman misled the House inadvertently — perhaps that is too generous: frivolously is nearer the truth; it was not done malevolently — and without due consideration. He misled his colleagues about the nature of the evidence in his possession. He does not have the evidence which he originally claimed to have.

I deal next with the question of voting because I want the Minister and Conservative Members to understand our position. As I said, in Committee, we made it clear that we would have supported the regulations had there been a vote. We should also have been happy to support the regulations this evening, but the Government's handling of the matter has been so appallingly bad that they do not deserve to be supported. However I believe that this is a desirable measure, and therefore I am not willing to ask my hon. Friends, despite the ham-handedness of the Government——

Mr. Fletcher rose——

Mr. Williams: I told them to go home, for that very reason.

Mr. Fletcher: Is the right hon. Gentleman saying that before the debate began he asked his hon. Friends to go home?

Mr. Williams: That is right. I have all the Minister's letters. Does he not stand by the letters that he sends to his parliamentary colleagues? We knew that he had messed things up in his analysis of the situation. Consequently, I said to my hon. Friends that in no circumstances would we vote against the regulations but that it was not up to us to get the Government's chestnuts out of the fire when they had mishandled the situation so badly.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The hon. Member owes the House a further explanation. He has told the House in the clearest possible terms that these products constitute a hazard and that people can die. Faced with that fact, I simply do not understand how, in all honour, he can say that because the Parliamentary Under-Secretary has behaved in an odd manner he will withhold his support for the regulations.

Mr. Williams: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the regulations will be defeated?

Mr. Hogg: That is not the point.

Mr. Williams: I see. I did not know that we had a rebellion on our hands. If the hon. Gentleman had come to me and said that he needed the support of the Opposition to get these regulations through the House, of course we should have rallied our troops, but perhaps I had better leave the Government to sort out their own problems.

11.8 pm

Mr. Christopher Hawkins (High Peak): I support the regulations. Some people have said that nobody has died because of scented erasers, so why ban them? Having found my youngest daughter when 18 months old with one such eraser in her mouth, I did not wait to see whether it killed her before taking action. Personally, I am delighted that the Government are not waiting either until somebody dies before they take action.

Mr. Ashby: Why did my hon. Friend buy it?

Mr. Hawkins: I did not buy it. It turned out that my other daughter had a collection of 20 or 30 of these dangerous toys which neither my wife nor I knew about. I am sure that that has happened to many other people.

Some people say that children can die from swallowing marbles, coins or dice, so why not ban them? There is a very good reason. Even a young child who cannot yet speak can be trained not to swallow anything except food and drink. My wife and I have done that, as have most parents. Marbles, coins and dice do not look like, feel like or smell like food. I would object, however, if somebody made marbles which looked like aniseed balls and smelled like aniseed balls. We should ban such marbles, because they would fool a child into believing that they were food.

My objection to scented erasers is that they appear to be what they are not. They are purposely made to look and smell like sweets. They present a danger that we cannot train a young child to recognise. We cannot tell a child that does not yet speak our language that there are some imbeciles in the world who will take a perfectly useful object and use science and chemistry to make a small child think that it is a sweet or some kind of food so that they might eat it and choke themselves to death.

I should use two criteria. First, will a product fool a child into thinking that it is edible? Secondly, will it be dangerous for a child who tries to swallow it? Could he choke? Scented erasers fail to be acceptable on both those counts. However, marbles do not fail to be acceptable on both those counts. Some products may be marginal and some will fail strongly on both counts. Few of us would want people to start manufacturing household bleach that looked, smelled and tasted like orange juice.

To digress from the debate, I understand that another imbecile is making a product called gremlins which are half an inch long, look like sweets, and when dropped into water swell to five or 10 times their size. They will also do that in the mouth. I hope that my hon. Friend will look at those as well and take action. Many parents are equally concerned about that.

We should not over-protect the public, but products which look and smell like food or sweets and which can be dangerous if a child tries to swallow them should be banned. That is why I welcome what the Government are doing, and that is why I will support the regulations.

I know that there is a big revolt among my hon. Friends. I have had personal experience of a child who might have died. Before my hon. Friends continue with their revolt, I ask them please to have an open mind. The bible says "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone". Let the first child die because of this dangerous product, and which of my hon. Friends will tell the parents why he revolted?

11.12 pm

Mr. Michael Meadowcraft (Leeds, West): I take the same view as the hon. Member for High Peak (Mr. Hawkins) about the seriousness of the matter. Whenever any Government decide to interfere in the commercial aspects of such a matter, the detail of the regulations can easily be mocked. There is no doubt that the amount of pressure and the number of Newtons required to pull something apart, and so on, in the regulations before us tonight can easily be laughed at.

There is an argument that Governments interfere too much in the ordinary affairs of people. The Minister said that the order seeks to ban items which positively invite children to put products into their mouths illegitimately. I accept that it cannot be imagined that the item that we are discussing is a high priority for time on the Floor of the House. But it is on the Floor of the House for debate, and so the question for those Conservative Members who mock the regulations is whether they are beneficial or not.

Clearly, on balance the regulations are beneficial. For instance, I quote a case in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) of a six-year-old child who on Christmas day 1983 swallowed a pen top and died as a result. The question is whether an item would encourage someone illegitimately to eat it.

In Committee in March 1984 the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) criticised earlier regulations and then made play of only banning scented erasers rather than items imitating food. His hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox), who was also critical, said categorically that he would go further than the order and ban food facsimile erasers, whether they were scented or not. He said that anything that looks like food should be banned. That would make more sense to industry and the public. That criticism made in March has been met.

The logic is that the items mentioned do not have to look or smell like sweets, if they do, young children might eat them. It is not the world's greatest issue, but it is worth supporting.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I hope that the few points that I shall make will persuade the Minister to withdraw the order. The order is ill-conceived, unnecessarily severe and badly drafted. The trades and industries involved have been treated shamefully.

We must first ask whether there is any justification for the order. If we had the slightest belief that these items were more dangerous than the generality of small objects which children can swallow, we should certainly support the banning of them. However, there is not a shred of evidence from the Minister or anyone else that these items are any more dangerous for children than the multitude of small items which children can be tempted to swallow.

Mr. Christopher Hawkins: We are dealing with an essential and important point. A child can be trained not to put in its mouth things which are not for eating or drinking, but a child who cannot yet speak cannot be trained not to put in its mouth things which appear to be food.

Mr. Taylor: I am sorry, but the evidence is exactly the opposite. I do not want to quote accident statistics. They are simply a means of saying "Let's wait for a death". However, one can use statistics to discover what children swallow and cause danger. I appeal to hon. Members before they vote to look at Hansard and the answer from the Minister about the number of children and others who received hospital treatment for swallowing things. It is there in black and white. The Minister says that 2,174 people, mainly children, received hospital treatment for swallowing things. What kind of things? A total of 690 received treatment for swallowing bones, 290 for swallowing money and an astonishing 74 for swallowing marbles. Only one child last year received medical treatment for swallowing an eraser — and we do not know whether it was scented.

On the basis of that information, there is a case for treating the marbles problem much more seriously than the eraser problem. If the Minister disagrees, I ask him whether there is any evidence that they are uniquely dangerous. There has been not a shred of evidence.

I have not picked out figures from one year. I have the figures for the last five years, which reveal that a multitude of children have been given hospital treatment for swallowing things, but they do not reveal evidence that scented erasers are any more dangerous than any other small objects which children pick up.

Mr. Fletcher: Sometimes I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) argues with himself. There is no argument about the items that adults and children swallow. But why invite children to swallow things by designing products which do not have to look, smell, or taste like food so that more of our children are encouraged to put them into their mouths? Of the 16 cases that I mentioned, 15 involved children getting parts stuck in their noses. The unnecessary smell must have something to do with it. Even my hon. Friend would admit that. The victims had to go to hospital to have the items removed. No one, including my hon. Friend, would recommend that to parents or children.

Mr. Taylor: If we are to include all the figures, the figure of 2,000 will rise substantially, as the Minister knows. Last year's evidence showed that 74 children received hospital treatment for swallowing marbles, and one child for swallowing an eraser. The Minister has not even found out whether it was a scented eraser or one which would not be affected by the regulations.

If we accept the Minister's arguments, the crucial question is whether he warned the trade. Did he seek its co-operation? The only warning that I can trace—I have followed this matter up in many parliamentary questions — was given by my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan), the previous Minister, on 8 November 1982. He issued a Department of Trade and Industry circular letter entitled:

"Scented novelties: Common sense and a caution rather than a ban."

It stated that the Minister had considered the evidence and continued:

"I do not think a ban would be justified."

However, my hon. Friend appealed to suppliers and shopkeepers to stop selling smaller-sized novelties of the kind particularly likely to cause choking if swallowed.

The Minister knows that the trade was not advised of this regulation. It appears that a copy was sent to the toy manufacturers association, which is involved in only a small way, and that none of the 40 individual suppliers who are in touch with me was aware of a warning. If the Minister had told the trade that he was worried about small rubbers that look like sweets, the trade would have agreed to act immediately to avoid emergency regulations, which have caused it enormous hardship and considerable financial loss. It has been confirmed in parliamentary questions that the vast majority of the trade was wholly unaware of that warning. The Minister knows that, because I asked him for full details of all those who were consulted and approached.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: If my hon. Friend is telling the House that the trade would have agreed to withdraw small rubbers, why should we object to prohibiting them?

Mr. Taylor: The trade would have agreed to withdraw all erasers that looked like sweets, which is a small percentage of those which are covered by the regulations. They deal with erasers which look or smell like sweets. That is about 30 times the number of those which look like sweets.

The Minister knows that he could have introduced regulations with the agreement of the trade to ban the sale of erasers that look and smell like sweets. The matter would have been resolved satisfactorily, not because the trade or those involved thought that there was a need for a ban but because the Minister thought that something had to be done. The matter could then have been resolved easily and without hardship.

It has been said that the association of district councils and others have put forward similar recommendations. The Minister knows that all such associations were under the impression that the Minister was considering erasers that looked like sweets. If we accept that there is a danger, although there is not a shred of evidence to support it, why is the Minister making three exceptions to the regulations?

First, he says that these small food imitations can be sold if they are contained in dolls' houses. If he is worried that these items are a danger, are they not an even greater danger to children if they are contained in dolls' houses? Why should they be excluded because they are contained in dolls' houses?

Mr. Fletcher: Only if they do not smell or taste like food.

Mr. Taylor: The order uses the words

"products bona fide intended for use to represent food in a dolls' house or other model . . . setting."

Mr. Fletcher: If they do not smell or taste like food.

Mr. Taylor: They must look like food if they are to represent food in a dolls' house. Therefore, something that looks like food and is in a dolls' house should be excluded.

The second thing that the Minister has excluded entirely is marbles. If we believe that marbles are dangerous, why do we not exclude them? Last year, 74 children were taken to hospital after swallowing marbles, compared with only one child taken to hospital after swallowing an eraser. The third exemption is for exports. If those objects are dangerous, why should we allow companies to export them?

The Minister should ask himself whether the order goes too far. He said that large erasers would be covered if one could bite pieces off them. What is the bite test? As the Minister will know from the regulations, the bite test involves a very sharp edge — much sharper than the teeth of a small child—with a weight of 50 lbs, which is larger than one's baggage allowance for flying across the Atlantic, going down onto the eraser. That is a much larger load than any child could bring to bear on an eraser.

The next thing that we must ask ourselves is whether the order is a fair way of dealing with the trade. The main problem is with erasers that smell like sweets or flowers. The trade has been dealing with the erasers for about a year, and I assure the Minister that they have created genuine fears. He will be aware of the case of a company in my constitutuency which took specific erasers to the trading standards officer in Hertfordshire and was told that they were perfectly lawful. They did not fall within the criteria for banning. The company was then prosecuted in another county for selling exactly the same erasers. The Minister knows that many such cases have arisen because trading standards officers and the courts must work out the smell of food and sweets. Many of the erasers are shaped like typewriters or spacemen. It is extremely difficult to work out the smell of food. I would suggest that it is completely unworkable.

Sir John Page (Harrow, West): I was sent a yellow and brown snail, which I believe is covered by the Bill. It smells of soap. I was wondering whether it would be more offensive if it smelled like escargots, or more dangerous if it smelled like glue. Does the matter that we are discussing this evening compare with the Spotted "Hummerfly" Protection Bill, about which my hon. Friend knows a great deal?

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend has raised an important point. What is the smell of food? Under the order, every trader will have to work that out for himself. He will have to seek advice. What is the point of a trader going to a trading standards officer and being told that the eraser is all right if he is prosecuted for it by a neighbouring authority?

Mr. Fletcher: This order follows consultations and is an improvement on the original order; but, on the evidence of the original order, the judge in the judicial review accepted that such tests had to be made and that, in those circumstances, they were acceptable. As I said earlier, he found in favour of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. My hon. Friend is disagreeing not just with me—that does not matter—but with the firm judgment on the case which was taken to the High Court by the trade which he supports.

Mr. Taylor: The Minister is in danger almost of misleading the House. The judge was not called upon to express a view on the merits of the case or on the feasibility of operation of the tests. He was asked whether this was a lawful use of emergency powers. Does the Minister agree that traders have taken erasers to trading standards officers and, indeed, to public analysts, been told that they are all right, and then been prosecuted for selling them in other authorities' areas?

The Minister is aware that the complaint is not made by a few nutcases. This view is held throughout industry and, indeed, by the CBI. I have a letter from the CBI, which says:

"The regulations as they stand are in danger of bringing consumer legislation into disrepute, because of its obscurity for business and enforcers alike."

At a time when we have over 3 million unemployed, and industry and trade are fighting for survival, my hon. Friend the Minister has treated an important business in a contemptuous way, and has not taken its views into account. If there was a problem of safety and a danger to young people, this could readily have been resolved in proper discussions and consultations.

My hon. Friend has made no case to show that the objects covered in the legislation are in any way more dangerous than the generality of many small objects that children can put in their mouths. If there were such evidence, most of us would jump into the Lobby to support such legislation. My hon. Friend has not proved the case for extending the order from things that look like sweets to things that smell like sweets or flowers. The sensible thing to do would be to withdraw the order. My hon. Friend should have proper consultation with the trade and bring in a new order, if he wishes, to ban erasers that look like sweets, instead of bringing in messy, unworkable regulations, which have caused a great deal of distress, anxiety and unnecessary loss of business. They are not in the interests of safety, but in the interests of senseless, bureaucratic nonsense.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): I am sorry to disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), who delivered his speech with a great deal of feeling. It is wrong to criticise my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary for introducing these regulations. They are sensible, wise and prudent. I entirely agree with the view put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Hawkins), by the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) and by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, that these things constitute a trap. By nature and design, they are a trap. If one creates an eraser that looks and smells like a strawberry, one must not be surprised when a child puts it in his or her mouth.

The eraser that I have in my hand looks and smells like a strawberry. I would not be surprised if a little child put it into his or her mouth, and I would not laugh if a child did so. That is true of many other substances covered by these regulations. We may not have any clear evidence that anybody has died or suffered serious injury from products covered by these regulations, but, as the right hon. Member for Swansea, West said, are we to wait for a serious injury or a fatality before we act? Is that a sensible exercise of the discretions and functions of the House? Surely not, because we are considering a hazard, and we are entitled to guard against it.

It is true that some aspects of the regulations probably go further than is necessary. However, my hon. Friend the Minister made the sound point that we cannot embark on a drafting exercise. I regret that as much as anybody else. I wish that we could amend these regulations. However, we are faced with the choice of accepting the regulations entirely or rejecting them entirely. We can go on bringing them back, changing them in draft, carrying on negotiations, and one thing and another, but what would we be doing that for? My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East feels that there are other great counter-balancing factors to be considered. He talked about 3 million unemployed, and about large concentrations of stock on the shelves, but are those real considerations?

I sense that some hon. Members believe that the garment of liberty is indivisible, and that we cannot have fluoridation, seat belts and crash helmets, and we must allow people to produce dangerous objects. This is the old argument. I do not agree. I think that hon. Members are entitled to form a judgment in the broad, and in the broad these objects are dangerous. I do not see any counterbalancing arguments which support the point of view of either of my hon. Friends.

Mr. Hickmet: My hon. Friend applies the law of tort to his analysis of this issue, and I am sure that if we were in the High Court we would all applaud his analysis. But where is the evidence that these rubbers are dangerous? If we are to say that we exercise a judgment in these cases and it is not necessary to wait until a fatality occurs, where does one draw the line? Surely one has to use judgment. If one is to ban particular objects, why should one not ban the whole range of similar objects which my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) has already described?

Mr. Hogg: I never mentioned the law of tort. I never contemplated the law of tort. I invited the House to apply common sense and good judgment. As my hon. Friend is a criminal lawyer, he is unduly preoccupied with evidence.

Mr. Hickmet: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Hogg: Is it a point of order?

Mr. Hickmet: No, I want to ask my hon. Friend——

Mr. Hogg: No, I will not give way. If it is a point of order, I am perfectly prepared to give way, indeed I must give way, but I do not have to give way to an intervention.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is a very short debate.

Mr. Hogg: Guided by the principle of common sense, we are being asked to consider a number of products which are for no very good reason designed to resemble sweets and other articles which would be attractive to children. It seems obvious to me that small children are likely to put them in their mouths and suffer serious injury. Faced with that obvious, clear and predictable risk, I think that the objections put forward by my hon. Friends are simply absurd.

Mr. John Watson (Skipton and Ripon): I should first declare something of an interest, in that until 1979 when I was elected to the House I was the managing director of Waddington Games, and I am still a director of the holding company. While I speak from a position of some interest, it is not a position of vested interest, because the company makes none of the products that are now known rather euphemistically as scented products. We used to make such products. In the early 1960s we produced a series of jigsaw puzzles which were perfectly round, one of which was printed with scented ink. It was a picture of an Italian pizza. The slogan on the carton was, "Looks like pizza, smells like pizza, but tastes like cardboard". So far as I can see, such a harmless product would indeed be banned under the regulations. That is the one reservation that I have about them.

I will support the regulations, because I believe in the principle that they seek to achieve. I follow the common sense, if not entirely the arguments, of my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), when he says that something that looks like chocolate and smells like chocolate runs the risk of being swallowed as chocolate.

Where I differ from my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is in the scope of the drafting of the regulations which seems to me to be unnecessarily wide. For example, why are adults included? I quote—

"'Toys' means playthings whether intended for adults or children".

Adults, I submit, know what they can eat and what they cannot eat. I acknowledge that the catering department of British Rail may have done its best to blur the distinction in recent months, but by and large adults know what they can eat and what they cannot eat and do not need statutory protection in the matter. Secondly, why is it necessary to include the smell of flowers? Again I quote—

"any regulated product—

(a) which looks like food, or smells like food or like flowers".

Children by and large do not eat flowers. I have three children and I pride myself on believing that they are fairly normal. I can assure the House that they do not go rampaging round the garden biting the heads off the roses and munching their way through the gladioli. I do not think that children need protection from things that smell like flowers.

Why do we need to include the specific product Playdoh? By implication, at least, that is included in the definition

"modelling clay, plasticine and products of a like nature".

Clearly that would include Playdoh although it is dough, and can be eaten. As I know to my cost, if someone puts it in the oven he will get a sort of technicoloured chapatti, which may not be particularly appetising but which is at least edible.

If we pass the regulations, I fear that a little old lady running a toy shop in Bishop's Stortford, who is sitting down on a quiet Thursday afternoon doing her scented jigsaw puzzle of a scented rose, will be faced by a geezer from the trading standards office who says, "Will your pieces fit into my truncated cylinder? And, by the way, could the cherries in your hat be described as 'play things', because, if so, your hat has just been banned by Parliament?"

I am quite content to vote for the regulations, but I shall do so with the anxiety that they have been drafted with perhaps unnecessary width. I very much hope that they will not be used as a basis for a witch-hunt against products which Parliament is perfectly happy to permit.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): It is with some trepidation that I enter into the debate. I was introduced to these items in exactly the same way as my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Hawkins) was. My elder daughter brought them home from school, and I caught my younger daughter — who was then about four — trying to eat them. It was immediately apparent to me that what appeared to be harmless was not, and that what seemed to be clever and fun—and these items are very clever—was in fact, quite alarming.

The programme "That's Life" has been mentioned. Those of us who watched the programme for several weeks when it highlighted this problem are aware of the tremendous public concern that was produced. It also highlighted decorative items such as a brooch in the shape of a bar of chocolate that was being given away in Cadbury's drinking chocolate. It is interesting to recall that that was immediately and voluntarily withdrawn. If no one else will, I will pay tribute to the "That's Life" programme, because it has done an excellent job on this and other dangerous items and brought them to the public's attention. I also pay tribute to Derbyshire county council's trading standards department, which made renewed and persistent efforts to ensure that some regulations were introduced.

One of the problems is that most of these items are made for children and are therefore pocket-money items. They are obtained through swaps, too, and are extremely difficult—just about impossible—for parents to control, even for those who make every effort to supervise and control what their children buy. These articles look nice, look like food, and smell nice. We have all been sent a model snail by a company which readily admits that it stands to lose £140,000 in written-off stock. The point is that in support of its case it did not send us the strawberry smelling of strawberries, the——

Mr. Ashby: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Currie: I shall not give way, as there is not time. That company did not send in support of its case an eraser that looks like a piece of candy and smells of mint, or a snail that smells of snail. If it had it might have better proved the point. I suspect that we all ended up knowing exactly what my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Sir J. Page) uses in his bath, because that company sent us a snail that smells of lemons. That is dangerous, because when small children smell it, the first thing that they will do is put it in their mouths to see whether it is food. The younger the child, the greater the danger. If such items are put in children's mouths, their size makes them dangerous. Anyone who has been with a choking child knows that it is a terrifying experience. Choking can cause not only brain damage, but death. It is not good enough to ask how many deaths. Our answer should surely be "as few as possible".

It is argued that other things cause problems — I accept that they do—but these items are new and are not traditional. They create a new hazard to which the public have reacted very strongly. They expect Parliament so to react as well. Secondly, because these articles are designed to be like food, they are designed to deceive, and they will do so. They will specifically deceive small children who do not know any better. Thirdly, just because some other goods are dangerous, these items should not be condoned. We are not excused from taking action to ban smelly rubbers just because something else is dangerous. This is a dangerous world for children, and this one small specific move to tackle a particular problem is welcome.

I seem to have made several paternalistic speeches this week. Normally, I am a great believer in caveat emptor and I prefer to emphasise the responsibility of individuals for their own welfare and that of their families. My support for such measures is, therefore, only given with caution. In this case, I believe that the Government are right, and I urge hon. Members to support these regulations.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): There has been great misunderstanding in this debate. I intervened—so I did not have to make a speech—to correct that misunderstanding. It must be understood that the trade does not object to the strawberry that smells like a strawberry, to the sweet that smells like a sweet or to any of those items. It is easy to frame regulations to cover those items. When some larger different object that does not look like a sweet or food has a scent that enables traders to sell it, I do not believe that it can be harmful. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) that the regulations should be changed to include those types of items, and I believe that there is across-the-board agreement on that point among Conservative Members.

We must realise that we are talking about a small trade in which many people have small amounts of money tied up. By and large, small entrepreneurial companies will suffer greatly from the effect of these regulations. Employment is involved and employees will be affected by this legislation. This is the most ill-advised legislation I have come across during my 18 months as a Member.

This is a classic example of the Minister deciding on a measure and then finding an argument to match it. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has decided that these objects are dangerous. My hon. Friend has told us of 16 cases of erasers stuffed up noses or down mouths. Yesterday, a written answer about objects swallowed showed that in the catogory only one article was swallowed in 1984.

"Other articles recorded less than 10 times, including erasers" —[Official Report] 14 January 1985; Vol. 71, col. 21.]

Mr. Fletcher: What about items put up the nose?

Mr. Ashby: My hon. Friend tells me that I have not included items put up the nose. They are included in those 16 cases. What will happen when I ask my hon. Friend for the same sort of figures for marbles, money and other items stuffed up the nose? Vast quantities of items seem to be stuffed up noses.

As any parent knows—I have a child—small objects are a danger to children. Parents are vigilant about keeping small objects away from their children. It does not matter whether those items smell of flowers or food — they must be kept from children.

Mr. Hogg rose——

Mr. Ashby: I shall not give way. One must be vigilant: one knows of the dangers of any item in the hands of children.

I am worried most by the way in which the new regulations have come about. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State told us that the measures are an extension of the existing emergency regulations, and they certainly are that. I have said that this is a classic example of the Government deciding on an action and then finding arguments.

Mr. Hogg rose——

Mr. Ashby: I shall not give way. A letter dated 29 March 1984 was sent in vast numbers to toy manufacturers and retailers. That letter by Mr. Rider, which was headed "Scented Children's Products", stated:

"You may know that in the recent debate in Parliament on the Scented Erasers (Safety) Order 1984, the Minister indicated that consideration would be given to the need to make regulations covering such products on a permanent basis, because of continuing concern about their scent."

The crucial point followed:

"Although medical opinion has not so far established any link between the smelling of scented products and glue sniffing, commonsense suggests that the addition of a scent to children's non-food products (except toiletries which children do not generally use in play) must encourage children to smell them for pleasure and thus carries a possible risk in that it may lead to something more serious,"

What did the official of the Minister's Department mean by that letter? Although one might say that there is no real link, I suggest that there was an attempt there to link any sort of scented object, including flowers, to glue sniffing. The object was to establish in the minds of the people the thought that once one started sniffing a scented rubber, the next step was glue sniffing. It is the most ridiculous argument I have ever come across.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): I challenge my hon. Friend on the point he is making. He underestimates the amount of parental opinion that believes that there could be a link between sniffing these rubbers and glue sniffing. The scents used in these items are particularly pungent. Children develop a kind of addiction to them. If one talks to teachers, one hears that they have had a major problem with children who have sniffed rubbers continually through lessons.

Mr. Ashby: Can one really suggest that children become addicted and that the next step is glue sniffing? The nose is a vital organ.[Interruption.] There is taste and smell, but why on earth should these products be singled out from among the millions of pleasurable smells, including scented flowers, that exist? One need only go to a garden designed for the blind to realise the beauty of scented flowers.

Perhaps teachers should realise that children are constantly developing their senses. That is part of their education. Having something to hand to smell is a development of the sense of smell. *[Interruption.]*I appreciate that this is a subject of some mirth; it is bound to be because of the connotations that arise. As I say, smell is part of children's education and I should expect them to explore smells.

The argument that is being adduced for extending these provisions is designed to create a sense of fear. We are being asked to go far beyond what is required amd what commonsense dictates. If the instrument were confined to objects that look and smell like food, nobody could object, but it goes much further, and, for that reason, I shall oppose it.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): This is one of those profoundly disappointing and disagreeable occasions when one is left thinking that it is a sad day if this is all that the Government have to concern themselves with.

Other hon. Members have pointed out that, as parents, when they have found their young children in the process of eating these objects, they have stopped them doing so. That surely is where the primary responsibility for such matters has lain and will always lie. It is not for the House to try to usurp the role of parents in watching what their young children are doing before they reach the age at which they can make a sensible decision for themselves.

The Minister cited, as is often the case when it suits, other countries which had done this and said that this was therefore an excellent reason for doing it. He mentioned Greece. I for one am not always anxious to follow everything that the Greeks do in such matters. This sits ill with the fact that just last night in the debate on the fluoridation of water we were told that, in spite of the fact other countries did not fluoridate their water, we would go ahead and do it.

The Government must make up their mind about whether they wish to pray in aid what other countries do. I am prepared to follow one course or the other but I am damned if I shall follow both. For that reason, and for many others given by my hon. Friends, I shall not be supporting this nonsense.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): It is the Government's job to try to protect people for whom they have a responsibility. They also have a duty to spot those items which are manufactured deliberately to try to entice young people, particularly when it gets to the stage that such items form part of a craze, as notified to many of us by school teachers.

In the Second Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments on 7 March I pointed out to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State that at that stage 50 million scented erasers were already in circulation and were not being banned or withdrawn because of the regulations. I asked my hon. Friend whether in the year following he would come back with statistics to show exactly how many of them had caused accidents. My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) talked about common sense and probabilities. Out of these 50 million I wonder when one ingested by, according to Hansard, "persons of any age" in the past 11 months has been a proven danger to people under the Government's responsibility.

I am disturbed about these regulations because they extend further than most people want the Government's protectionist arm, but it is the Government's duty to recognise dangers when they exist. Therefore, I would not vote against the Government, because it is their duty to protect people through consumer legislation, and they do not do so often enough. However, I cannot support the regulations because I do not believe the case is proven in this instance.

PETITIONS

Sub-post offices (Liverpool)

12.9 am

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): I have a petition from over 1,000 of my constituents who are seriously affected by the closure or threatened closure of sub-post offices in the city of Liverpool. Their petition reads as follows:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your Honourable House

(i) will accept that the requirement in Liverpool is for a widely distributed network which is accessible and provides a basic range of services through staff who relate well to the many less able and disadvantaged members of the community, particularly the elderly and other recipients of state benefits, who use Post Offices and who are themselves part of the local community;

(ii) will agree that the need is for a strategy to be developed which looks at the provision and distribution of Post Office facilities in relation to the real needs of the customers in the City, rather than one based purely on the pursuit of efficiency and high technology and of Government imposed financial targets;

(iii) will request Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to draw the contents of this humble petition to the attention of the Post Office and to direct the Post Office to prepare for approval by him a revised strategy for the future of the Post Office counters network which has full regard to the issues raised in this humble petition; and

(iv) requests the Secretary of State to direct the Post Office to cancel all closures proposed or agreed under its existing strategy.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

I hope that the Department of Trade and Industry will take cognisance of what I regard as a serious petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Human Embryos

12.11 am

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): I have two petitions, Mr. Deputy Speaker. They are in identical terms. One is from 754 of my constituents, and the other from 39 of my constituents. The petitions are for the protection of the human embryo, and they read as follows:

The humble petition of the residents of the constituency of Ilford, South showeth that we affirm that the newly fertilised embryo is a real, living individual human being.

Therefore we welcome the statement in the report of the Committee of Enquiry into Human Fertilisation and Embryology (the Warnock report) that "the status of the embryo is a matter of fundamental principle which should be enshrined in legislation", and its recommendation that the embryo of the human species should be afforded protection in law.

And therefore oppose all such practices as are recommended in the report which discriminate against the embryo or violate his/her human dignity and right to life.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will every pray etc.

The larger petition was sought by Mrs. Julie Silversides of St. Thomas vicarage, Burnside road, Dagenham in my constituency, assisted by Mr. B. K. Tully of 230 Ashburton avenue. The smaller petition was obtained by Mr. Peter Martin of 107A Kinfauns road, Goodmayes. I wish to associate myself entirely with the sentiments of the petitions, and I hope that the Government will take due note of the genuine and proper interest in this matter.

To lie upon the Table.

Aire Valley Trunk Road

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Durant.]

12.15 am

Mr. Marcus Fox (Shipley): The petitions being out of the way and the aroma of scented erasers having disappeared, perhaps I can turn the attention of the House to a very pressing issue for my constituents — the Bingley to Shipley section of the Airedale route. I am delighted to see my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Transport on the Front Bench. She is in line for winning the record for responding to Adjournment debates. I hope that this will be a bonus for her, in that after she has listened to me she will not only be better informed but will take the right decision.

May I ask the Minister of State to imagine that she is a resident of Saltaire, a village in my constituency. Not only would she have the good fortune to live there and have me as her Member of Parliament but she would live in a unique environment, thanks to Sir Titus Salt, who in 1851 started to build his mill and a village for his employees. The mill is still producing worsted cloth. It is an historic landmark, a planned settlement of greater scale and complexity than anything which had been attempted before. He moved about 2,000 people away from the hideous 19th century conditions of Bradford — open sewers and disease—to what they thought was a new Jerusalem. And it should still be a new Jerusalem. It is situated three miles from the city of Bradford in a beautiful valley and open countryside. It was a marvel of its day. I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, is in the House. As my neighbour, he knows all about Saltaire. It attracted foreign dignatories not just from Europe but from further afield. Saltaire was copied in Britain. I mention Port Sunlight and Bournville as examples.

Today the village is largely intact: the great mill, the church, the institute hospital, the school and the almshouses but, above all, the terraced houses in their hundreds, loved by those who live in them, many of whom now own their houses. They are stone built and most of them are without gardens. They have only a small yard at the rear. Sir Titus deemed that the park and the surrounding countryside were the garden of his village.

In that context it is important to look at this area. It is no wonder that this is a conservation area that is visited by thousands every year. Our part of Yorkshire is not renowned for attracting tourists. The city of Bradford has managed extremely well by winning one or two awards. It is interesting that the two jewels in Bradford's crown are Saltaire and Haworth, which is part of the Bronte country. It is a haven of peace and tranquillity to so many of my constituents who have no other open space as part of their environment.

I should tell hon. Members about Roberts Park and its sporting facilities. There are 12 sports clubs, four league cricket teams, two hockey pitches, two indoor sports centres and three football grounds, not to mention tennis courts. The river and canal and all the amenities are an attraction for many. But in this narrow valley there is a continuous fight for space. It is indisputable that the physical form of this valley causes special problems. It contains a river, a canal, a railway, a road and this village as it exists. To talk about any other expansion is inconceivable. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister of State is aware that I am not exaggerating. She has visited the area and is on record as saying, "I see this as one of the most difficult road problems in Britain."

Imagine, therefore, with what joy my constituents greeted the Minister's decision in 1982 to say no to any route through Saltaire, following his inspector's report. That ended 12 years of blight.

That opinion was reinforced only last year with the opening of a new railway station in April at a cost of £189,000. I think that we even got some European money, but I do not press that too hard. It was wholly in keeping with the area. We even had gas lamps to ensure that it fitted into our conservation area.

All that was shattered one month later when the Department reopened the whole matter with the present proposals. Everything is now back in the melting pot.

May I remind my hon. Friend of the results of the last inquiry? I do not need to remind her of the circumstances. The previous inquiry had been abandoned because of disruption. In fact, it was a cause celebre. I remember it as a Member of Parliament. I seem to remember one or two people coming to my advice bureau demanding that I should support them in their disruption, but I told them that I would have no part of it. I said that they should go through the consultation processes, which, of course, we did.

Robert Chance took on an invidious job as the next inspector. He impressed everyone with his dedication. He walked every foot of the route and concluded, on page 273, paragraph 670:

"I can do no other than say no all the way from Dowley Gap to Baildon."

He said that no new route was needed east of Bingley and that the existing choice was adequate from Cottingley Bar —that traffic should be kept on the A650 to Bradford and Leeds or take the B6269 for Bradford west and the motorways.

There is no doubting his conclusion that the Airedale route should end at Cottingley Bar rather than go through to Baildon. He also confirmed that the claim that new jobs would be created had not been proved and that no substantial benefit of that kind would occur. His words were:

"would aid neither economic recovery or developement in the valley."

Indeed, the Department accepted that the result would be a

"limited effect on industrial location and growth."

In other words, the only purpose of the extension of the Airedale route would be to move traffic quicker—in other words, that any price is worth just that. Well, the car is not God to all of us. It may be to some people, but there is a price that is too high to be paid. There must be a balance between progress and the environment.

Traffic from Skipton down into Bradford crawls even slower in Bradford than it does on the route down. What is the point in having all the improvements if, at the other end in Bradford, the situation is just as bad?

The only argument left is that the weight of traffic demands such a measure. What does Mr. Chance's assessor have to say about that? An expert traffic assessor sat with Mr. Chance and they both agreed that the traffic levels did not warrant a new road between Dowley Gap and Baildon. In fact, the assessor said:

"If the new road on this section—

east of Bingley—

"had been the county's responsibility, they would not have been able to justify such a large scheme against other transport priorities."

Nothing has changed since. Even the Department has conceded that since the last inquiry there is no new evidence of a substantial or material increase in the volume of traffic passing between Bingley and Shipley or, indeed, along the Aire valley route, other than any projected increase already taken into account by the inquiry of 1980-82.

People say that perhaps to finish the traffic at Cottingley Bar is not the answer, but the assessor showed that it is only at Cottingley Bar that there is any suggestion of overloading. He said that even by current traffic levels there was little congestion by national standards.

I am not an absentee landlord or absentee Member of Parliament. I live in Bingley, so I am well aware of every part of this route. I speak with feeling. As I drive from Shipley towards Bingley and get to Cottingley Bar I have every reason to turn right, leaving the A650 to continue towards Bradford west and the motorway. That road could take any proposed increase in traffic. The assessor said that the Saltaire roundabout should be given traffic lights which could deal with a greater flow. He had no doubt that the diversion of traffic at that point would help tremendously.

Councillors in my part of the world are not popular at the moment. Officers of the West Yorkshire metropolitan county opposed the ending of the road at Cottingley Bar on the ground that it conflicted with its policies to move traffic from Manningham and Girlington. They were unable to produce evidence to show that building the road east of Bingley would remove a significant volume of traffic from those areas.

Only 18 per cent. of the traffic in Toller lane and 20 per cent. in Manningham lane comes from the Aire valley. As one moves further into Bradford the proportion is even less. Yet that was the main reason for opposing the ending of the route at Cottingley Bar.

Where is all the pressure coming from? Is it from the Department of Transport or from the West Yorkshire metropolitan county? The latter will not be around for long, fortunately. Is it from the Bradford district council? Surely it cannot want a route that divides a village from its open space or another that would result in the demolition of much needed houses.

The brown and green routes are unthinkable. We hear about the wonderful proposal that there should be a tunnel under Saltaire. I do not know about the cost, but I know about the upheaval and desecration which cannot be contemplated. The pollution that it would create is a separate issue which I do not have time to develop tonight.

I do not know what our councils are playing at. At the last inquiry it was argued, in favour of the new road, that the increase in traffic would be 1 per cent. per annum from 1975 onwards. Yet through Manningham, where they claim that they are trying to avoid increased traffic, there has been a 1 per cent. increase since the inquiry.

Even their own publications do not help their case. We are not talking about a commuter belt in the most opulent part of Surrey or even opulent parts of Yorkshire or Cheshire. In the last census City Trends shows that car ownership has declined by 10 per cent. in the last 10 years. The area is bottom of the list of areas with households which do not have a car. Apparently 49·5 per cent. of households in the area do not have a car. Recent announcements claim that the mileage of private car owners decreased by one third.

There is only one solution, and it is not the amended yellow route. I am talking about inspector Chance's route 33. He had the right solution. Everyone accepts that it is a local traffic problem. The access and exit points would not be ideal for the bulk of the traffic.

What happens during school holidays? At peak times there are problems, but there are no problems at times when traffic is not excessive. I do not disagree with the Department's suggestion that round Cottingley Bar there may be flexibility. Recently Mr. Chance said that the Department of Trade and Industry did not suggest his route, and that the last thing he wanted was to leave traffic with the only option of going through the middle of Shipley. The traffic must have a choice of turning left, going straight on on the A650, or of turning right up Cottingley New road.

I could make many suggestions of ways to improve the traffic flow. Problems are caused only on three major junctions and one roundabout. Much could be done to improve that with a little foresight. The truth is that other road schemes should come first. At the last inquiry an assurance was given that the construction of the Bingley to Baildon section would not be permitted until the Shipley eastern bypass had been approved.

The Minister's Department would do well to consider the congestion in Bradford. A Bradford inner ring road should be constructed. We should also consider the dualling and upgrading of Valley road and Canal road, and the construction of the Shipley eastern bypass. Furthermore, we should proceed with the remainder of the Airedale trunk route terminating at Cottingley Bar.

There is a limit to what can be sacrificed to traffic. Our heritage and environment are priceless. The problem with the Bingley to Shipley section is that, given the lie of the land and concentration of housing, it is impossible to build a new road along the valley bottom without totally unacceptable long-lasting environmental and social damage.

I have received hundreds of letters from my constituents about the matter, among which is one from a constituent who lives at 261 Bingley road, Saltaire. He wrote:

"As a resident on the existing A650 earning a living driving lorries throughout Bradford and the Aire Valley, I can in no way find any justification for either the expense of the new road or what I regard as the desecration of a most beautiful and unique area."

12.32 am

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox) for the opportunity to discuss the Aire Valley trunk road. I have listened to his speech with great care. I am fully aware of the beauties of Saltaire, as I have visited it. I also know what a difficult valley it would be, especially its eastern end, in which to lay a road.

Our commitment to the Airedale route has not changed. I look forward to the day when we can make a start on the new road where it is needed. However, we need to improve conditions for many communities along the existing road, because for a long time local people have suffered. We want a safer road for all users and a better route for the traffic with improved access for industry.

I know that progress has been slow. I well understand some of the impatience expressed during the years. With the public inquiries in 1975 and 1980 and the inquiries into side roads and compulsory purchase orders, which have been held but on which decisions have not yet been announced, the matter has taken its natural course through our public inquiry procedures.

It is difficult with any valley road to locate it so that it offends no one. Space is limited, and the environment is truly sensitive. That is another reason for the slow progress. In 1982 a firm decision was taken on the road from Kildwick near Skipton to Keighley, and from Keighley to Bingley. I know how keen my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) is that those sections should be built, and I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley agrees with that. I am glad to repeat the assurance that I gave on 6 May 1983 that the Aire valley road will not end in what is now a car park at Bingley. We must resolve what happens thereafter.

The key decision, as my hon. Friend said, will be the line of the road to the east of Bingley. May I explain the background to the public consultation that took place in 1984 about the section of the route that rightly concerns not only my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley but my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office—the hon. Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw)—who has had to return to his Committee, and many of their constituents. I understand what it must be like for people in Saltaire and neighbouring areas to hear about various ideas and not to know whether they will be pursued. I am only too well aware that, in trying to obtain an acceptable solution, one runs the risk of the various options causing concern to residents in the area. We must end that as soon as we can. Since 1982, we have said that the new road will end at Cottingley Bar and that with the local authorities we shall reconsider ways of solving the traffic problems in Shipley and Manningham. My hon. Friend was right to say that before we can consider the Shipley eastern bypass, we must decide what will happen on the way there from the Aire Valley route.

What happened—it took some time—was that a joint working party was set up with West Yorkshire metropolitan county council and Bradford metropolitan district council to consider the problems. Surprise, surprise: they discovered that there were no easy solutions. They came up with some alternative routes for the section. I have made it clear all along that I am prepared to consider anything that is fresh and acceptable. That is why we went to a joint exhibition—not without some anxieties, I freely admit. We believed it right to give local people a further opportunity to offer their views on the schemes put forward by the councils.

Three routes were proposed. The yellow route, which ended at Cottingley Bar, was similar but not identical to that recommended by Inspector Chance following the 1980 inquiry. The working party believed that that was, on the whole, an improvement. It put forward two other routes that passed through the corridor to the north of Saltaire and Shipley, the green one ending at Baildon and the brown one ending at Shipley. They were not the Department's routes; they came from the working party that was seeking a solution. Most importantly, we wished to discover whether anyone had fresh ideas to deal with the problems of this most difficult section. It is important to stress that this consultation does not mean that the 1982 decision has been set aside. We are trying to find a way of dealing with the traffic once it gets to Cottingley Bar, and I know that my hon. Friend is aware of that.

We have had a strong public response in the form of completed questionnaires, letters to me personally, and petitions, as a result of our consultation. We have not yet finished collating all the details that have been sent, but we shall do so as quickly as possible. It is clear that many people have deep feelings and that there is much anxiety about the matter. Therefore, we must come to a decision as soon as possible. However, I wish to ensure that all representations are considered. I wish to consider the precise alignment recommended by Inspector Chance before we come to a conclusion on a preferred route beyond Cottingley Bar.

I remind my hon. Friend of our correspondence about Bradford and Bingley rugby football club, starting on 27 March last year. The club is worried about what happens at Cottingley Bar, because that is where its playing fields are. I have also three times extended the time for the responses to the suggestions. In October last year, west Yorkshire and Bradford councils came forward with a fresh option, the so-called modified green route.

Many representations have been made about this route, and I am well aware of the concern. I take this opportunity to thank the hundreds of people and organisations who have responded. I hope that my hon. Friend will pass on my thanks to every individual and in particular to the Aire valley preservation society, the Saltaire village society, the Coach road and Lower Baildon residents association and, more recently formed, the sports clubs against the road. All of these bodies have put their views clearly. They have put in a lot of effort, and we now have what we were seeking from consultation—an expression of views and a response from both local authorities and the public.

I shall now be required to exercise the judgment of Solomon, and I am not in a position to do so at this hour of the night. However, despite the weight of representation, I am determined that we shall announce a decision as soon as possible, and I hope to be able to talk to my hon. Friend and announce a decision as soon as possible. That is my aim and I shall do my best to keep to it.

Not only should we be ending the uncertainty we need to make progress on the other sections, and so much of that depends on the route east of Bingley. In particular, there is the section to the east of Crossflatts, where a decision on advance works to Bingley is outstanding. In November 1983 there was a public inquiry, but no announcement will be made on the preferred route east of Bingley, because that is the fair way to go.

Other Airedale decisions are outstanding. A public inquiry into side roads and compulsory purchase orders has to be sorted out. I shall not anticipate the outcome, but I am anxious to make a tangible beginning. I confirm again our commitment to improving conditions in Airedale, and also to making the right decisions because of the understandable sensitivity of a historic community in Saltaire and the area. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept how much I value the keen interest that he and my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey have shown in the matter. I am concerned not only about the protection of the environment, but about all the particular interests. I have a great sheaf of letters of cases that hon. Members have raised with me.

I recognise that the advance works proposed and the works on the main route through Bingley will cause parking problems. Therefore, the concern expressed to my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley by the Bingley chamber of trade is understandable. Obviously, the Department will pay appropriate compensation to owners for loss of land, but Bradford council will have to provide the necessary replacement car parking if any is taken away. We shall continue to discuss the problem if the council and my hon. Friend find that valuable.

I have mentioned Bradford and Bingley rugby club. It is too early to decide whether it will be affected in any way, but I have noted its views, as I have noted those of Mrs. Sharp of Cottingley Bar, and so many of the others who have written to us. The next step will be to announce the preferred route decision. Only after that can we begin the detailed preparation of the chosen route with the aim of publishing proposals as soon as we can. I cannot say when that will be, but I must emphasise that, whichever route is chosen, people will have another opportunity to comment and, if they wish to, object or propose alternatives.

I assure my hon. Friend that the many and varied interests that he has so cogently put forward on behalf of his constituents will be taken fully into account in reaching both the decision immediately before us and those that will subsequently follow. I hope that that will help and that we shall come to a decision as soon as we possibly and fairly can.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at sixteen minutes to One o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

Skillcentres and Jobcentres

1. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the Manpower Services Commission in Scotland about its plans to close skillcentres and cut staff at jobcentres; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan Stewart): I attended the meeting of the Manpower Services Committee for Scotland on 10 September at which the development of the employment service was among the matters discussed and joined my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment and other ministerial colleagues in meeting members of the Manpower Services Commission in London on 6 December on this subject. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment announced the Government's acceptance of the commission's final recommendations on 9 January in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon). The commission has not yet completed its consideration of the Skillcentre Training Agency's latest business plan.

Mr. Strang: Is it not outrageous that, when hundreds of thousands of Scots are unemployed through no fault of their own and the Government should be providing more training and help, they are planning to close two skillcentres and three skillcentre annexes and to cut 70 jobcentre staff whose job it is to help the unemployed find work?

Mr. Stewart: No, not at all. We are expanding the number of jobcentres in Scotland by a total of seven, including two in Edinburgh, in Corstorphine and Lady road. I emphasise that by tailoring provision to employment need, the Manpower Services Commission will assist more people. The figure this year of 9,600 will be increased to 17,000 in 1985-86.

Mr. Millan: Will the Minister ensure that no decision is taken by the MSC or Ministers to close skillcentres before the Select Committee on Employment reports and before there is a debate in the House? Will he also ensure that the MSC does not pre-empt any decision, as it has for example in Govan, by running down courses and selling off machinery at knock-down prices? Does the Minister agree that what is happening there and elsewhere is a scandal?

Mr. Stewart: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, debates in the House are not for me to decide. Unquestionably, there is over-capacity in the provision of the skillcentre network in the west of Scotland. I am, of course, aware of the Select Committee's investigation.

Mr. Bill Walker: When considering the future of skillcentres, will my hon. Friend take into account whether jobs are available in the skills for which training is given? Surely it is nonsense to train people in skills for which jobs are not available. Will my hon. Friend also take into account the facilities and spare capacity in private companies and Government-owned bodies which could be used to train people? Is the MSC directing its attention to that aspect?

Mr. Stewart: Yes, my hon. Friend is right. It is sensible for skillcentre courses to reflect what industry wants. That is my hon. Friend's point. My hon. Friend is also right to say that the MSC believes that there should be a variety of providers of relevant, cost-effective courses.

Mr. Craigen: Will Scotland's industry Minister tell us how, with almost 350,000 unemployed, he can meekly sit back and allow skillcentres to close, especially when the Scottish CBI says that there are shortages in skilled labour? Moreover, does the Minister think it satisfactory that the jobless in Scotland should be left to rely mostly on self-selection procedures? Is that not really the nature of the new schemes resulting from the cut in jobcentre staff?

Mr. Stewart: No, not at all. As I have already explained, there will be more jobcentres and the level of service will be maintained by travelling staff, the streamlining of procedures and modern technology.

I should have thought that the Opposition would accept the general proposition that it is absurd to waste resources at skillcentres. There is a capacity for 1,980 places, of which 1,234 are in use. If the proposals are implemented, there will be 1,360 places. We must use resources effectively.

As I said to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang), the result of the proposals will be an increase in the number of people in Scotland being assisted with training.

Teachers (Pay)

2. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the progress of discussions in relation to teachers' pay in Scotland.

5. Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a further statement on teachers' pay.

8. Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a further statement on teachers' pay.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Younger): I wrote again on 8 January to the teachers' side of the Scottish joint negotiating committee for teaching staff in school education inviting it to give further thought to my earlier proposal that the SJNC should undertake a detailed examination of salaries and conditions of service together. I understand that the SJNC decided yesterday to make a joint approach to me for a meeting. Although I have not yet received this letter, I shall, of course, be glad to meet its representatives.

Mr. Douglas: Does the Secretary of State agree that the mantle with which he seeks to cloak himself—that of generous George—is wholly misplaced? Is it not true that under the Conservative Administration teachers' pay in Scotland has fallen far below the level that they would expect? Is it not a farce to suggest that the Government have no responsibility for ensuring that teachers' pay keeps up with rather than falls behind the level of inflation? Is he aware that he has managed to unite all the teaching forces in Scotland against his Government?

Mr. Younger: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's calculation and figures. However, I fully appreciate that teachers feel very strongly about what they perceive to be injustices, and about which they are currently complaining. By far the most reasonable way to deal with the problem is to ask the body set up for the precise purpose of considering pay and conditions of teachers to investigate the complaints.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Why is the Secretary of State surprised by the action of the Scottish teachers after 10 years' erosion of their salary levels and what they have found to be the futility of dealing with Scottish Office Ministers? Is he aware that, far from playing the role of generous George, he is playing the role of General Jaruzelski in making the teachers dance to the tune of another country? The surprising factor is the forbearance of the teaching profession in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: I cannot agree with the right hon. Gentleman. When comparing teachers' salaries since 1979 with other grades—something that they purport to do—they have had similar rates of increase to other local authority employees and civil servants. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman does not have a strong point.

As I keep saying, I have not turned down their complaints out of hand. I have suggested a way forward, and I hope that, rather than disrupt our schools, the teachers will accept my suggestion.

Mr. Wilson: The Secretary of State says that he has not turned down the teachers' claim out of hand. In his letter of 11 December he said that he would consider the proposals

"on their merits and in the framework of the Government's existing public expenditure plans"?

Is not the reason why he cannot go ahead with an independent pay review that he has orders from the Treasury not to impede the Government's giveaway of taxation money orginally planned for Easter?

Mr. Younger: I suppose that the teachers' employers are in exactly the same position as every other employer throughtout the country. If they are considering what they can give in wage increases to their employees, they must consider the resources that they have available. I do not see anything unusual about that.

Mr. Henderson: Is my right hon. Friend aware that some teachers have made comparisons between increases in their pay and the pay of Members of Parliament? I have obtained from the Library the comparative figures for the 10 years from 1974. They show that, compared with the increase in the retail prices index, teachers's salaries have risen by 7 per cent. while the salaries of Members of Parliament have declined by 20 per cent. Does my right hon. Friend agree that a more realistic comparison would be with teachers' pay south of the border? Does he recognise that the responsible settlement made last year by Scottish teachers should be fully taken into account, especially as the militancy in England achieved a slightly larger settlement? Should we not reward those who take a responsible attitude, rather than the militants?

Mr. Younger: I am interested in my hon. Friend's comparisons, to which I shall not add, except to say that it might be interesting to discover the reaction of teachers to trying hon. Members' hours of work.

Mr. Maxton: Does the Secretary of State remember that on television just before Christmas he said that to give an independent inquiry into teachers's pay would be to give a blank cheque to the Educational Institute of Scotland? Was that not an admission that the teachers' case is recognised fully by him and that is why he will not have such an inquiry?

Mr. Younger: Not at all. A blank cheque can have any figure, high or low, put on it.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is concern about whether re-sits in O-grade mathematics and English will take place in future? Will this point be borne in mind in any discussions?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the point that my hon. Friend makes. It is an important matter, which is under consideration, and I hope to announce a decision shortly.

Mr. Dewar: It is no good Ministers deploring the damage that may come from industrial action when the right hon. Gentleman's obstinacy lies at the root of the problem. Leaving aside the curious comparison with so unrepresentative a grouping as Members of this House, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that his refusal to accept an independent pay review is, in a sense, a tacit acceptance that teachers' salaries have fallen behind comparable groupings and do not measure up to the responsibilities of the job?

If the right hon. Gentleman is right in saying, as he consistently maintains, that teachers have done reasonably well out of recent pay negotiations, why is he frightened to set up an independent pay review, thus risking plunging us into a great deal of disruption and difficulty for pupils? Will he reconsider his proposition that any uprating in salary can be bought by the teachers' profession only at the expense of their terms and conditions of employment?

Mr. Younger: I am glad to hear the hon. Gentleman say critical things today about the damaging of the service, because that seems to be an absolutely deplorable development—[Interruption.] I hope that, as we all have the interests of schoolchildren in mind, now that I have agreed to have the meeting which the Scottish joint negotiating committee has requested, I can take it that disruption of schools will stop, at least until after that meeting has taken place.

The hon. Gentleman's supplementary question gives me an opportunity to make it clear, yet again, that, although I might have done so, I have not turned down the teachers' case out of hand. The impression has been given that I have, but I have not. I have disagreed with the method by which they asked for their case to be considered, but I have pointed to a way forward by which all these matters, including conditions of service, can be looked into. Rather than bust up the education of our children, we should take that way forward and try to get this matter discussed.

Coal Supplies

3. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken since the begining of the mining dispute to ensure adequate supplies of coal for schools and hospitals in Ayrshire.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Throughout the strike the National Coal Board and the coal trade have worked in close co-operation with Strathclyde regional council and Ayrshire and Arran health board to provide adequate supplies of coal for schools and hospitals in Ayrshire. Towards the end of last year action by pickets interrupted the movement of coal in Ayrshire and this irresponsible action led to some school closures. At no time were Ayrshire hospitals affected.

Arrangements have been concluded between the National Coal Board and Strathclyde regional council to rebuild stocks and maintain deliveries, and I understand that coal supplies are now returning to normal.

Mr. Foulkes: I am grateful to the Minister for that answer. Is he aware that, because I telephoned Mr. MacGregor, chairman of the NCB, on this issue, I was telephoned early in the morning by the Scottish director of the NCB to complain at my having had the audacity to phone the chairman? Quite apart from any question of privilege — there may well be one — do not serious doubts arise about the management structure when the director of the Coal Board in Scotland can say to me that he does not accept instructions from his chairman? Does that not underline our call that there is a need for an inquiry into the way in which Wheeler is running the Coal Board in Scotland, which is like that of a tinpot dictator?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman was floundering to a remarkable extent, even for him. It was surprising to hear some of his comments in the light of his advocacy on devolution in other contexts. I was not privy to any of the telephone calls to which he has referred, but I am sure that many people will have read press reports about the hon. Gentleman's praise for the chairman of the NCB.

Mrs. McCurley: Does my hon. Friend agree that the best way to ensure adequate supplies for Ayrshire schools and hospitals is to exhort Scottish miners to return to work and end this futile strike?

Mr. Stewart: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. I can tell her that 850 more Scottish miners have done precisely that since the recent holidays.

Mr. McKelvey: Is the Minister aware that the coal was prevented from being moved to the hospitals and schools by the pickets because the administrator of the Coal Board in Scotland, Mr. Wheeler, instructed the coal to be moved by scab lorry drivers, which was unnecessary and provocative? It was only when the local and agreed lorry drivers were allowed to move the coal that things returned to normal. Throughout the whole of the disagreement and strike, the miners, by agreement, have allowed coal to go to Ayrshire hospitals and schools.

Mr. Stewart: It is hypocrisy to criticise the NCB and its workers for wanting to do their normal jobs and to excuse pickets who seek to prevent that from taking place.

Teachers (Pay)

4. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received about his decision not to set up an independent review of teachers' pay.

6. Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has received on teachers' pay since his decision not to set up an independent inquiry into teachers' pay and conditions.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Since my right hon. Friend responded on 11 December to the request by the teachers' side of the Scottish joint negotiating committee for an independent pay review, he has received some 450 representations.

Mr. Home Robertson: Will the Minister confirm that he has received a set of eminently reasonable representations from my constituent, Mr. John Pollock? Is he aware that I have received a substantial number of representations from parents and teachers in every part of my constituency and that every one of them has supported the EIS claim for a fair and independent review of teachers' pay and conditions?

Mr. Stewart: I am interested to learn that Mr. Pollock is a constituent of the hon. Gentleman, but I do not think that that is a matter on which I should comment either way. In replying to the representations that my right hon. Friend has received, he has said that the SJNC could undertake a detailed review of pay and conditions of service. It has been established for about three years and its remit would include such a review, which has not yet been undertaken. That is a reasonable position for the Government to take.

Mr. Hogg: As the Minister's reply confirms that there is no public support for the decision that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has taken — there is no support among the profession or by parents for his own much-vaunted initiative in this matter — does he agree that he has no case and that he should give instructions for an independent inquiry to take place without further delay, and thereby end any prospect of disrupton in the schools?

Mr. Stewart: Teachers' pay has increased broadly in line with that of other local authority employees. During the four years from 1979 teachers' pay increased by 74 per cent. while social workers' pay increased by 63 per cent. I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman's statement. His former colleagues in NALGO would be surprised to hear him argue that teachers merit special and unique treatment not available to other local authority employees.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my hon. Friend accept that it is important for this issue to be resolved as soon as possible? Will he confirm that the joint negotiating committee will be able to consider all the issues relating to teachers' pay and conditions of service? We hope that that body will report quickly to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who can then reach a conclusion.

Mr. Stewart: I confirm that the SJNC's remit covers pay and conditions of service. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State told the House in answer to an earlier question, he is prepared to meet the SJNC in the near future to discuss this matter.

Mr. Johnston: Is the Minister aware that it is still difficult to understand why the Secretary of State has refused to set up an independent pay review? Obviously, such a review would not be mandatory. Clearly, an objective analysis would allow a fair solution to be found more easily. Such an analysis would avoid the inflaming of feeling—such as we have seen already—the bust up that the Secretary of State has just criticised, and gratuitous damage to our children's education.

Mr. Stewart: It would not be right to pass the job of making recommendations to an ad hoc group which had no responsibility for implementing them. Established machinery can undertake such a review, and I believe that that is a perfectly sensible proposition.

Mr. O'Neill: Does the hon. Gentleman appreciate that, apart from the purely financial aspects of a strike, the Minister's intransigence is jeopardising the valuable work that has been done in developing the standard grade? That work has been done without extra salaries being paid to the teachers involved. The teachers are now saying that enough is enough and they want to be paid for the work they have done. They feel that they, as opposed to the other professions in Scotland, are entitled to be rewarded for that work.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend has made provision for the extra work load carried in developing the standard grade. Last week we announced further extra assistance for the teachers involved in phase one. I deplore the disruption that has occurred during the introduction of the standard grade. It is ironic that the EIS asked the Government to speed up the implementation of the standard grade, and that the teachers are now disrupting reforms which are widely agreed to be desirable in the interests of Scottish people.

Mr. Malone: Is my hon. Friend aware that it is desirable that pay and conditions should be linked in any negotiations? Is it not therefore disgraceful that the EIS has rejected out of hand an offer to discuss conditions? Will my hon. Friend clear up a misconception felt by many of my constituents—a misconception that appears to be shared by the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson)—namely that the EIS wants an independent review of pay and conditions? The EIS is interested only in pay.

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend is right to say that EIS has asked for an independent review solely of pay. That request constrasts with the early-day motion tabled by some Opposition Members which relates to pay and conditions of service. I believe that it is perfectly reasonable to link pay and conditions of service and to conduct a detailed review of both within the existing collective bargaining machinery.

Mr. Ewing: Is it not a fact that the Under-Secretary of State wants to review pay and conditions in the context of the Government's pay policy—in other words, to get the best out of teachers' conditions and to give the worst return to teachers in the form of salaries? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the blame for the disruption in Scottish education lies firmly at his door and the door of the Secretary of State? In view of that, will the Minister confirm that when the Secretary of State goes to the SJNC meeting he will go to negotiate and not, yet again, to dictate?

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend will, of course, listen carefully, as he always does, to the points that the SJNC put to him. Disruption in Scottish schools lies firmly at the door——

Mr. Robert Hughes: Of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Stewart: —of those who are causing the disruption. I hope that Scottish teachers will realise that that disruption does not just cause damage to the education of Scottish pupils, but it cannot possibly do the teachers case any good.

Glengarnock Steelworks

7. Mr. Lambie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will meet the chairman of British Steel to discuss the recent announcement on the future of Glengarnock steelworks.

Mr. Younger: I met the chairman of the British Steel Corporation on 29 November, when we had a wide-ranging discussion of the corporation's activities in Scotland. I have no plans for a further meeting in the near future.

Mr. Lambie: I appeal to the Secretary of State to meet the chairman of the British Steel Corporation again to discuss the case for retention. It will be supported at a meeting tomorrow with his hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), by the steel workers' acting committee and councillors from Strathclyde and the regional council. It will show that Glengarnock steelworks can be viable, competitive and profitable if given a chance.

Mr. Younger: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, I am worried about this matter. I am glad that my hon. Friend is meeting those representatives tomorrow. I know that he is looking forward to hearing the case that they put forward.

Mr. Corrie: If my right hon. Friend meets the chairman of the British Steel Corporation again, will he point out that it will cost more to close the works than to keep them open? Is my right hon. Friend further aware that with its new proposals the work force is pricing itself into jobs by cutting costs in line with Government policy, to its own detriment? If the British Steel Corporation is determined to close these works and get rid of Glengarnock, will he suggest that they should be kept open to give a private buyer a chance to see whether the first-class work force can keep its jobs?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for keeping me so closely informed of his constituents' anxiety about this matter. The decision to close, which I greatly regret, is one entirely to be made as an operational matter by the British Steel Corporation. There is no doubt about the commitment of the work force. I am sure that the facts and figures that it will produce will be listened to with the greatest of interest by my hon. Friend and the British Steel Corporation.

Mr. Dewar: May I take up strongly with the right hon. Gentleman the point that he made about it being an operational decision for the British Steel Corporation? If that is the Government's final view, I fear that the works may have a short future, because the British Steel Corporation seems determined, despite the far-reaching and imaginative proposals which will eliminate the current deficit in the plant, to continue with its closure plans. Will the Secretary of State try to persuade his colleagues and himself, sadly, in view of what he has just said, that the Government cannot shelter behind the concept that it is a bold management decision by the British Steel Corporation, given the impact that the loss of a further 200 key jobs will have on an area of high unemployment? I hope that he will reconsider the matter, because if he does not the outlook is black.

Mr. Younger: I sympathise with the whole position, of course. I do not accept, and nor would his own Government, the hon. Gentleman's point that this is anything other than an operational decision for the British Steel Corporation. That has always been the way that such matters have worked. We cannot appoint people to manage an industry and then second-guess them on everything that they do. For that reason the representations should be made to the British Steel Corporation, and I know that that is where they will be made.

Dornoch Firth and A9

9. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will seek to accelerate the construction of the Dornoch Firth crossing and the improvement of the A9 through Caithness and Sutherland.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): My Department is already proceeding as quickly as possible with preparations for the Dornoch Firth crossing and other improvements on the A9 through Caithness and Sutherland. Progress will depend upon the resolution of objections to published proposals and on the extent to which funds can be made available within the Scottish trunk road programme.

Mr. Maclennan: Is the Minister aware that today the unemployment levels in Sutherland are higher than anywhere in Scotland? Is he also aware that the A9 road north of Tain is a woefully inadequate arterial road which needs capital expenditure urgently, that almost no spending is planned for it in the next financial year? Does he realise that by starting the Dornoch Firth building works he could cut unemployment in Sutherland and Caithness by 10 per cent. and give a filip to the long-term future of the local economy?

Mr. Ancram: I do not know where the hon. Gentleman got his information about no projected spending on the A9. In the years 1985 to 1989 there are seven improvements planned for the A9 north of Dornoch, at a cost of about £11 million, and six improvements planned for the road south of Dornoch, also at a cost of £11 million. Obviously, the bridges will be of benefit, not only to travellers on the A9 but to local people. I hope that the hon. Gentleman accepts that it is a large and costly scheme requiring extensive design work, and that it will make a very big claim on the resources available.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Does my hon. Friend, in considering improvements to the A9, ensure that priority resources are given to the Dunblane bypass? Will he be in a position shortly to announce the line of route?

Mr. Ancram: I congratulate my hon. Friend on using the opportunity to press, as he does so assiduously, the interests of his own constituency with regard to that bypass. As he appreciates, we have said that that bypass will be built in due course. Obviously, we are not yet in a position to announce the line.

Mr. Ewing: Does the Minister agree that the interest of the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) in improving the bypass from Dunblane is to allow him to make a quick getaway?

Mr. Ancram: I think that my hon. Friend's concern is to see communications improved right across Scotland. I know that that has never been of particular interest to the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing).

Airports (Privatisation)

10. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the implications for Scotland of the privatisation of Scottish airports.

Mr. Ancram: The Government's aim is to ensure adequate airport capacity, provided as efficiently and cost-effectively as possible, to meet Scotland's needs. Particular proposals for privatisation will be pursued with this objective in mind.

Mr. Bruce: Will the Minister acknowledge that the management of the four main airports in Scotland by the British Airports Authority has been of considerable benefit, and that the retention of that management group and the link with the BAA will continue to be of benefit to Scottish people? Is the Minister aware that, in the particular case of Aberdeen airport, Grampian regional council — which, as the Minister knows, is Conservative-controlled—has expressed doubts as to the case for privatisation?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Member must be aware that no decisions have yet been taken concerning privatisation of the BAA airports in Scotland, and at this time it would be improper for me to speculate on how that might happen.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Is the Minister aware that there is no case whatever for privatising the airports? Will he further accept that the majority opinion is that the four major airports in Scotland should not be sold off as an entity but as a group which contains Heathrow, otherwise business will be very seriously disrupted?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Member is obviously trying to get me to speculate in a way that I have just said I will not do. I remind him that privatisation often creates greater efficiency and savings for those who use the services.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Will my hon. Friend bear in mind that the Sottish airports run by the CAA in the Highlands and Islands and by my constituents in the CAA headquarters in Edinburgh, West and elsewhere in Scotland are run very economically, bearing in mind the essential lifeline service that they provide, and that it is extremely unlikely that any other body could run them as economically in the circumstances?

Mr. Ancram: My hon. Friend is also pre-empting decisions that have yet to be taken. Obviously, we shall be testing, and are indeed testing, the market for the proposition at the moment.

Mr. Wallace: The Minister will be well aware that in a written answer given to me by the Department of Transport earlier this week it was indicated that the Scottish Office, along with others, was considering proposals for six airports in the Highlands and Islands. Is there a distinction between the proposals and firm offers for sale, which were due in by 31 December last? If so, what is that distinction?

Mr. Ancram: A number of offers and inquiries have been received and are being considered. Obviously, those offers and inquiries differ one from the other.

British Leyland, Bathgate

11. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his latest discussions on the future of British Leyland, Bathgate.

Mr. Allan Stewart: As the hon. Member will be aware from the answer that I gave him last month, my right hon. Friend and I are doing everything that we can to find a successor enterprise for the British Leyland plant at Bathgate, and to create new job opportunities for the West Lothian area.

Mr. Dalyell: Is Mr. Charles Nickerson getting every encouragement from the Scottish Office?

Mr. Stewart: I can confirm that my officials keep in regular touch with both of the companies that have been mentioned, and have been in contact within the past few days.

Mr. Robin Cook: When the Minister examines what he can do for job opportunities in West Lothian, will he bear in mind the fact that in 1980 West Lothian received £7 million in housing and rate support grants, and in 1986 it will receive the grand total of £700,000 from both sources? Does the hon. Gentleman not realise that that sharp drop in outside support will gravely hinder the district council in responding to the tragedy of Bathgate and mean fewer jobs in West Lothian?

Mr. Stewart: I am a firm supporter of the Government's housing policies. I thought that the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) would mention one of the most important factors in the West Lothian situation, which has been the outstanding success of the new town in attracting a wide range of new companies and providing job opportunities for people not just in Livingston but from elsewhere in West Lothian.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does the Minister agree that it is absurd that there should be any doubt about the future of the plant, in view of the demand for those vehicles in Third world countries? Does he accept that there is an urgent need for a meeting between his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Minister for Overseas Development so that a conclusion can be reached that would be helpful to the workers of Bathgate as well as those who are starving in developing countries?

Mr. Stewart: The point is that the overseas demand for Leyland's products has declined sharply in recent years. It is true that there has been a marginal improvement in demand recently, but British Leyland has more than enough capacity at its Leyland plant to accommodate even substantially increased demand for trucks.

Mr. Ewing: Is the Minister aware that the Nickerson proposals have the full support of the shop stewards at the British Leyland Bathgate plant? Will he give the House an assurance that the matter will be brought to a conclusion as speedily as possible to remove the uncertainty, not only from the British Leyland plant at Bathgate, but from the whole of that local authority area, which is suffering badly as a result?

Mr. Stewart: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we are as anxious as anybody else to reach a satisfactory conclusion. I can confirm that my Department is in close touch with Mr. Nickerson.

Rural Bus Services

12. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the effect of planned Government legislation on Scottish rural bus services.

Mr. Ancram: Under existing policies many services have been curtailed or withdrawn. Our proposals offer the prospect of better services by removing outdated restrictions and encouraging operators to offer new ways of meeting needs. To overcome any transitional difficulties a rural bus grant will be available to all operators of rural services for a four-year period and an innovation grant scheme will encourage the development of new initiatives.

Mr. Kirkwood: Is the Under-Secretary of State aware that officials in his Department revealed recently that an internal departmental study shows that, whereas there might be savings in subsidies in the Lothians and Strathclyde, in the rural areas of Scotland local authorities will eventually have to pay more in subsidies? I challenge the hon. Gentleman to publish that survey so that we can look at the facts. Can he give the House an assurance that if, eventually, that transpires to be the case and rural regional authorities in Scotland have to pay more in subsidies, he will make sure that the finance is made available rather than allow routes to contract further?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman sounds as if he believes that the bus industry and the use of buses in Scotland, particularly in the rural areas, is increasing. Perhaps some of his comments on the matter would stand in a better light if that were so, but we are working against a history of decline in bus usage and in the whole bus industry in Scotland, particularly in the rural areas. I believe that by putting the subsidised routes out to tender efficiency will be increased and a better service will be provided at a better cost.

Mr. Henderson: Is my hon. Friend aware that there has long been anxiety about the quality of rural bus services and that the announcements that he has made will be very welcome to those who live in rural areas? Is he aware that the result of an experiment in deregulation in Herefordshire was to reduce subsidy, to increase services and to reduce fares, which is surely what we want?

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing that example to the notice of the House. If subsidised routes are put out to tender, and if they are efficiently run at present and are as cost-effective as possible, obviously those same operators will continue, but if there is a better and cheaper way of running them, tendering will provide that.

Mr. Steel: Before the Secretary of State comes to any final conclusions on the matter, will he undertake to examine the financing of the two community bus services that exist in Scotland, one in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), and one in my constituency, recognise what a cost-effective and inexpensive way this is of providing a service, and consider the assistance that he could give with replacement vehicles?

Mr. Ancram: The right hon. Gentleman makes a good point, and it is certainly a point that was part of the White Paper published by the Government, that innovation and new ideas, particularly in rural areas, are important. Indeed, he has examples in his own constituency and in his own area of such ideas providing improved services. It is for that reason, as I have already said, that we shall be introducing an innovation grant scheme to try to encourage further such ideas.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that in Scotland in particular the rural bus service has been in savage decline for 25 years? Many parts of my constituency are not served by any public transport. Therefore, to continue with the status quo could only mean fewer and fewer services being made available to my Highland constituents. The proposals that the Government are making are therefore an attempt to reverse this declining situation.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point so strongly. It is precisely because we have been faced with a history of decline in the bus services—and as constituency Members most of us will know from the complaints we receive that people are not satisfied with the bus services they have at present—that we believe that our proposals offer the one opportunity of reversing that trend. It has been noticeable that in all the criticism that has been made of the White Paper not one alternative idea for improving bus services has been put forward.

Mr. Millan: The Minister said that it is his belief that the proposals will lead to an improvement in bus services. However, the fact is that neither the Minister nor his officials have ever run a bus service. It is impossible to find anyone in Scotland who has run a bus service who believes other than that these proposals will be disastrous, not only for rural bus services, but for many other bus services as well.

Mr. Ancram: I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will remember that almost precisely the same criticisms were made of the express coach services before deregulation. The use of those coaches has proved how wrong that criticism was.

Mr. Craigen: What guarantee will the Minister give to the rural communities that he will save their buses? He keeps telling the House about the money that he has allocated for innovation grants. Why is it that COSLA views as an insult the amount of money that he is making available to Scotland to retain rural bus services?

Mr. Ancram: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I met the transport sub-committee of COSLA on Monday. I made it clear to the sub-committee that throughout the United Kingdom a grant will be paid in the rural areas within the transition period of four years. That will start at a rate of £20 million, reducing on a graduated scale to £5 million in the last of those four years. When the hon. Gentleman talks of saving buses, he speaks as if that is what is happening in the rural areas. The rural areas in particular have suffered from reducing bus services. These proposals at last give them a chance of seeing the sort of services that they want.

Hepatitis B Virus

13. Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he is taking to protect police officers, ambulance personnel, doctors and nurses from the risk of catching hepatitis B virus.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan MacKay): Guidance was issued by the Scottish Home and Health Department on 3 December 1984 on precautions to be taken to protect health care personnel from the risk of contracting hepatitis B in the course of their work. We are at present considering whether guidance should be given to the police service on this matter.

Mr. George Robertson: Does not the serious increase in cases of the deadly hepatitis B show that the increasing drug epidemic is spreading its effects to the people employed in the police, ambulance and hospital services who are obliged to deal with addicts? Is it not a fact that there is genuine concern in these services that complacency in high places has been shown because such instructions came so late in the day? Is the Minister convinced that the steps now taken will give the appropriate protection to those who come into contact with drug addicts?

Mr. MacKay: It is indeed a serious problem, and it is worth stressing that an increase in the incidence of hepatitis B is one of the consequences of drug addiction. We are following the advice of the expert joint committee on vaccination and immunisation. We are also considering the point about police officers, in consultation with the Association of Police Officers. There is a very successful immunisation against hepatitis B which can be carried out on anyone who thinks that he has been in contact with sufferers in such a way as to be in danger of contracting the disease.

Trunk Roads (Midlothian)

14. Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about his proposals with regard to trunk roads in Midlothian, and especially the A7 and A68.

Mr. Ancram: The major schemes planned for possible starts in the period 1986-89 are the A7 Dalkeith bypass and Middleton bypass, the A68 Dalkeith bypass, and the A702 Hillend improvement. A minor improvement to the A68-A6137 junction is planned for this year.

Mr. Eadie: Is the Minister aware that the A7 bypass is essential for industrial development in Midlothian and that the A68 bypass is urgently needed for Dalkeith? Members of Midlothian council have been told that the A7 bypass is subject of reassessment because the previous assessments were incompetently handled. How does that square with the Minister's answer? Is it not time that this bungling incompetence ceased so that the bypasses can be built?

Mr. Ancram: For the A7 project, the last economic assessment produced a negative result. Lothian regional council, the agent authority, has been asked to carry out a reassessment using different traffic assignments to see whether an economic and viable scheme can be produced. I understand that this is because in past assessments insufficient account was taken of the future effects of the Edinburgh outer city bypass on traffic flows at Eskbank. If all the work is completed we would still hope to start the scheme before 1989.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Trials (Tape Recordings)

32. Mr. Dalyell asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland whether, in the light of the case of Sergeant Jamieson of Bo'ness, he will discuss with procurators fiscal the use of tape recordings as evidence in Scottish courts.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. Peter Fraser): I understand that the hon. Member's question relates to the tape recording of evidence given in summary trials in Scottish courts for use in appeals. I have no plans at present to discuss such tape recordings with procurators fiscal in the light of the case to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

Mr. Dalyell: Is the objection based on cost?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The hon. Gentleman may recall that when he first raised this with the previous Lord Advocate he suggested changes in the way in which adjustments to stated cases were put before the Appeal Court. He will also recall that those very changes were introduced in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act. I am satisfied that in that respect the appeal procedure is now working very much better.

33. Mr. Maxton asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland when he will meet procurators fiscal to discuss the use of tape recordings as evidence in Scottish courts.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I have no plans at present to do so. After evaluation of the experiment carried out on behalf of the Scottish Home and Health Department between 1980 and 1983 in Falkirk and Dundee, and latterly also in Aberdeen and part of Glasgow, it will be for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to decide whether tape recordings of police interviews should be introduced in Scotland on a formal basis. Thereafter it may be appropriate for my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate and myself to meet procurators fiscal or to issue guidance to them.

Mr. Maxton: Is the Minister aware that promises were made in Committee on the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill to the effect that the use of tape recordings would be introduced as soon as possible to provide some safeguard against the wrongful use of detention? When will that take place, or is the delay to continue indefinitely?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I well recall the considerable debate that took place on tape recording and the subsequent agreement that an experiment should take place, which was then carried out. The hon. Gentleman will also be aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has already told the House that the Government intend to publish the results of the experiment in the form of a consultation paper before any final decisions are taken about the future of tape recording of police interviews in Scotland.

Mr. Fairbairn: Does my hon. and learned Friend appreciate that tape recording has resulted in grave difficulties in the proper presentation of evidence for the conviction of those who are guilty and that if it were introduced it would result in an impossible situation——

Mr. Maxton: The hon. and learned Gentleman was down there on the Front Bench making the promises.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fairbairn: —in which the police would never know what evidence was acceptable or admissible or what questions were allowable but not admissible. The result would be that many guilty people would be acquitted, and the innovation would be of no benefit to the innocent.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I am bound to accept that, after the introduction of the tape recording of police interviews, a number of cases came before the courts that probably made it more difficult for police officers to understand how far they could go in the examination of suspects. However, following the first reference by the Lord Advocate to the Court of Appeal, the situation has been clarified for police officers. After what was said by the Lord Justice General, I hope that police officers understand just how far they can go, what questions would be fair for them to put to suspects at the police station and which, on the other hand, would be improper.

Mr. Maclennan: Why has so much time elapsed since the conclusion of the experiment without the Government letting us know their own views?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The results of the experiment are being collated. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has made it clear that those results will be published for wider public consultation in the form of a consultation paper. The experiment was first set up in two places and subsequently extended to Aberdeen and Glasgow. This is a difficult matter and the Government are proceeding in a sensible and cautious way in considering the introduction of such changes.

Mr. Dewar: The Solicitor-General for Scotland must accept that, even by the standards of this place, and bearing in mind the movement of Governments, the time lag has been quite noticeable. Will he study the written answer in the Official Report of 10 January giving details of the favourable experiences in Leicester and, I believe, five other areas of England, where experiments have been conducted? After five or six years, we should have at least have reached the stage of formal consultation. When will the consultation paper be published?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: That is a matter for the Secretary of State for Scotland. As I have already made clear to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn), it has taken sometime for cases to come before the appeal courts that clarify the rights and duties of police officers in conducting interviews. That being so, I do not consider that there has been undue delay in carrying out a difficult and important experiment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In fairness to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown), whom I did not see rise, I will, exceptionally, call him now.

Mr. Ron Brown: Will the Solicitor-General for Scotland apologise to Mr. David Hamilton and pay him the appropriate sum of compensation for the period that he spent in gaol?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Mr. Hamilton was brought before the court in Edinburgh shortly before Christmas. He was allowed the opportunity of a fair trial before a sheriff and a jury, and he was acquitted. I believe that justice was done in the normal way, and that the hon. Gentleman should be satisfied.

Coal Industry Dispute

34. Mr. Foulkes asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many people charged with offences arising out of the mining dispute have been refused unconditional bail; and, of these, how many had previous criminal convictions.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: As at 9 January 1985, 20 persons had been remanded in custody after appearing in court charged with offences arising out of the mining dispute. Of the 20 persons, two were subsequently released on appeal and one immediately changed his plea to that of guilty. As some persons still await trial, it would be inappropriate to release information about previous convictions. Information on the imposition of any special conditions of bail is not available centrally.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the Solicitor-General for Scotland confirm that it is not normal to refuse unconditional bail for first offenders and that, by doing so, the courts—especially the sheriffs courts at Dunfermline and Kilmarnock—are acting in a political manner that is quite unacceptable and are deliberately trying to intimidate pickets and limit their activities? Will he confirm that such behaviour is improper, and say what action he intends to take?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The only thing that I should have thought improper is the hon. Gentleman's attempt to attack sheriffs——

Mr. Foulkes: I am protecting my constituents from them, and the Solicitor-General should be as well.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The hon. Gentleman knows that that is not the case. If people believe that their applications for bail should not have been refused, there is a clear and speedy appeal procedure to enable them to have the bail decision reviewed by a High Court judge. As I said in my original answer, on the two occasions when that has been done, the appeals have been sustained.

35. Mr. McKelvey asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many prosecutions related to the coal dispute have been dealt with by Kilmarnock courts to date.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: As at 9 January 1985, 92 prosecutions for offences arising out of the mining dispute had been dealt with in Kilmarnock courts.

Mr. McKelvey: Notwithstanding the answer that the hon. and learned Gentleman gave my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), does he share the anxiety that many of us feel that there is a hint in some press reports that there has been some political collusion in regard to miners arriving at courts and being tried? There should be some form of inquiry into police activities in Ayrshire during the strike and how matters have been dealt with in court.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: If the hon. Gentleman is making allegations about the conduct of judges in Scotland concerning political interference in the administration of justice, he should do so through a substantive motion to be presented to the House, rather than rely on repeating broad and unfounded allegations without giving any detail of the circumstances in which such political motivation is said to have occurred.

Questions to Ministers

3.32 pm

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You might be aware, Sir, that some English hon. Members think that the Government's forestry policy is deplorable. In view of that, could you look into the new circumstances that have developed as the Government have transferred forestry responsibilities to the Secretary of State for Scotland? Is it not clear that our Scottish colleagues have quite enough to do in representing their constituencies without encouraging English Members to intervene in Scottish questions to pursue this matter? In view of the implications of the change, would you examine the matter urgently?

Mr. Speaker: The issue of who is responsible for answering questions is not for me. I noted the question tabled by the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) —No. 19—and I am sorry that we did not reach it.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will have noticed, Mr. Speaker, that, of the 36 questions which were tabled today for oral answer, only four were in the names of Conservative Members. As that demonstrates Conservative Members' singular lack of interest in all matters appertaining to Scotland, why do you think it worth while to call them to ask supplementary questions? They have asked 12 today on questions that they did not bother to table.

Mr. Speaker: I try to be fair to the House and am the first to appreciate that there are more Scottish Members on the Opposition side than on the Government side. If the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) examines the Order Paper, he will see that, with the exception of those hon. Members who tabled question No. 19, which has already been mentioned, question No. 23, question No. 24, question No. 27—the hon. Gentleman's—and question No. 31, all right hon. and hon. Members present in the Chamber were called today.

Mr. Hamilton: Not me—I was not called.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hesitate to raise this matter, as I probably could have written to you about it, but it affects virtually every right hon. and hon. Member. You cannot have failed to notice, Mr. Speaker, that on today's Order Paper, many right hon. and hon. Members are seekers after wisdom in trying to elicit from the Prime Minister her official engagements for 29 January. There are well over 100 such questions. Would you reflect on the fact that, if there is a possibility of only the first five questions on the Order Paper being aired, it is tantamount to a lottery? Why do we not consider making a change so that Members who wish to ask the Prime Minister on a Tuesday or a Thursday open questions — that is what they are — have their names put in a lottery and Members who wish to ask specific questions are not denied the opportunity? Perhaps there might be an extension of Question Time. We have really institutionalised this practice which takes up a lot of time for Members, printers and others. The practice is unproductive, unacknowledged and not understood outside the House.

Mr. Speaker: The answer to that question is that it is entirely up to right hon. and hon. Members as to what questions they put down to the Prime Minister. [Interruption.] Well, it is. It is up to them whether they put down definitive questions or open questions. Anyway, all these questions go into what I understand is called the shuffle. To that extent it is a lottery as to whether one comes out early or late. The matter is entirely in the hands of hon. Members. If the hon. Gentleman feels strongly about it, he might well raise it with Procedure Committee.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for an Englishman who represents Central Fife, who has no residence in Scotland and who normally lives in England, to complain about the activies of Scotsmen? Is that not contradicting the legislation on racism of which he is such an adherent?

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it proper to say that anyone who lives in a castle is properly domiciled in Scotland?

Mr. Speaker: I will not get myself involved in this. So far as I am concerned, the hon. Members represent Scottish constituencies.

Leaseholders (Choice of Insurers)

3.36 pm

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to allow a leaseholder to choose the company with whom he insures his dwelling from a list of approved insurance companies.

This is a small but none-the-less important Bill. Its purpose is to extend freedom of choice over property insurance to the leaseholders of about 1,400,000 flats and homes in England and Wales to whom this is denied. Landlords can and do dictate the company with whom leaseholders are required to insure. Certainly there is financial gain for the landlords by way of commission. It is not always the case that the commission is translated into lower premiums for the leaseholders. It may be argued that this compulsion is in the best interests of leaseholders who, where large numbers of properties are involved, can get acceptable cover for discounted premiums. That is about the best face which can be put on this dubious practice.

Let me give an example of what happens in practice, helpfully provided to me through the Consumers Association. Fountaine Freeholds Limited, which inconveniently operates from a post office box number in St. Helier, Jersey, wrote to a leaseholder saying it had bought the freehold of the property. The letter said:

"We have specific requirements as to Insurers and shall notify you of these in due course. In the meantime, and as so required by your Lease, please let us have your existing Policy of Insurance and the current receipt for premium."

A separate undated letter to the leaseholder said:

"Under the terms of your lease, you covenant with your Lessors (that is us) to insure your house and all other buildings which may be upon the land in the joint names of the Lessors and Lessees in some Insurance Office to be named from time to time by the Lessors to the full value thereof. Previous Lessors did not have a policy of directing insurance but with a view to good Estate Management, the policy of this Company is to have all freeholds owned by us insured in one office."

It then added threateningly:

"It may well be that neither you nor your Building Society will want to change insurers. We must make it very clear that no Building Society has the power to insist that you insure with any particular Company. We, as your Lessors, do have such a power"— the next words are underlined—

"and we shall insist that our nomination be followed."

The letter went on:

"those who fail to carry out our direction as to insurance, will commit an immediate and serious breach of covenant in respect of which we shall serve Notice upon the Lessee under Section 146 of the Law of Property Act 1925 with a view to the commencement of proceedings to forfeit the Lease."

It warned:

"Your Lease also contains a provision for the Lessee to pay all the Lessors' costs, charges and expenses which may be incurred by the Lessors in or in contemplation of any such proceedings. These costs would be substantial."

This high-handed action is all the more unacceptable in this day and age, because the cover insisted on by the nominated company was at the standard rate of 15p per £100—no bargain there for the leaseholder, but a nifty commission for the heavy-handed landlords.

As the British Insurance Brokers Association says about the lack of choice of insurers:

"Members of the public . . . could be forgiven for feeling that they are being forced to purchase something they do not want . . . They find themselves locked into a long-term financial arrangement which denies them a choice of borrowers from another institution".

This practice is outrageous, unfair and extortionate. My Bill will put paid to it by insisting that leaseholders have the choice of not less than three insurers. This will help householders, encourage proper competition and will enable brokers and insurance companies to be able to bid for business which is now cosily enforced with the threat of the loss of a home to the leaseholders of almost 1·5 million flats and houses in England and Wales.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Robin Corbett, Mr. Bryan Gould, Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe, Mr. Tony Blair, Mr. Frank Dobson, Mr. Mark Fisher, Dr. John Marek, Mr. Stuart Randall, Mr. Allan Rogers, Mr. Clive Soley and Mr. Ken Weetch.

LEASEHOLDERS (CHOICE OF INSURERS)

Mr. Robin Corbett accordingly presented a Bill to allow a leaseholder to choose the company with whom he insures his dwelling from a list of approved insurance companies. And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 1 February and to be printed. [Bill No. 59.]

Rate Support Grant (England)

3.42 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): I beg to move,

That the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 2) 1984/85 (House of Commons Paper No. 81), which was laid before this House on 11th December, be approved.

It may, Mr. Speaker, be for the convenience of the House if we also discussed the following motions:

That the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 3) 1983/84 (House of Commons Paper No. 82), which was laid before this House on 11th December, be approved.

That the Rate Support Grant Report (England) 1985/86 (House of Commons Paper No. 142), which was laid before this House on 20th December, be approved.

Mr. Speaker: Is that acceptable to the House?

Hon. Members: Aye.

Mr. Speaker: So be it.

Mr. Jenkin: Before I describe the rate support grant reports, I should like to set them in context and remind the House of some of the facts about local authority current spending. This year in England—in this debate we are concerned only with England—such spending amounts to £24 billion, more than a fifth of total public spending. Its significance to the Government's overall economic strategy is, therefore, obvious, and both we and the previous Labour Government have rightly treated local Government current spending as a crucial element within public expenditure as a whole.

To illustrate this, I remind the House of the experience of former Ministers within the Treasury and the Department of the Environment when grappling with this problem. In his book "Inside the Treasury", Lord Barnett wrote:

"For years current expenditure of local authorities had grown steadily under Conservative as well as Labour Governments. It was £5·5 billion in 1970/71 and by the time we took over it was £6·8 billion. We then proceeded to increase it substantially. By 1979, at 1975 Survey prices it was some £13 billion".

As he rightly said, that is a lot of money.

He went on:

"The main source of control was the size of the RSG. As Chief Secretary I would be arguing for as low a grant as possible — Tony Crosland for his part, while reluctantly recognising the need to cut expenditure, feared that the squeeze of a lower grant would simply lead to large rate increases."

We all know who won that argument! The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) was PPS to the Prime Minister at that time, and will no doubt remember how the battle went. Cutbacks in local current expenditure began under Labour; reductions in the percentage of Exchequer grant began under Labour; the system of cash limits on RSG began under Labour. The House will listen with care to see whether the Labour party in Opposition condemns the policies which it followed in office and which it knew to be necessary.

In the 1960s and 1970s, local authority current expenditure was growing in real terms on average at 3·5 per cent. a year. Between 1952 and 1979 the numbers employed by local government had doubled. By 1979 they had reached the all-time record of 2·51 million—11·5 per cent. of the total labour force in local government.

Thanks partly to successive rate support grant settlements since then and thanks, certainly, to better management by many councils, that growth in spending has been reduced to a little below 1 per cent. on average per year. Manpower levels have dropped by over 4 per cent.

It is right to pay tribute to what many councils have achieved in making themselves more efficient. It is also right that the pressure to control spending should be sustained. [Interruption.] I am astonished that the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) should make that comment. Does he really regard local government as a form of outdoor relief, simply to provide jobs to keep unemployment down? Of course he does not, and his party never did.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): The House may not have heard what I said. I said that the Secretary of State was praising local authorities for forcing up unemployment. The Secretary of State must regard local authorities as a form of outdoor relief. I believe that local authorities provide vital services, in many cases to assist those thrown out of work by this Government's policies.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman is trying to deny what he said. Of course, it is the job of local authorities to provide services as efficiently, economically and as effectively as possible. There is no doubt that , thanks to much better management by many councils and the pressure of the rate support grant, many councils are doing just that.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): We have just seen a show of indignation from the Opposition Front Bench. The whole issue has been accompanied by indignation from the Labour party. Is it not worth noting that fewer than a dozen Labour Members are in the Chamber for this important debate.

Mr. Jenkin: That is a fair point.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Jenkin: May I develop my argument?

Mr. Cormack: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. It is important to put on record the fact that not only Labour Members are incensed, because some prudent Conservative-controlled councils with excellent records, such as mine, are suffering deeply as a result of what has happened.

Mr. Jenkin: I have no doubt that my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) will have an opportunity to make his point if he catches your eye, Mr. Speaker. What he says does not detract from the fact that many councils have made strenuous efforts to make themselves more efficient. The gainers are their ratepayers.

Reining back expenditure has benefited domestic ratepayers, householders and businesses. In each of the last five years the average rate increase has fallen, despite annual panic stories from the Opposition. Last year the average rate increase was only 5·5 per cent.—the lowest in 10 years.

Therefore, we have disproved Tony Crosland's fears, as recorded by the noble Lord Barnett, that a falling percentage of Exchequer grant necessarily means steep rate increases. On the contrary, a falling percentage of grant has been accompanied by a fall in the rate of growth of spending and, therefore, by a steadily reducing rate of increase in local rates. A great many authorities have managed to sustain or even improve the level of services by making themselves more efficient. There are still plenty of opportunities for that.

The third supplementary report for 1983-84 adjusts block grant entitlements for that year in the light of the latest information. The second supplementary report for 1984-85 implements grant holdback for Liverpool. The House will remember that its budget came too late for last July's supplementary report. Therefore, it is a necessary adjustment.

The main interest in today's debate lies in the report setting out the settlement for next year, 1985-86. I shall deal separately with its three elements—targets, total grant and distribution of grant between authorities.

The key feature of the settlement is that all authorities budgeting to spend more than 0·75 per cent. below their GREA this year can increase their spending next year by at least 4·5 per cent. without incurring grant penalty. For the lowest spenders—those whose budget this year is at or below target as well as below GREA—the increase is slightly higher—up to 4·625 per cent. over this year's budget.

I can, therefore, claim to have set targets for the low-spending authorities and fulfilled the undertaking that I and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary gave to the House during last year's debate. That has been recognised by many of the councils concerned. Many low-spending authorities have acknowledged that the targets are more favourable than the targets that they have been set previously.

The other side of the coin is a tougher holdback schedule for authorities that spend above their targets. It must be remembered that this year 84 per cent. of all authorities are budgeting to spend within 2 per cent. of their targets. Next year, with the more realistic targets, I hope that that figure will be even higher so that fewer ratepayers will bear the costs of council overspending. Higher current spending means higher rates, which mean lower profits for industry, which means less investment, which means fewer jobs. The connection between those facts is absolutely irrefutable.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Another argument is that lower spending means fewer services and lower levels of service. The right hon. Gentleman said that the low spenders last year will be rewarded by better targets next year. Can he explain—especially to his Conservative colleagues—why the GLC, which he has always accused of being a high spender, has had a 63 per cent. hike in its target for next year over last year? I am sure that his colleagues will be interested in his answer.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman is, of course, seeking to throw dust in the eyes of the House. He is talking about a comparison of target over target. The real comparison, on which authorities have always focused, is based on what their spending is this year, what their budget is this year, what they expect to spend and how much they can increase on that next year. They want to know what is their margin and headroom. The GLC is, indeed, a massive overspender, and I do not expect it to be entitled to any rate support grant—or only a nominal amount—because it is so far in excess of its target. Judging by the cries of woe from county hall, I do not think that many of my hon. Friends will suspect that we are letting off the GLC lightly.

Mr. Michael Hancock (Portsmouth, South): How can the right hon. Gentleman equate what he has just said with the position in Hampshire, which has stuck religiously to the guidelines set by the Government but which will suffer worse than any other county council in England next year, having about 7 per cent. less cash to spend?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the point. Hampshire is one of those authorities which, because it is budgeting this year both below its target and the GRE, falls squarely within our definition of a low spender. It therefore has a target hike above this year's budget that is the highest of any authority—4·652 per cent.

I recognise that a number of low-spending authorities say, "That is all right for this year and we can manage for 1985-86, but we face real difficulties in 1986-87." I appreciate that a number of my hon. Friends are concerned about that. They will understand that I cannot at this stage give detailed figures for individual authorities for 1986-87, though I hope to be able to make a helpful comment.

I repeat what I have said, that I should like to be able to abandon targets and holdback. While it has undoubtedly helped to rein back the growth of local authority current spending, I understand those who argue that, coming on top of the system of block grant and the quite sophisticated system of taper, it makes for complications and difficulties.

Much depends on the level of local authority spending in the coming year and on what alternative pressures there can be to achieve delivery of the Government's public expenditure plans. I am considering this urgently. I can say no more on that today. In what follows, therefore, I am assuming that the target system is to be retained for 1986-87.

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend, not only for what he has said but for what he has done for some shire counties, not least for mine in Wiltshire, in relation to target. Is he aware that those who represent shire counties will support him strongly in his desire to abandon targets in 1986-87 and in the battles that he may have with the Treasury, because if those targets are not abandoned, or at least considerably relaxed, the situation in the shire counties will become impossible? They are managing this year only as the result of balances. They have juggled their finances for years, but next year will be the crunch year and if there is not a major relaxation life will become impossible for them and services will have to be severely cut.

Mr. Jenkin: As to whether we shall have targets, I cannot say more than I have said today. The more favourable targets that I have given low-spending authorities for 1985-86 have been made possible because of the savings achieved from rate capping the high spenders. I made that clear last year. Rate capping will continue to produce savings in the years after next, in 1986-87 and thereafter, as we continue to bring down what we have no difficulty in recognising as the excessive spending levels of authorities selected for rate capping under the Rates Act. I repeat that low-spending authorities will benefit from that rate capping. They will benefit next year and we will want that to happen again in the year following.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): My right hon. Friend has said that he intends to maintain target. Does he accept that in Kent the gap between target and GREA is £37 million? If he is to retain target, the logical extension of that must be to abolish GREA.

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. Friend is aware that GREA is the basis of the distribution of rate support grant. I cannot take my hon. Friend's suggestion at face value, but I recognise the argument that he is advancing.

For authorities that budget in the coming year — 1985-86 — to spend at or below both their target and their GREA, the targets for the following year — 1986-87—will take account of the further savings to be achieved from rate capping the highest spenders. A number of authorities have wanted me to make it clear that this is not a one-off position for this year. Rate capping will continue and that will enable us to continue to pursue the policy that I have been describing.

Sir Ian Gilmour (Chesham and Amersham): I appreciate that my right hon. Friend is trying to help the House. Does he agree that unless the system is changed fundamentally — that does not mean a few adjustments because of rate capping — and the target system is abolished, many shire counties will be in an impossible position? Will he undertake to ensure that the present system is not preserved into next year?

Mr. Jenkin: I understand entirely how my right hon. Friend and others feel. I have made it clear in previous debates, and I do so again today, that the Government are anxious to dispense with the target system as soon as they can. However, I cannot go further than what I have already said this afternoon. We are studying the matter urgently and if it proves possible to dispense with the target system, nothing will give me greater pleasure than to do so. However, I cannot make a commitment to the House about next year.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): If the Secretary of State is saying that he is reconsidering the target system I ask him to make one other suggestion to his Department for its consideration. He will know that there is now a discrepancy in rate-capped authorities between the rate-capped limit and the target limit. Some authorities which spend up to the rate-capped limit will incur penalty because they have spent over target. If he tells the House that he considers that to be inadequate and unsatisfactory, there will be some light at the end of the tunnel for high-spending authorities which are high-need authorities, which presently have an equal if greater cause for complaint than low-spending and low-need authorities. The high-spending and high-need authorities are now facing total darkness.

Mr. Jenkin: The feature to which the hon. Gentleman has drawn the attention of the House was debated exhaustively during our proceedings on the Rates Bill. Had we not maintained the gap between target and the expenditure limit, there would have been great unfairness to other authorities which are close to the level of rate-capping but which are not being capped. They would have suffered an even greater penalty on their spending than capped authorities, and that would have been unfair.

Mr. Norman Atkinson (Tottenham) rose——

Mr. Robert C. Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, North) rose——

Mr. Jenkin: No, I shall not give way. There are many hon. Members who wish to contribute to the debate and I wish to press on with my remarks.

Mr. Atkinson rose——

Mr. Jenkin: No, I shall not give way. I have given way a good deal already. We are not discussing rate capping today. There will be an opportunity to discuss the issue when we place, if we have to, the orders before the House.

If all local authorities had shown responsibility, equal to that of those on behalf of which my right hon. and hon. Friends have been intervening, and if Labour authorities had continued to follow the policy of the Labour party under a Labour Administration there would have been no need to enter into the business of targets and to have imposed some of the measures for which we are criticised by local government.

The picture is startlingly clear in the current year. Total overspend above targets is £850 million, and 75 per cent. of that overspend comes from 12 local authorities, every one of which is Labour-controlled.

I turn from targets to Exchequer grant——

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh) rose——

Mr. Jenkin: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me for not giving way to him. I must press on. As I have said, many hon. Members wish to contribute to the debate.

The total grant figure in the settlement is £11·8 billion. That is about the same in cash terms as that for the current year. As has been said, this represents a lower percentage of next year's planned expenditure. It will be 48·7 per cent. compared with 51·9 per cent. in last year's settlement. We have reduced the grant expenditure percentage in each year since 1979 and on each occasion there have been scare stories, not least from the Opposition Front Bench, of massive rate increases going far beyond anything we have experienced. The fact is that each year the average rate increase has been lower than in the previous year.

Mr. Tony Banks: On average, yes.

Mr. Jenkin: Of course. There will be a variety of rate increases. I am not quarrelling about that. The key point is that cutting the grant percentage adds to the pressure that we put on authorities, as Lord Barnett has said, to find economies in their spending and reduce spending, which leads to lower rate increases.

In the debate on this matter which took place last year, the hon. Member for Copeland said:

> "Most ratepayers would face steep rates increases in the spring as a direct result of the Government's policy". — [Official Report, 23 January 1984; Vol. 52, c. 646.]

We know what happened. The average rate increase was 5½ per cent., which was the lowest for 10 years. It is worth noting that the cut in percentage terms this year is less than the cut of four and a half percentage points which the Labour Government imposed in 1977-78. I hope that on this occasion the hon. Member for Copeland will keep his scaremongering to himself.

I repeat what I have already said to the House. If local authorities budget to meet their targets next year, the average increase at ratepayer level—I stress "average" —should be even lower than this year's 5½ per cent. I stress that that is an average figure. The figures for individual authorities are bound to vary as their grant entitlement changes.

Mr. Peter Hordern (Horsham): I thank my right hon. Friend for showing his invariable courtesy. He has referred to rate support grant. Will he address himself to low-spending authorities such as West Sussex, which he told us last year would receive special attention as low spenders and whose target was considerably below GREA? The same authorities, which he assured would be treated more favourably if they went over target, now find that the penalties for doing so are to be increased substantially. Will he give some assurance to the x j llowest-spending authorities of all — I know of no lower-spending authority than that of West Sussex — which will have inescapably to spend more towards its target to approach what the Government believe is the proper proportion of expenditure that it should incur?

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. Friend knows a great deal about these matters. With respect, I do not think that I can go further on target for the following year than what I have already said. I have said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) and other of my hon. Friends that we intend to continue the process while recognising the position of the very low spenders. I believe that they appreciate that we have done a great deal for them for next year. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] The county of my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Hordern) has had one of the greatest increases in target of 4·625 per cent. That is likly to be ahead of the rate of inflation.

Mr. Charles Irving (Cheltenham) rose——

Mr. Geoffrey Rippon (Hexham) rose——

Mr. Jenkin: When I deal with distribution of grant, I hope to be able to show my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham that we have taken account of the position of the lowest spenders.

Mr. Rippon: My right hon. Friend talks about 1986-87 and he is talking inevitably about national averages. Does he realise that many areas are concerned about 1985-86? There are sparsely populated rural areas in Northumberland which have special problems and such authorities are not susceptible to having their problems dealt with in terms of the national aggregate.

Mr. Jenkin: I know that my right hon. and learned Friend will recognise that Northumberland is a county which could not be described as a low spender. It has not budgeted as economically as it could and, therefore, it would be entirely consistent with what I have said to other of my right hon. and hon. Friends not to give the same target latitude to such counties as that which we have been able to give to the lowest spenders. That was the pledge I gave to the House at this time last year.

I know that the sparseness of population was a matter discussed by the five local authority associations and my officials when refining the grant-related expenditure assessments. It is a question not only of the size of the grant but of its distribution. The 1985-86 settlement incorporates rather bigger changes in GREAs than have been made in recent years. Some arise from the decision by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to pay transport supplementary grant only on capital expenditure on roads and traffic management schemes from next year. As a result, revenue expenditure on highway maintenance and passenger transport support will, in future, be supported through block grant. There are, therefore, entirely new GREAs for those two services. I have introduced new and improved GREAs for the recreation service that takes more account of actual use by visitors and commuters. That point was pressed on the Government by a number of my hon. Friends. I have introduced amended GREAs for housing that reflect more accurately the support given to the housing revenue account from the general rate fund.

Of course, a number of authorities have made it clear to me that they are unhappy about the reduction in their grant entitlements arising from these GREA changes. Although I sympathise with the problems this can cause individual authorities, I must point out that it cannot be right to freeze, for all time, the GREAs in their present form simply because there are bound to be some losers as well as gainers. The changes I have made this year represent real improvements in the fairness of GREAs and, therefore, in the fairness of the system of distribution of block grant.

A further change I have made for 1985-86 is to give more of the available grant to authorities spending at or below GREA. I come now to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham. As with targets, my objective is to recognise the achievements of low spenders. For 1985-86, spending in relation to GREA will be a more important factor in determining grant entitlements. Correspondingly, the marginal costs in terms of the taper of the grant for those authorities that spend above GREA will be higher. This reinforces our policy of targets and of recognising the difficulties faced by low spenders.

Mr. Straw: Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm the figures he has given in parliamentary answers that, if all authorities spent at GREA, many Conservative shires would suffer massive loss of grants? West Sussex would receive no grant at all for this year and Cambridgeshire would suffer a loss of £26 million in grant. Paradoxically, so-called overspending by higher needs authorities is keeping the rates lower in the lower spending authority areas.

Mr. Jenkin: I agree with the figures but not with the hypothesis the hon. Gentleman postulated. A great many authorities find that they can give their communities a perfectly adequate and acceptable level of service and can, through greater efficiency, spend lower than the GREAs. They are to be commended.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland) rose——

Mr. Jenkin: I should like to respond to the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour).

Dr. Cunningham rose——

Mr. Jenkin: I have given way to the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) on the Opposition Front Bench. The hon. Member for Copeland can make his point when he makes his speech. I and many hon. Members on both sides of the House appreciate the fact that the system of local government finance has become increasingly complex. Even the terminology we must use is double-Dutch to most laymen. The important point is that, the more difficult it is for people to understand a system, the harder it is to persuade them that it is fair. I understand that, and that is not the least of the reasons why I asked my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to undertake a series of studies of the whole field of local government finance. Those studies are well under way. Rate support grant settlements in England distribute almost £12 billion of Exchequer cash in support of £24 billion of local authority expenditure by more than 400 very different local authorities. Simplification is always an important objective, but so is equity. We must remember that fact.

This year, 84 per cent. of authorities are spending at or close to their targets. They include authorities of all categories and all political colours. They have managed to do so without what is sometimes described as catastrophic service cuts. Targets for next year are more favourable for most authorities than they were this year. Doubtless, we shall again be told of the services that must be slashed, but all the evidence suggests that that is nothing but wild exaggeration. The point is that the targets we have set are realistic.

Another point I should like to make clear concerns the equity between responsible authorities, which have made efforts to find economies and the minority which have not. This is an important aspect that has been pressed on the Government year after year by my hon. Friends.

Mr. Robert C. Brown rose——

Mr. Jenkin: I am coming to the end of my speech, so I shall not give way.

Three quarters of this year's overspend comes from just 12 local authorities, all of them Labour-controlled. We are now leaving behind the days when the responsible low-spending majority of authorities had to be asked to find substantial economies to compensate for the massive overspends of the irresponsible minority. We deliberately introduced rate capping to escape from that position. Selection of 18 authorities for rate capping next year should mean that actual expenditure will be £400 million lower than it would have been if the authorities had continued on their Rake's Progress of squandering as they have done in recent years. For 1985-86, I have used those savings to secure more favourable targets than ever before for low-spending authorities, and I proposed to continue to use them to help low spenders in 1986-87.

It is now for each local authority to make its budget and rating decision. This settlement sets the framework so that, if local authorities budget reasonably, they can continue to provide a reasonable level of services while protecting their ratepayers against excessive rate increases. I commend the report to the House.

4.17 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): The Secretary of State in his opening comments tried to suggest that his policy was simply a continuation of the policies pursued by the last Government. I reject that suggestion as fundamentally dishonest. When the last Labour Government left office, they were providing 61 per cent. of council current expenditure by way of rate support grant. The Labour Government had no targets, no penalties and no individual controls over local councils, and they had no punitive Rates Act to undermine the local democratic process.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West)rose——

Dr. Cunningham: I shall not give way. I have just begun my speech.

This is the sixth annual report on the rate support grant introduced by the Conservative Government since taking office in 1979. Each year, the most significant feature has been the reduction in grant percentage paid by central Government to local councils. In 1979-80, the Labour Government provided cash to finance 61 per cent. of current council expenditure at a time when there was much lower unemployment, a much better social climate and much better circumstances than the appalling conditions that prevail today.

The report proposes to reduce cash support to councils for the sixth consecutive year to only 48·7 per cent. of their expenditure. The proposed reduction for 1985-86 amounts to £775 million compared with the fiscal year 1984-85.

Dr. Hampson rose——

Dr. Cunningham: I am not giving way.

The curious and deliberate thing about the Secretary of State's speech was that he talked about targets for almost all of it. He never mentioned the reduction in grant and its impact on authorities, nor did he say that it was likely to cause problems, hardship or difficulties for the local authorities involved.

Dr. Hampson rose——

Dr. Cunningham: I am not giving way.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have heard the hon. Gentleman say on three occasions that he is not giving way. Many hon. Members wish to speak, and all interventions take up time.

Dr. Cunningham: The hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) stood up to intervene within the first minute of my speech. I should tell him that my record on giving way is much better than the Secretary of State's. I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman when I have finished the introductory part of my speech. I have not yet gone beyond the first page.

The Secretary of State's persistent and deliberate policy of making significant annual reductions in the cash support for local councils is the root cause of all the problems that the Secretary of State's hon. Friend's have been quoting to him today. It causes unemployment, undermines the quality of community and public services, such as education, transport, meals on wheels, concessionary fares, and help for elderly and disabled people and for families who are suffering deprivation. That is the real impact of his policy and that impact will be continued as a result of his report.

Dr. Hampson: I rose immediately because the issue of whether the percentage rises or falls is at the heart of the hon. Gentleman's case. The Labour Government immediately raised it from 60·5 per cent. to 66·5 per cent. They found that that was unsatisfactory and reduced it progressively to the 61·5 per cent. about which he is now boasting. Even before that, during the Wilson Government, it was as low as 54 per cent. They have had it all ways. The hon. Gentleman should know better than to argue as he has.

Dr. Cunningham: My first response to the hon. Gentleman is that he is talking about two different systems. My second response is that in each year of the previous Labour Government, the percentage paid by that Government was higher than it has been in any one year of this Administration. That is the fundamental difference.

Ratepayers will again face increases in the coming year —there is no point in trying to disguise that—because the persistent and deliberate reduction in grant is the biggest factor and the most important reason why average domestic rates—that is what the right hon. Gentleman and his predecessors have talked about—have more than doubled since 1979. Average domestic rates have increased by 108 per cent. since the Conservative Government came to office.

Those burdens are a direct result of the Prime Minister's policies. It is significant, although not surprising, that she never attends these debates. She is never present to support the right hon. Gentleman, even in his most difficult times —and there have been many of those—because she has comprehensively betrayed the ratepayers by doubling rates and ratting on her promise, twice made, to abolish domestic rates.

Like young people who were promised work and real jobs by the Prime Minister — perhaps the biggest and most cynical betrayal of all — ratepayers will never forget the Prime Minister's promise to them, which was repeated in two general elections, that she would relieve them of the burden of domestic rates. After six years, she has succeeded in more than doubling rates, and the increase will continue.

In addition to the reduction in cash support for councils and ratepayers, the most important features of the report are the harsher financial penalties for councils which used their own money to uphold the quality of their services and to protect their communities; changes again in the principles used to construct the Whitehall-imposed targets for the fifth successive year; inadequate application of the Secretary of State's use of disregards; and the persistent and continued use of data which even the Audit Commission—the right hon. Gentleman's own creation —has described as open to serious question.

It is important to examine those matters in detail and, not least, to contrast their impact with the promises made to local government by the Secretary of State and his predecessors. The way in which councils' spending targets have been constructed by the Government means that 85 per cent. of the metropolitan councils will be required to make real cuts in expenditure.

Many of the areas with the greatest social need are again being asked to make the biggest cuts and to carry the heaviest burden. The Secretary of State, in paragraph 7 on page 4 of his report, when talking of expenditure provision, claims:

"This should enable the Government's policies for individual services to be broadly maintained."

At best, that is an ambiguous statement. At worst, it is dishonest. Government policy is to reduce cash support for councils.

The two supplementary reports for 1983-84 and 1984-85, which are before the House, remove yet more grants from local councils through the operation of an increasingly punitive penalty system based upon arbitrary spending targets. For 1983-84 another £281 million passes to the Treasury. That is more than in the previous supplementary report. For 1984-85, the Treasury's windfall is £455 million—an increase of £3 million on the supplementary report approved in July 1984.

How can councils maintain their services in the face of persistent cuts in the real value of Government grant? They can do it by spending more of their own money raised from the rates, by increasing rates to increase their revenue, or, as the Secretary of State suggested, by trying to improve their own efficiency.

Demands on council services are increasing because of the appalling social and economic consequences of the Government's policy. As the House is aware, millions more people today face hardship, deprivation and poverty compared with 1979. No improvement in the management of services could hope to offset the combined effects of major increases in demand and the cumulative withdrawal by the Government of more than £12 billion in real terms from council finances since 1979.

The Secretary of State seeks to impose his ceiling on every council budget as his authoritarian attitudes expand and engulf all aspects of policy. He reduces grants; imposes more drastic fines and penalties on councils which spend above his arbitrary Whitehall view of their necessary expenditure; and controls their rates. The outcome of that cannot be the maintenance of services. He does it regardless of the councils' performance or efficiency.

I give two examples to illustrate that point — one Labour, one Conservative. For three years the Stevenage council held the rate level. Last year it was reduced by 7·2 per cent. Despite that performance, the council now faces a loss of over £500,000 in grant because of changes in the methodology of calculating its entitlement. That council is spending at target. It is not profligate. It has not forced up rates year after year.

Sevenoaks district council is Conservative-controlled. The leader, Councillor Garner, has written to the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson), and sent a copy of his letter to every member of the council, including Labour members. He said:

"We have just received notification from the Department of the Environment that our block grant is to be reduced this year from £2,054,000 to £1,674,000 . . . a staggering reduction of 18·5 per cent. This means we will be forced to increase our rates by almost 20 per cent. next year, an increase which is entirely caused by central Government decisions."

He goes on:

"Mr. Jenkins is reported as projecting average rate rise 'in low single figures'. Against such statements, how are we expected to explain to our ratepayers that their rate increase of 20 per cent. is entirely due to the capricious decisions of Mr. Jenkins' own department?"

He adds a postscript to his letter:

"Mark—we have had enough!"

That is the comment of the Tory leader of Sevenoaks district council, and that is increasingly widely recognised by council leaders of all persuasions up and down the country.

The scope and quality of public services are undermined, provision is cut, redundancies occur, and vacancies are not filled. Those are, in reality, the aims of Government policy. In consequence, our towns, cities and boroughs begin to suffer neglect. Transport is threatened in rural areas. Education — surely a country's best investment — is undermined. The Government are increasingly enforcing a run-down, often second-class and inadequate public provision by their inadequate and increasingly incompetent administration of local government, and Conservative Ministers are determined to impose their view, regardless of the wishes of local communities as expressed in local council elections.

Councils trying to resist and to respond to the legitimate wishes and aspirations of the people who elect them are not only penalised but often subjected to petty abuse and vilification. Elected councillors are increasingly and knowingly prevented from meeting their statutory obligations and duties by this Conservative Administration. That is true of a wide range of services, such as housing, planning, building control, public health, education, and provision for disadvantaged people. But a blind eye is turned to all those services by Ministers and their supporters in the House. Meanwhile, Ministers abuse their powers and act unlawfully.

Recently, the Secretary of State for Transport deliberately and unlawfully robbed the Greater London council of more than £50 million. Is he to be surcharged? Is he to be removed from office? The Secretary of State for the Environment does not have a very good record either in that respect, because he ignored his duties in respect of the GLC development plan. When the courts found against him, he ignored them, too, and changed the law. He is currently hiding behind the dubious interpretation of the Rates Act to disguise from the House his use of its powers to fix budgets for councils which he has quite deliberately "fitted up" to suit his own political purposes. It is squalid behaviour on the Secretary of State's part that he does not tell the House about his assumptions in the application of a highly contentious and fundamentally important Act of Parliament.

The Secretary of State's claim that the Rates Act is designed to protect ratepayers had a very hollow ring when contrasted with his proposal today to reduce by £775 million the support that the Government are providing to them. His argument that rates increases would be in single figures ignores the real impact of what he is doing and is contradicted by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Association of District Councils and the Association of County Councils, all of which condemn the report. The Secretary of State also misleads when he pretends that rates can be held down without serious consequences for jobs and services.

The effect of trebling penalties is punitive in the extreme. For spending of just 1 per cent. above an arbitrary and imposed ceiling, councils will be clobbered. Currently, 110 authorities spend at just 2 per cent. over target, and altogether 138 authorities—about one third of all councils — are being penalised because they choose not to accept a Whitehall-imposed ceiling on their budgets. Ironically, the savage increase in penalties, as the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Hordern) pointed out, will affect low spending councils worst of all. In addition, those extreme penalties on councils further blur local accountability by placing elected councillors in the invidious position of determining policies not by assessing local needs and desires, but by reference to the punitive extra cost enforced by central Government.

The dubious use by the Government of grant-related expenditure plumbed even new depths when Ministers' manoeuvring over council housing finance, using the so-called "E7 factor", came to light as a result of a leaked document a few months ago. Those calculations are crucially important for many housing authorities. In the leaked document last September, the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young), described his own civil servants' study of the issue as "political dynamite", because it showed that the Department had been unfair to several authorities. A cover-up then followed, and the full picture was never revealed, either to the local authority associations or to the House of Commons.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin rose——

Dr. Cunningham: I shall give way to the right hon. Gentleman, although today, as on the last occasion that he spoke, he refused to give way to me.

Mr. Jenkin: I absolutely refute the hon. Gentleman's charge that there was a cover-up. On the contrary, the documents were circulated widely to the local authority associations. The hon. Gentleman tries to pretend that some copies of the document were leaked. They were to be found in the offices of every local authority association in England. The hon. Gentleman's comment is a damp squib. The authorities welcomed the changes in GRE that we have introduced. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that we should not have studied that reaction?

Dr. Cunningham: I question what the right hon. Gentleman has just said to the House, because copies of the leaked document were not available in that form to local authorities; nor were the written comments of the right hon. Gentleman's junior Minister, describing the document as "political dynamite", available to the local authority associations.

The point is worth developing a little further. In 1984-85, Hackney borough, the most deprived borough in England, was allocated £11·4 million by the use of the E7 factor. The leaked document said that Hackney should have received £20 million. When the local authorities were finally consulted, that figure had become £16 million. Following further discussion, Hackney was allocated £7 million for 1985-86, but the council has finally ended up with £13 million.

Ministers continue to pretend that GRE is an objective and unbiased test of needs — a claim that is totally belied by the events that I have just described. They illustrate all the symptoms of political chicanery and political dishonesty at their worst. But it is on the basis of Government manipulation of those allegedly fair calculations that the iniquitous Rates Act is applied to override local democracy and accountability.

The report, and Government policy underpinning it, stands condemned by all national local authority associations. The Tory-controlled Association of County Councils has been bitterly critical of the report because of its impact on the shire counties. A few weeks ago—this was repeated to me in a letter that I received on Christmas Eve and mentioned again today—the Secretary of State said that the settlement shows that > "I am, thanks to our rate limitation policies, now in a position to stop asking prudent authorities for real terms cuts to counter the excesses of the high spenders."

The fact is that 65 out of 77 metropolitan authorities, 11 out of 39 shire counties and 113 out of 296 district councils face real terms cuts in their grant as a result of the right hon. Gentleman's policies. He has consistently promised help to his shire county friends and said that the report fulfils his pledges and those given by the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave). In reality, 38 out of 39 shire counties have spending ceilings below their GRE — below what the Government say is our objective test of what they should spend. That is a worse situation than in the current financial year. Things will be worse next year than this year. Sixteen shire counties suffer grant loss even if they spend at target as a result of the report. Essex will lose £19 million, Hampshire £15·5 million, Surrey £15·7 million, Hertfordshire £14 million and Berkshire, the very shire county that the Secretary of State chose to speak about in his statement in December—what we might call the Berkshire factor—will lose £10·4 million in grant if it spends at target next year. Oxfordshire will lose £10 million.

In his statement on 11 December, the Secretary of State mentioned Berkshire as an example of a county given favourable treatment. Now we know the result—a loss of grant of over £10 million next year for spending at target. The reality is that, in exchange for a minuscule increase in a target that is arbitrary anyway, a massive loss of cash results. As the ACC says, the 10 shires that benefit from the additional 0·125 per cent. increase in targets are allowed, in total, to spend an extra £2·7 million of their own money between them on total targets of £2·42 billion. That is a measure of the right hon. Gentleman's generous help to his friends. As a consequence of his decision, those same authorities will lose cash grant of £46 million in the process. That is how the Secretary of State has helped the shire counties. That is the true nature of the right hon. Gentleman's help, if it can be called that, to the shires; and it remains the case that lower spending authorities receive lower than average target increases in the report.

If in 1985-86 shire counties spend at their GRE, they will lose £1·5 billion in grant penalties under the present system. The right hon. Gentleman hinted at getting rid of targets and replacing them with GRE. That would be worse for the shire counties than the present situation, because they would catastrophically lose grant. That is a measure of the ferocity of the Government's policies.

The ACC and the Association of District Councils confirm, as has the Secretary of State for Education and Science, that the Rates Act, far from benefiting the shires, has greatly restricted their share of the total available increase in targets and their receipt of grant. The Rates Act does not help the shire counties—quite the reverse.

The ACC calls on the Government to recognise that Government policy has resulted directly in the equivalent of a 38p national rate increase since 1980-81 before any excess spending is allowed for. The ACC believes, as we do, that those policies lead to instability, incomprehension and a further loss of local accountability.

It is worth referring to some of the comments by shire county leaders in the Tory party. Councillor Roger Parker Jervis, for one, wrote to The Times and said:

"Right across the country prudent Conservative councillors know their targets are unrealisable and ridiculous, and that to spend above them is inevitable if local services are not to break down or become the subject of derision. Thus penalties will, as in Buckinghamshire, increasingly fall heavily on the same hapless ratepayers for whom the Government claims to stand champion.

I am not willing to countenance such injustice."

The Tory leader of Oxfordshire, Councillor Eric Bond, predicted

"a steep rate rise in the county next year".

Mr. Bond has called for a meeting with the Secretary of State to discuss the implications of the report. He made it clear that "Oxfordshire councillors had been stung be Mr. Jenkin's claim on Tuesday that 'our undertakings to the shires have been met to the letter'".

Going on to discuss the implications of the report, Councillor Bond said:

"This contradicts Mr. Jenkin's claim that people will be delighted with the Government's attempts to control rates."

The Conservative leader of Oxford city council, Councillor Janet Todd, said:

"Councillors are being made whipping boys for the defects of the rating system."

Even the chief constable of South Yorkshire, Mr. Peter Wright, has said that his police authority is caught in a vice between the Home Office and the Department of the Environment. One report says:

"The Home Office always said that extra resources must be found from existing manpower and finance, said Mr. Wright. 'That is one side of the vice, and the other is provided by the Department of the Environment . . . Having gone through a recent budget trimming exercise, I know that any further cuts mean losses in manpower'."

That is the sort of thing that is being said about the rate support grant. I learnt today that even the Tories in Bradford are seeking legal advice about the implications of the report for them and their authority.

The Audit Commission, set up by the Conservative Government, has produced a damning indictment of Government policy towards local government finance. The report contains fundamental contradictions of all that the Secretary of State has been saying about the effect of Government policies on local councils. It demonstrates the futility of those policies. It demonstrates the futility of Government claims to be improving the efficiency of local government, with their systems of penalties and Whitehall interference. The Audit Commission's report makes it clear that rates in England are now higher than they would otherwise have needed to be, as a direct result of Government policy. The commission estimates that rates over the past three years have been higher than they need to be by some £1,200 million. Government-imposed targets are also shown to be confusing and based on inaccurate and inadequate information about the situation in our towns, cities and counties. Whitehall interference has undermined local accountability and management, and confused ratepayers.

That is what the Audit Commission says. Its report not only vindicates and substantially underlines what the Labour party and I have been saying about the ineptitude of Government policy, but makes it clear that Government policy is creating an appalling situation and making difficulties for local councils very much worse. That view is shared by every major local authority association, many professional bodies, the trade unions and the academic world.

Mr. Robert C. Brown: Does my hon. Friend agree that the policies of the Government are multiplying the problems in the inner cities? Does he agree that councils, such as Newcastle city council, have to spend more money on the problems of the inner cities, but the more inner city partnership money they spend, the nearer they are brought to being rate-capped? Is that not a monstrous injustice to the inner cities?

Dr. Cunningham: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. The reality is that the Government are in the ridiculous position of giving extra resources to partnership authorities with one hand and taking those resources away from them with the other.

The Secretary of State used to speak favourably about the Audit Commission. At a conference in Wembley last year, he said:

[Dr. Cunningham]

"The Audit Commission has provided councillors with a powerful new weapon in their fight to keep costs down and so keep their rates down."

He went on to say that it would help them to improve their efficiency. However, when the first major report of the Audit Commission on the Government's own system of local government finance was published, the right hon. Gentleman changed his tune. He said:

"The Government's immediate reaction to this Report is that whilst most of its recommendations seem reasonable, they are based on a number of wrong-headed arguments."

The Secretary of State is the only person who believes that to be the case.

The Secretary of State ignores all criticism, advice and evidence, and staggers on into the quagmire of his own creation. Promises and undertakings are cynically cast aside and all the arguments in favour of good local government and better and more efficient public services go unanswered. They are cast aside — throughout my speech the right hon. Gentleman has made a series of running sedentary interventions—rather in the way that the Under-Secretary was cast aside after his performance on the Rates Act in the House and in Committee. The behaviour of the right hon. Gentleman has been very nasty, if he does not mind me saying so.

Government policy is inconsistent, incoherent, incomprehensible and incompetent. In these matters—local services, education, housing, social services, transport — there is worse to come from this most criticised of Governments.

In these matters, too, the gulf between the Labour party view and Tory policies is vast and increasing. We are concerned to enhance local democracy. This Government destroy it. We are committed to better quality public services. This Government undermine them.

We condemn the report as mean, vindictive, biased and incompetent. It is typical of the gerrymander philosophy that the Government have expressed throughout their local government policy. I urge the House to reject it.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): There can be no doubt that the system of holdback, targets and block grant based on grant-related expenditure and grant-related poundage is one of the most miserable inheritances that any Secretary of State has ever had the ill fortune to receive. It has now reached a degree of complexity, as my right hon. Friend conceded today, which compares with the way in which the administration of the Austro-Hungarian empire was conducted, when it was said, hon. Members will remember, that items were put in an endless series of pigeon holes and never recovered. It is in fact a machine without direction. I share the hope of my right hon. Friend that it should go as soon as may be and, indeed, the wish of others of my right hon. Friends that it should go as soon as possible.

I was never, I concede, a fan of the great complexity involved in the system and I must confess to my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench that I am not totally uninfluenced in my renewed views about this by the fact that the borough of Guildford has received news of a 73 per cent. cut in its grant in 1985-86. This tends slightly to colour my views. I understand that this is called "a search for overall fairness", but it is a little difficult to see exactly how that fairness works out. There is also the difficulty that this news has been received two months before the rate is made by the borough. I know it has been a continual difficulty over the years that the basic arithmetic on which local authorities, both district councils and county councils, have to plan tends to get dumped on them impossibly close to their major decisions on planning their expenditures on services and, indeed, their longer-term projects.

This brings me to the substantial point that I wish to make, and which I think my right hon. Friends have already accepted—namely, that we simply must handle these issues in future in a more strategic, systematic and long-term way to make any kind of sensible economising and to make the drive for higher efficiency sustained and sustainable.

It is perfectly true—this must fairly be conceded to my right hon. Friend — that his undertaking that the target situation for the low-spending authorities will be improved has been met. If I may refer again without apology to my own borough of Guildford, the target of what it may spend of money raised in one way or another has substantially increased. For the coming year, I think that it is something approaching 6 per cent. However, what has not increased, but, as I have already said, gone dramatically the other way, is the grant. It has been cut by 73 per cent., and that announcement reached the borough council about which I am speaking two months before it has to make a rate.

I say to my right hon. Friend — here I depart strongly from the histrionics that we have heard from the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and the general view of the Labour party—that I am not against a strategy of reducing the central Government taxpayer support for local government spending. I think that that is a worthy strategy. I can never really understand the modern Labour party's view that more and more taxes should be taken from often very low income taxpayers and families in straitened circumstances to finance substantial expenditure by local authorities, which does not necessarily go the poorest people of all. This is a sort of mad redistribution in reverse of the kind that only the unthinking group of people which the Labour party today is comprised of, could possibly espouse. If it is to be the pattern—I believe that it is right—that we reduce the grant support element to local authorities over the years, it must be done in line with a strategy. It is virtually impossible if it is done by the sort of hiccups and sudden moves that have been operated in recent years.

Why has this difficulty arisen? Again the mechanics are obvious. Each year a terrific fight takes place in Whitehall, and people are so exhausted by the settlement this year that it is in the interests of no party to go on and try to work out a settlement for next year. The Treasury does not want to settle it because it hopes that it might get a still tougher settlement, and the spending and sponsoring departments, the local authorities, do not want to come immediately to a conclusion because they hope, always with fingers crossed, that there will be some better prospects for next year.

Thus, there is no strategy and no one has been able to say over the years to the local authorities—particularly those which seek to economise and co-operate and to be, in the words used by the Minister for Local Government to describe Guildford borough council — a model authority — over three, four, or five years the grant element will be reduced by so much and you can plan accordingly." Therefore, they have not been able to plan and have been thrown into these great difficulties.

Behind this lies a much bigger question, of which my hon. and right hon. Friends on the Front Bench are well aware. There is no strategy for reducing grant year on year, because there is no strategy yet established of what that grant should be for, what the source of finances should be for local authority functions, and, indeed, what the pattern of local authority functions itself should be.

The Committees and groups that have been formed by the Department of the Environment will have to address themselves to that aspect and make some radical decisions if, as I passionately believe, the amount of taxpayers' money going from central Government to local authorities is to be radically reduced and the independence of local authorities increased in the way that I and many Conservatives wish. If that is the aim, we need a major re-examination of the vast range of functions now financed by local government and inevitably requiring huge injections of central Government funds.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): The hon. Gentleman's generalisations seem to ignore the fact that ratepayers are also taxpayers, and vice versa. Moreover, he seems to assume that all taxpayers are poor and all ratepayers are rich. In my area the reverse is usually the case.

Mr. Howell: I am making no such assumption. I am simply seeking greater independence for local authorities. I am sure that the whole House will agree that a great deal of the difficulty and bad blood under successive Governments has arisen because of the transfer of taxpayers' money from central Government through the processes of local government into a certain range of functions. I do not expect this to be generally agreed, as I do not believe that public policy makers have yet thought the matter through, but I believe that we shall have to face the question of the largest consumer of local government funds handled through local authorities—education. If teachers' salaries were centrally funded, we might at last begin to move towards the stage at which rate support grant was no longer needed — except for a certain equalisation across the country, the admitted complexities of which are as nothing compared with the vast difficulties and visible injustices of the present system.

The difficulty for Ministers at present is that they are under pressure from the Treasury to reduce the rate support grant each year — from 51 to 48 per cent. and so on down — but the reallocation of functions which would allow a really radical reduction is not yet in place. That vital part of the strategy is not yet established because the breakthrough in thinking has not yet occurred to enable major reform of the range of functions that local authorities are allowed to conduct. When that takes place we shall begin to return to the independence of local government, with local activities financed from the rates, with a certain amount of equalisation grant for areas in greatest need, which was always the intention in earlier days and from which we have departed.

Until that basic difficulty is solved we shall remain in the quagmire of complexities in which Ministers currently have to struggle amid great difficulties, making very little progress and facing a storm of criticism at every turn. The latest attempt to achieve the "overall fairness" to which I rather cynically referred earlier takes the form of a new type of grant-related expenditure calculation, with some very bizarre elements.

A great deal of this seems to relate to the amount of money that local authorities are allowed to spend on leisure facilities. If I have this wrong, I hope that I shall be corrected, and I shall value any comment on this aspect. The new arrangements appear to mean that the greater the charges imposed by local authorities for entry to leisure facilities such as parks and swimming pools, the less grant they will receive, but the less grant they receive, the more they will of course have to charge for entry to those facilities. That merely adds to the great complexities already inherent in the system.

I shall not detain the House further on that aspect, as I believe that we have now all realised that that is the fundamental problem. Until we get the question of functions straight, we shall not get the finances straight.

There is, however, an additional factor, which we debated before Christmas — what local authorities are allowed to do with capital receipts. Here, too, much more fundamental reforms are required. In this context, the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), who is not in the Chamber, in one of his fascinating speeches suggested that the Government were wrong to seek to control expenditure of capital receipts, which belonged not to the authorities but to the ratepayers—it is easy to fall into collectivist language and imply that the institutions own the funds—but should instead examine the control and administration of local authority borrowing. He went on to say, amid cheers from the Opposition—erroneous, in my view, as I do not believe that they fully understood the right hon. Gentleman's point — that if local authorities had full control of their capital receipts, but had to raise loans on their own security rather than on the credit and security of central Government, that would be a logical and rational approach to increase the independence of local government.

I do not think that I have distorted the right hon. Gentleman's point. I am sure that many of the authorities now moaning for more access to capital receipts to supplement their budgets do not for one moment envisage having to raise loans and borrow on their own security, and many of them would have great difficulty in doing so.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I, too, heard the comments of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), but I do not entirely follow the point that my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) is making. It is important to put it on record that local authority borrowing is not guaranteed by the Government. I think that that has become more widely known in recent months as some authorities faced with rate-capping have threatened not to pay their debts. That being so, I am not sure that the right hon. Gentleman's point had quite the force that my right hon. Friend suggests.

Mr. Howell: I am interested to know that. If local authorities borrow on their own security and not on that of central Government, that is a desirable state of affairs which should lead to greater independence of local authorities without their activities constantly undermining the Government's economic and financial strategy, which has been a constant difficulty in the past. The question of capital receipts is very much part of the jigsaw and requires further reforms and improvements.

[Mr. Howell]

I end this somewhat one-tracked contribution by repeating what I said at the beginning. We shall have no peace, no clear basis and no feeling of fairness among local authorities, even the low spenders, until we have clearly established what their functions should be and how the rate support grant can fairly be reduced in line with the reduction in the functions on which local authorities are required to spend money.

5.8 pm

Mr. Norman Atkinson (Tottenham): I wish to comment briefly on some of the conclusions reached by the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell). The policy of non-payment of debt to which he referred was reached collectively by the authorities concerned when they were thinking of pursuing a policy of non-compliance with the Government's wishes. That has now changed considerably. No doubt, as the debate develops, we shall hear what is the current position on how those authorities can best seek to defend their services and employment responsibilities.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Guildford that the whole miserable system should go and I believe that majority opinion favours that. The curious thing is that the Government have lived with it for five years. Despite their constant references to the inherent injustice of the system, they have merely added to the injustice and are now making it even worse. As the right hon. Gentleman said, the Government's proposals are bizarre—even when one considers the major influences that have driven the Secretary of State to make his decisions and to reduce the aggregates in the way that he has done.

Someone receiving a meal from the meals-on-wheels service would find it incomprehensible if he were told by the person delivering the meal that the reason for his saying, "I am sorry, love, but there is no meat today," was that to all intents and purposes, Britain now had an oil economy and an oil currency, that there had been a row in the Gulf, or a run on the pound, and that the interest rates were worrying the Treasury. Decisions about the quality of local authority services are dictated by external events in no way related to this country's attempts to maintain a welfare system which recognises the priorities to which Conservative Members continually refer.

I want to consider the difficulties created for the London borough of Haringey by Government policy, and the difficulties with which it will have to contend in attempting to protect the local people. The Secretary of State has now taken on the role of sequestrator. Philosophically, he is using the same methods and mechanism as the sequestrators who are tackling the trade unions. In relation to authorities such as Haringey, his functions seem to be identical to theirs.

The right hon. Gentleman was once a member of the borough council of a constituent part of Haringey, and was at one time, I believe, the chairman of finance.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Housing.

Mr. Atkinson: I thought that the right hon. Gentleman had been the guru in charge of Hornsey finance. The right hon. Gentleman is familiar with some of the problems of the borough, and I am amazed that he can gloss over so easily the difficulties that now beset Haringey as a normal London borough.

First, there is the formula which the right hon. Gentleman has used in setting targets and in deciding the amount of grant. We hear constant references to the local authorities' spending ceilings and general expenditure limits. As I understand it, the right hon. Gentleman will not legally enforce any expenditure limit except for the purpose of imposing penalties. If a local authority wishes to spend above its target, or above the spending ceiling to which the Department refers, the right hon. Gentleman will not prevent it from doing so as long as the money is not drawn from rate revenue. If the money is found from other resources controlled by the authority—from any savings which the authority may have made—it may use such resources to enable it to spend more than its ceiling in order to maintain services. I take it that the right hon. Gentleman's silence means that I am right and that there is no such thing as a legal ceiling on local authority expenditure.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: What the hon. Gentleman says is broadly correct. The expenditure level of which we gave notice last July was intended to make clear the basis of the rate limit that I announced in December. It is the rate limit which the House will shortly be invited to confirm, and which will be the legal limit. If Haringey or any other authority has other funds tucked away which it wishes to spend in order to maintain a higher level of spending, it will be free to do so. That will be its choice. The rate limit is designed to potect the ratepayers. It is an upper limit on the amount that an authority can raise from the ratepayers.

Mr. Atkinson: That is a most important statement. It clarifies the Minister's thinking. He is concerned about extracting more penalties out of savings, as he will do if the authorities exceed their ceilings. The penalties inflicted under the present ceiling arrangement will increase the right hon. Gentleman's revenue.

Haringey now has no savings and depends entirely upon the money that it receives from rate revenue. In fixing the maximum amount to be collected in rates the Secretary of State ignores the fact the last year Haringey spent the money that it saved. In rate-capping Haringey at a certain level, the Secretary of State has ignored totally the fact that Haringey had to spend all its savings last year in order to stand still. That has created serious problems for the authority.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: This is an important point. If Haringey believes that because we have not taken account of the state of the borough's reserves the rate limit that we have set requires of it greater savings than we have estimated, the legislation provides the remedy. However, the borough must get a move on, because I shall very soon have to confirm the limit and lay the order. The borough has a remedy. It may ask for the limit to be raised. I have said so again and again. If it refuses to do so, it must be satisfied with the limit that I fix.

Mr. Atkinson: It is not too late for all the rate-capped authorities to talk to the Secretary of State about such problems.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Where are they?

Mr. Atkinson: There is every chance that they are on their way to talk to the right hon. Gentleman about their problems. The implied unemployment is now becoming a real factor, as is the unfairness that arises where there is a difference of millions of pounds between the savings of one authority and those of another.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the statement that he made on 24 July. He has also said that there would be only a minimum reduction on the amount that Haringey was to be allowed to collect via the rates. But that is not so. According to the right hon. Gentleman's figures, Haringey must cut its expenditure by nearly 14 per cent., rather than the 3·5 per cent. which the right hon. Gentleman mentioned on 24 July and subsequently. Because, last year, in order to maintain its services and its employment levels, Haringey had to dip into its savings and clear out the cupboard, the borough is now being heavily penalised by the massive reduction being imposed by the Minister. This is an astounding situation and is contrary to everything that the right hon. Gentleman has said.

According to the figures now produced by the right hon. Gentleman, Haringey will receive a total grant of £20·8 million. That is an amazing reduction from 1979-80, when the Government funded 56 per cent. of total expenditure in the borough. The grant has been reduced from 56 per cent. of permitted expenditure to 14 per cent. of budgeted expenditure for next year. The Secretary of State is suggesting that Haringey should restrict its expenditure to £128 million next year, but Haringey says that merely to provide the same services as were provided last year it will need £148 million.

Of the £148 million, the grant is worth only £20·8 million. That is an astounding reduction. It is not a wild exaggeration to say that that is punitive for the people whom Haringey is trying to protect — the most vulnerable. It is one of the most heavily populated areas of London and suffers some of the most severe social deprivation. We have 16 per cent. unemployment—the level is still higher at my end of the borough. Nevertheless, the Government are insisting on reductions in Haringey's expenditure. That will result in massive job losses in the authority. The Government's figures suggest that between 2,100 and 2,300 employees will have to leave.

The block grant system is also grossly unfair because the formula for grant-related expenditure means that there is a maximum variation of only 4·5 per cent. between good and bad authorities in terms of social conditions, not expenditure. That is astounding. Haringey is dealt with exactly like Doncaster and Wakefield, although the unit cost of providing services in such Yorkshire authorities is far lower than in Haringey—far less than 4·5 per cent. The figures that the House is considering show that the differences that affect allocations are insufficiently taken into account.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): I have listened to the hon. Gentleman's argument carefully. What is the population of the London borough of Haringey?

Mr. Atkinson: It is 201,000. Although I understand that the number has come down recently, it is comparable with the areas to which I have referred. The variants that are built into the numbers are insufficient.

Mr. Pavitt: Much of what my hon. Friend has said applies to the London borough of Brent, which has a population of 250,000. Ethnic changes have had a substantial impact. Half of the population being from ethnic minorities requires many differences in rate support considerations to enable us to have a multiracial community. Does he agree that such considerations seem to be missing from the documents before us?

Mr. Atkinson: My hon. Friend is right. The problem is not that the differences are not recognised, but that the variants are insufficient to take account of those social differences.

We should register our dissatisfaction, from a London point of view, with a system that does not take care of our needs. Government grant represents just 14 per cent. of Haringey's budgeted expenditure. Haringey has mandatory commitments involving between £58 million and £61 million. The Secretary of State might shake his head and say that that is irrelevant, but it is an important consideration. When total Government grant is only £20 million and mandatory commitments involve about £60 million, it is clear that if we are to achieve the savings on which the Secretary of State insists—from £148 million to £128 million — the majority must come from job losses. The Secretary of State is coolly telling the House that the great bulk of the savings will come from pushing people on to the dole queue. That does not seem to worry him. No doubt he thinks that some other Secretary of State for the Environment will pick up the tab and that, in the meantime, such savings will solve his problem. The social consequences of such action are enormous in areas such as mine. That part of the argument seems to have been glossed over.

There are many ways in which savings can be made. I do not claim that everything that the public sector does is the epitome of efficiency. There are many criticisms —we all know what they are—but most local authority money is spent sensibly. All of those whom local authorities employ are accountable and contribute to social welfare in the authority's area. If, because of mandatory commitments, so much of the money that must be saved has to come from job losses, the Secretary of State is saying that Haringey must reduce its work force by about 2,000 to 2,300.

That is an enormous cut. The Secretary of State has said that he does not think it possible to cut by more than 5 per cent. in one year, yet here he is demanding a cut of 14 per cent.—nearly three times what he believes is attainable. That is what he is imposing upon an authority that is driven almost spare by the pressures upon it. If that is not upside-down leadership, I do not know what is.

From now on there can only be misery — cuts in services, in jobs and everything else that the Haringey authority provides. Who will benefit? Certainly the people of Haringey will not, nor will the Government. If we consider the aggregate, the Government will be the loser, because it will cost more to get rid of those people than to increase grant support.

We have four requests. There should be a removal of holdback. Secondly, the 1984-85 slope should be retained. The Minister has said with a great deal of pride that he has increased the slope. That is damaging for inner London authorities, because, as the slope is increased, so things will become increasingly difficult. Thirdly, the GREAs should be improved in line with the recommendations of the Association of London Authorities. Fourthly, grant percentage should be restored.

London authorities, particularly those like Haringey, do not want increases in expenditure limits or matters like that to be discussed. What they want is money. They want more from the Secretary of State than he is proposing to give them. That is where the damage is being done. Surely he does not want to go down in history as the person who cut Haringey's services and denied so many people not just the inheritance that he has talked about in welfare services but their jobs. He will be the biggest butcher of jobs of all time in Haringey if this policy is pursued. Let us hope that it is not too late for him to give hope to people in Haringey by revising the figures.

5.32 pm

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): For the past seven months or so I have spent much time discussing the effect of the rate support grant settlement on the London borough of Hillingdon, in which my constituency is situated, and upon the domestic and business ratepayers. During that period I have attended numerous meetings with the leader of the council and his colleagues and I have made the strongest possible representations to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the Minister for Local Government about the way in which the block grant system is operating most unfairly against prudent Conservative-controlled local authorities, particularly in outer London.

The reason for all the activity in which I have been engaged, together with my hon. Friends the Members for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) and for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks), is that by last summer the leader of the council and his colleagues were keenly aware that, unless the calculations upon which the grant is distributed took account of their excellent performance since they came to office some six years ago, it seemed certain that the grant would be too small, the target out of reach and the penalty in terms of grant loss such as to result in a rate increase of over 40 per cent. or massive reductions in public expenditure to maintain existing services at their present level.

The House, and particularly my hon. Friends, will agree that this is serious for a good Conservative-controlled authority which has already reduced expenditure considerably over some six years. It is extremely depressing for the hard-working councillors who have carried out Conservative policy and for the ratepayers who are concerned about what is happening. They are particularly concerned because Hillingdon has, for the past six years or so, delivered an annual rate increase which has been little, if any, more than the rate of inflation. That is a very good record which is appreciated by the business community. In other words, both the domestic and the business ratepayers in Hillingdon have had a good deal from their council and they expressed their confidence in that council at the last election by providing the Conservative party with a substantial majority to continue its policies. One of the key elements of those policies is the control of public expenditure, which has substantial support within my borough, as has been made known to me by residents' associations, business men and many others.

What is the problem that faces Hillingdon and a number of authorities which, like Hillingdon, are not rate-capped? To answer the question it is necessary to examine the grant-related expenditure assessment. Since the 1981-82 First Supplementary Report which set GREA for England at £17·2 billion there has been an increase of 23·4 per cent. in the settlement to £21·22 billion for 1985-86. The GREA for outer London boroughs in the same period has increased by 17·4 per cent. to £1·71 billion. The Hillingdon GREA has increased from £71·7 million by 16·2 per cent. to £83·3 million. That means that outer London has received an increase in GREA which is less than three quarters of the national increase for England as a whole, but Hillingdon has been treated to an even lower increase. Why?

One explanation which has some validity is that Hillingdon provides certain services which were introduced by the previous Labour-controlled council which was in office for some years and which was succeeded by the present council in 1978. Those services relate mainly to education and social services. It has been suggested by some of my colleagues that perhaps we are spending too much on, for example, adult education, the rising-fives programme and nursery education.

If my right hon. Friend feels that we are spending too much on those services, I cannot do better than to draw his attention to the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in the House on 19 February 1973 when, as Secretary of State for Education and Science, she was introducing the White Paper entitled "A Framework for Expansion". She said:

> "Dealing with nursery education, the first major proposal in the White Paper was that within 10 years nursery education should become available without charge to children of three or four whose parents wished them to have it." — [Official Report, 19 February 1973; Vol. 851, c. 42.]

Hillingdon implemented that policy. Many people in my constituency find nursery education to be a great advantage, and I share their view.

In regard to social services, we have 12 old people's homes, we provide a subsidised meals-on-wheels and home-help service, and we pay special attention to the needs of the mentally and physically handicapped. I am sure that my right hon. Friend will recognise that if Hillingdon did not provide those services to that extent it would probably not exceed its GREA. If Hillingdon and other authorities are being told to change their expenditure on such services, at least it would be sensible to provide notice and some material help to achieve that objective.

Let us consider the block grant. The first calculation for the 1981-82 financial year was £29·9 million for Hillingdon. The computation for 1985-86 is £17·9 million —a reduction of 40 per cent. I stress that the 40 per cent. reduction has nothing to do with the borough council's spending plans. However, it has a great deal to do with the distributive mechanism for block grant. The reduction for 1985-86 brings the safety-netting process into operation to protect Hillingdon against loss of grant. Hillingdon is not alone. For example, nearly one half of the 146 non-metropolitan districts are in the same position.

Hillingdon is, however, in that select group of eight authorities—with Cumbria and Durham county councils, Chester-le-Street and Forest Heath non-metropolitan district councils, Salford metropolitan district council, Tower Hamlets and Richmond upon Thames London borough councils—which have been safety-net protected against grant loss for each of the five settlements between 1981-82 and 1985-86. Is that not curious? Does my right hon. Friend agree that to require safety-net protection in each of the five settlements suggests that something fundamental is wrong with the figures that he has set for each of those authorities from the outset of the block grant system?

Surely my right hon. Friend must accept that the order has to apply safety-net protection against grant loss for 161 authorities — approximately 40 per cent. of local authorities in England—which is more than the previous highest number of 142 in 1982-83. That demonstrates beyond argument the instability and manifest unfairness of the system which prevents the proper forward planning of services which Parliament has authorised, and, indeed, encouraged the authorities to provide.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I am listening carefully to my hon. Friend's case. As I said in my speech, this year we made more adjustments in the GREAs to take account of representations by local authorities and local authority associations about unfairnesses that existed before. We have recognised them and made changes. Of course, as my hon. Friend says, the safety-net procedure exists to minimise the impact on local authorities which lose grant. I should have thought that my hon. Friend would have recognised that the safety-net procedure is designed to protect authorities such as his from what might have been a greater impact as a result of changes in GREAs.

Mr. Shersby: I do not question the safety-net provision. It is there to avoid excessive losses caused by changes in grant methodology. However, I question the efficacy of a system that necessitates such protection for a large number of local authorities. The system is far from perfect.

Let us consider the effect that this unjust system has upon my constituency. The continuing reduction in base grant, the 15 per cent. increase in grant-related poundage slope and the swingeing effects of the massive increase in penalty—up 250 per cent. from 2p to 7p for 1 per cent. over target—will require the council to slash its services if it is to continue with its previous record, which I have been proud to support, of containing rate rises to the level of inflation, in spite of the adverse effect of excessive grant settlements.

The decision about what action to take rests with the Hillingdon councillors alone. Let me make the options clear to the House. They are a rate rise of over 40 per cent. or service reductions of 15 per cent., equivalent to £11 million, to produce, say, a 5 per cent. increase in line with inflation. They are the two extremes facing local councillors. I do not envy them their task of having to find an acceptable solution. I hope that they will find a compromise somewhere between the two extremes.

I remind my right hon. Friend that I am speaking about an authority which, according to the 1984-85 Audit Commission profile, spent £27, or 6 per cent., per head less than the outer London local government family average. Even after the disastrous effects of grant which pushed rateborne expenditure to £71 or 30 per cent. above that local government family average, it still managed to levy a rate in 1984-85 below that local government family average.

Why, after all the representations by my colleagues and myself, do the Government intend through the rate support grant system to mete out such treatment to a borough such as Hillingdon? Why should I be expected to support a settlement which, at the same time as having a devastating effect on my local authority, can increase the entitlement of one of its rate-capped neighbours by 11 per cent.? I am sorry that the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) is no longer in his place, because I am sure that those figures would be of particular interest to him.

I must tell my right hon. Friend that I cannot and will not any longer support a settlement which is so manifestly unjust and which cannot operate with sufficient sensitivity as to take into account the success and achievement of my local authority which is of such a high order that it was described by one of his predecessors in office as one of the blue chip authorities.

I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend and the Minister for Local Government for their constant courtesy and willingness to meet me, councillors and local business men to consider Hillingdon's plight, but I cannot accept that my right hon. Friend has been able to make any real impression on the rigidity and inflexibility of a system which cannot and should not continue.

My right hon. Friend has said today that he hopes in due course to bring forward some proposals for change. I hope that they will be significant and that he can make some meaningful changes for next year.

I have to ask myself what is my duty to my constituents tonight. I am clear that it is to express in no uncertain terms to my right hon. Friend and his colleagues my constituents' grave concern about his inability to meet the reasonable expectations of one of the best local authorities in Britain. I very much regret, therefore, that I shall not be able to support the motion to approve the report.

5.48 pm

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): This is the fifth rate support grant settlement since the Government started to try to control local authority spending under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. It must take the doubtful prize of being the most complicated settlement yet. It has been made more complicated because it is the first settlement under the new rate-capping regime set up by the Rates Act 1984.

The Secretary of State accepts that the complexity of the settlement makes it almost impossible for anyone to understand it. That must undermine the accountability that is so vital to local government. In the past Ministers have argued that complexity is necessary to achieve accuracy in assessments, but Ministers frequently tell us that grant-related expenditure settlements involve a broad brush approach and a rough approximation.

In fact, we have the worst of both worlds — a complex system based on somewhat dubious assessments. Ultimately, that must become self-defeating. If GREAs cannot be understood, changes in grant cannot be understood. That makes it impossible to explain to ratepayers why their rates vary, which makes the defence of local accountability very much more difficult to mount.

The other major feature that has become all too obvious about this settlement is that the Secretary of State has achieved the dubious distinction of having upset virtually everybody. The metropolitan authorities are unhappy because they are being asked to make real cuts in spending when the majority of the shire authorities are not. The shire authorities are equally unhappy because extra block grant and extra leeway in targets have gone to the so-called overspending rate-capped authorities and not to the more prudent ones.

The Association of Metropolitan Authorities has argued that, on the basis of the Government's inflation figures, real cuts in spending are being asked of 65 metropolitan authorities, which is 85 per cent. of the total. In the non-metropolitan areas, real cuts are being sought from only 11 counties, which is 28 per cent. of the total, and from 113 districts, which is 38 per cent. of the total. Not only are the targets generally unfavourable to metropolitan authorities, but the revisions to the target methodology have not helped. Of those authorities that have had their targets increased, only 13 out of 213 are metropolitan authorities. That is the case for the metropolitan areas.

The Association of County Councils argues that the 18 authorities due to be rate-capped have target increases of nearly 21 per cent. and that those authorities alone have taken up 43 per cent. of the total increase in targets available. In a judgment that cannot be very good news for the Secretary of State, the Conservative-controlled Association of County Councils states:

"The introduction of rate-capping, far from benefiting lower spending authorities, has very greatly restricted their share of the total available increase in targets."

That, of course, is not the prospect that was offered by Ministers when they were seeking to encourage their Back-Bench supporters to go through the Lobby in favour of rate-capping, but that is what has become all too clear in this settlement.

As we have heard in the debate already, some of the loudest screams of pain and bewilderment have come from those authorities which have actually done what the Government asked them to do—cut their spending and kept to their targets. As a result they do not find that they are being rewarded in any major way by the Government. The concession that has been granted to the lowest spending authorities is minimal. Those who try to follow what the Government dictate are still being penalised.

My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) intervened in the Secretary of State's speech to point to the problems being experienced by the Hampshire county council. Its chief executive said that he regards the concessions being given to authorities such as his as only minimal. He said:

"The gap between the target and the Government's own assessment of Hampshire's needs as reflected in the Grant Related Expenditure Assessment is widening and now stands at £29 million. If the County Council were to spend up to the level of assessed need it would incur penalties of £94 million involving a rate precept increase of a further 40 per cent. So far as Hampshire is concerned the purpose of GREA appears to have been lost."

That loyal Conservative authority clearly feels that it has not been given a proper reward for having stuck so closely to the Government's guidelines.

The same pattern has been clear in London, as the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) made clear. The Tory-controlled London Boroughs Association points to the fact that all of its 24 authorities budgeted within 5 per cent. of their target for 1984-85. All but two of them were within 2 per cent. of their targets and 10 were actually at or below targets. Yet in 1985-86 those councils—with the exception of Westminster—will be required to make real cuts ranging from 0·7 per cent. in Kensington and Chelsea and the City to 5·9 per cent. in Hounslow.

The London Boroughs Association, with commendable loyalty to the Government, said that it hoped that its member authorities would endeavour to meet their targets. However, it pointed out that that would be a difficult task, especially in view of the stringent economy that most of the boroughs had exercised for many years.

The system is clearly rigged to keep low-spending authorities as low-spending authorities. Back in what appears to be the almost halcyon days of 1983-84, a 1 per cent. overspend resulted in a loss of grant equivalent to a 1p rate. In 1985-86, a 1 per cent. overspend means the loss of grant equivalent to a 7p rate. It is, therefore, very much more difficult, both politically and financially, to raise spending levels. The new draconian system means that lower-spending authorities suffer most from penalties in relative terms.

The Association of County Councils has pointed out that if its members has overspent their targets in 1984-85 by an average of 1 per cent. the penalty grant loss would have been £68 million. If the same overspend were to take place in 1985-86, the penalty grant loss would be £240 million—an increase of more than 250 per cent. That shows the way in which the small overspenders will be substantially penalised in the settlement before the House.

Together with hon. Members from both sides of the House, I believe that that underlines once again the inadequacy and unacceptability of the whole complex system of targets and GREAs. The whole system is failing to make sense. GREA was originally introduced as an independent measure of what an authority needed to spend to produce a standard level of service. As other hon. Members have said, many authorities have budgets fixed well below the GREA level and are forced to keep them that low by Government targets and by the punitive system of penalties.

We have already heard that three shire counties—Berkshire, East Sussex and West Sussex—would lose all their block grant in penalties if they spent to the GREA level—the level which the Government suggest they need to spend to provide an acceptable level of service. Another four counties — Buckinghamshire, Dorset, Norfolk and Surrey—would lose 85 per cent. of their grant if they spent to GREA level. That undermines the whole case that has been presented during the past five years, that GREA is a useful objective assessment.

I wish briefly to deal with rate capping. I remain convinced that it is an unacceptable interference in the affairs of local government. It is obviously interference in the affairs of the rate-capped authorities. It is now becoming all too clear that it also interferes in the affairs of the non-rate-capped authorities, because they are losing grant which they might otherwise have had if it had not been diverted to the rate-capped authorities.

The effects of rate capping are clearly much greater than the Government originally thought. That results from the distortions that are produced by the whole system of targets and penalties. In earlier years a number of the rate-capped authorities understated their budgets to qualify for more grant, which now has an impact on their expenditure limits.

The expenditure limits which the Secretary of State announced on 24 July did not, at first sight, appear unreasonable. He was asking for a cash freeze in 15 authorities and a 1·5 per cent. cash reduction in the GLC, the ILEA and my borough of Greenwich. Closer analysis shows that the expenditure limits were much tougher than that. The Secretary of State has taken a very narrow view of expenditure in 1984-85. He has chosen to ignore expenditure being financed from special funds and a variety of other what are now called creative accounting devices which councils have been forced to adopt to minimise grant penalties. The effect of that was to turn what was claimed to be a cash freeze into an average real cut of 11·9 per cent. for the rate-capped authorities. Individual councils face real cuts of between 6 and 28 per cent. to get down to the expenditure limits.

The Government on the one hand, and rate-capped councils on the other, are taking part in a damaging game of political brinkmanship, and what is at stake is the quality of services provided to local people. I fear that the local people will be the losers in this battle. Rate-capped councils should stop their political posturing and negotiate with the Secretary of State. Meanwhile, the right hon. Gentleman should be as flexible as possible to correct what are clear errors in the original expenditure limits that he fixed. We should accept that this is not a private fight between Conservative Ministers and Labour councillors. We are talking about extremely important services on which many of our constituents depend.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, by their actions, the Government have turned this into a party political fight? The decisions now being made by Ministers are based, not on a rational assessment of need, but on party political spite. What other response does the hon. Gentleman expect Labour-controlled authorities to give?

Mr. Cartwright: If the rate-capped authorities have a good case—I do not accept it in its entirety, though I accept it to the extent of believing that the expenditure limits imposed by the Government are sometimes based on faulty information—I cannot understand why it should not be argued with all the power at their disposal before the Secretary of State. That is what councillors were elected to do, but they fail in their duty if they simply sit on the sidelines trying to extract political benefit from the brinkmanship that is now going on.

We have in Britain a rating system that is unloved and unreformed. Not only are rates an inappropriate tax to carry the heavy burden that is placed on them, but rateable values are wildly out of date and the Government have not fulfilled their promise on revaluation. In the White paper, entitled "Rates", Cmnd. 9008, of August 1983, the Government said about non-domestic rates:

"Significant changes have occurred in the relative values of some categories of property since the 1973 revaluation."

The Government accepted that that had

"distorted the tax base. As a result, rate bills for some categories of property are much higher or much lower than they ought to be. In particular, the relative rental values of large, old buildings, occupied by labour-intensive industries, many of them in the Midlands and the North, have in general declined substantially since 1973."

The Government also said:

"These distortions should be rectified. The Government propose to set in train the work required for a non-domestic revaluation."

Referring to domestic values, the White Paper said:

"The Government are considering urgently the case for a domestic revaluation and will issue a consultation document as soon as possible."

Those clear commitments were given 18 months ago, but we have seen no indication of what will be done as a matter of urgency to deal with the distortions in the system of rateable values.

I agree with hon. Members who argue that changes are needed in the system of local government finance, but we need a more radical change than some have in mind. There is no lack of evidence on and results of research into the problem. It is more than eight years since the Layfield committee presented its report based on two years of detailed expert work. The Government undertook their own consultation exercise in the last Parliament. Yet now we are promised another series of inquiries and studies into the whole problem of local government finance.

We need no more research and study, but the political will to change the system. We must accept that there is no ideal system, one that is proof against every possible criticism. I remain convinced that Layfield was right when it recommended that the only way forward was the introduction of a system of local income tax to replace or supplement the system of rating. The computerisation of the Revenue has made that a more practical proposition than it was in 1976. The sooner we get on with the job, the better for the ratepayers and the health of local government in Britain.

6.5 pm

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): I agree with the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) that low-spending authorities are boxed in should they seek to increase their expenditure.

I have great sympathy with the Secretary of State. Those, if there be any, who would present him with bouquets are significantly absent from the Chamber, whereas those who wish to belabour him with brickbats are here in force, and I regret to tell him that I find myself in that latter category.

Last year the Secretary of State undertook to assist low-spending authorities. Much has been said about the plight of the shire counties, but not only those counties are suffering. As the representative of part of the metropolitan borough of Trafford in Greater Manchester, I assure my right hon. Friend that we suffer the same problems with a vengeance.

The Secretary of State claimed to have honoured his pledge, given last year, to assist the low-spending authorities on the basis of the 4·625 per cent. increase. In consequence of that increase, Trafford has benefited to the extent of £267,000 in the current settlement but, regrettably, because Trafford is labelled a high-resource authority it will lose £56,000 of that in grant if it spends the extra money, for we suffer from what is known in my right hon. Friend's department as a negative marginal rate of grant. As a result, we lose 21p in every pound. While, therefore, I am sure it was not my right hon. Friend's intention to mislead the House, his opening remarks today were not accurate in the case of Trafford borough council.

Thus, while the net benefit from this special dispensation for low-spenders is barely £200,000, in almost the next breath my right hon. Friend is again removing £2 million in grant from Trafford. Our grant is being cut from £20·5 million this year to £18·5 million next year, and we have recently been informed that we have lost a further £1·05 million on notifications of adjustments on previous years.

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman says that his authority's grant has been reduced from £20·5 million to £18·5 million. Does he appreciate that that grant this year would have been only £18·5 million but for the fact that his authority was given grant that was taken away from so-called overspending local authorities? In other words, his borough is the classic example of a lower-spending Conservative authority benefiting through the grant system from alleged overspending by Labour authorities.

Mr. Churchill: I am all in favour of the borough of Trafford benefiting from the excellent rate-capping policies of the Government. My complaint is that we do not seem to be benefiting. The bottom line for my constituents is that, in spite of the Secretary of State's promises and the £250,000 added to us for being a low-spending authority, Trafford is this year losing £3 million, or 15 per cent. of its rate support grant, and that is an unacceptable level of penalty.

I regret to say that this is not a one-off situation. Last year we lost £2·5 million, and the year before that £1·9 million. In the preceding year we lost £2 million. If we take a 10-year perspective, it is estimated that at current prices, and allowing for the transfer of part of the grant to the Greater Manchester council, Trafford's 1975-76 grant would be worth £40 million. If the 26 per cent. overall reduction nationally in rate support grant is applied, Trafford's grant this year, on the basis of the 1975 settlement, would be £29·6 million. That means that Trafford has lost £11 million over and above the national reduction.

I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will concede that no local authority could have followed the Government guidelines more closely than Trafford. In each of the past four years it has been within £2,000 of the low side of the Government's guideline, with the exception of 1983-84, when it undershot by £1·75 million. I believe that Trafford should be congratulated on the responsible way in which it has budgeted and sought to remain within the Government's guidelines. However, it has been losing about 10 per cent. of its rate support grant year in and year out.

This year the Government have excelled themselves. Trafford's loss this year, including the clawback of £1 million in respect of previous years, is about 15 per cent. What is the Secretary of State's purpose? Why does he insist once again on kicking in the teeth his most loyal supporters? I freely exonerate my right hon. Friend from any charge of malice. However, following his remarks in opening the debate, about the complications of the formulae and the abstruseness of the acronyms that are involved, we must wonder whether he and his ministerial colleagues begin to understand the system, let alone its unfairnesses.

Trafford suffers from being labelled a high-resource area. One of the key reasons for that is that it encompasses the vast industrial area of Trafford park. As is recognised in a recent White Paper, which was referred to by the hon. Member for Woolwich, the industrial areas of the north of England are seriously overvalued and, therefore, overrated. The Government's failure to proceed with a rating revaluation—there has not been one since 1973—means that my constituents are being penalised in each RSG settlement.

Trafford is not alone in being labelled a high-resource area. London is in the same boat. However, unlike London, Trafford does not have its difficulties acknowledged by the Government. The London boroughs benefit from the effect of the so-called multiplier. Paragraph 9 of the rate support grant White Paper states:

> "Multipliers are a device for adjusting grant entitlement. They can be used for a number of reasons—for example, to . . . discount part of the rateable resources in a particular area eg in London".

Why should all the privileges and cash go to London? Why should an industrial northern area such as Trafford not be entitled to benefit in the same way and to be protected from being, allegedly, a high-resource area?

Mr. Simon Hughes: I appreciate the problems which the local authority within the hon. Gentleman's constituency has to face, but the implications are the same when a London borough has suffered a reduction in its share of the budget from 16 to 15 per cent. If that happens, we may reach a similar conclusion. I hope the hon. Gentleman will agree that he cannot conclude that London must be happy because it is a net beneficiary of the readjustments of which he is complaining, because it is not.

Mr. Churchill: London has benefited for a long time from the multiplier effect. Its effect is to enable most London boroughs to enjoy a discount of 30 per cent. I believe that Tower Hamlets receives a 45 per cent. discount. This obviously has a bearing on the resources available to it. If this system were applied at the London level in the Manchester borough of Trafford, the resources that it receives from central Government would increase by £12 million to £15 million. I ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to take into account the clear bias and unfairness that exists because there has been no proper rating revaluation. This has had an adverse effect on industrial areas in the north. Secondly, high-resource areas such as London are discounted, whereas Manchester is not.

Last year I and my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery) took on trust the assurances of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his ministerial colleagues that positive steps would be taken to help low-spending authorities. I cannot accept that to give Trafford £211,000 with one hand and to take away £2 million with the other is an acquittal of that promise. As a strong supporter of the Government's policies across the spectrum, it will give me no pleasure whatever to be unable to support the Government when the House divides later this evening.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): During the election campaign prior to the Conservative Government taking office in 1979, Conservative party candidates promised to give more freedom to local government. They promised also to abolish the rating system. Local government has not been given more freedom. Indeed, it has been subject to increasing restrictions year after year.

I was involved in local government until last year. At the time when I was elected to this place, I thought that local government had seen the worst of the Government's impositions. Unfortunately, local government finds itself in an even worse position. The controls that the Government have placed on capital and revenue expenditure have tied down local government and made it impossible for councillors to do the job for which they are elected. I often wonder now why members of the public stand for election as councillors. If elected, they will be unable to do the job that they wish to carry out on behalf of those whom they represent.

We have seen no change in the rating system since 1979. I recognise that the present system is an easy and cheap form of taxation and that it is difficult to agree on an alternative system that would not produce more anomalies and problems. However, the Government have failed to meet their promise to abolish the rating system.

A considerable burden has been transferred from the Government to local ratepayers since the Government were elected in 1979. The RSG settlements since 1980-81 show that a massive burden has been transferred from central Government to local ratepayers. That would be so even if we assumed that there had been no inflation and that the costs of running local government during that period had remained static. The 1980-81 RSG settlement was 61 per cent. In 1981-82 it was reduced to 59 per cent., in 1982-83 to 56·1 per cent., and in 1983-84 to 52·8 per cent. For the current year it is 51·9 per cent., and we are talking of 48·7 per cent. for the following year. That means that an additional burden of 13 per cent., which would have been borne by the Government if the settlement were still 61 per cent., has been transferred to local ratepayers. At the same time, additional burdens and tasks have been thrown on local government by central Government.

The Government admit that they cannot assess the costs borne by local government. It is extraordinary that the Government can introduce policies without fully knowing the cost implications to local government in terms of staff and revenue. It is clear that, even without taking account of holdback and penalties, the Government are responsible for most of the rate increases in recent years.

The Secretary of State referred to rate increases next year in single figures, yet the Association of District Councils forecasts that 67 shire district councils will need rate increases of more than 20 per cent. and 164 district councils will need increases of between 10 per cent. and 20 per cent., with the average increase likely to be 11·7 per cent. The ADC is certainly not a Socialist-controlled body, yet it says that this year's RSG settlement is harsh, and I certainly agree.

My hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said that 38 out of 39 shire counties had cash targets below their grant-related expenditure assessment level. Lancashire is in that position. If Lancashire county council were to spend up to its GRE figure, it would incur penalties of £46 million. The GRE is, however, the level considered to be necessary to provide a typical standard of service, according to the Government's criteria. That level is not determined by the local authorities; it is the Government's basis for determining what a council should spend.

Lancashire's GRE is just over £532 million and £22 million over its cash target figure. Expenditure above that level results in the council incurring a penalty. That is nonsense. To maintain its present level of services next year, Lancashire would need to increase its precept by 46 per cent. I do not envy the councillors' unpleasant task of dealing with their budget in the months and years ahead. The council really needs to spend more on education and social services, and surely it cannot be expected to cut fire, ambulance or police services.

I am annoyed about the way in which we allow subsidies to be provided for private residential homes for the elderly. There has been a massive growth in the number of those homes. Would it not be far better to allow those Government subsidies to be transferred to local government to provide care for the elderly than to permit profit to be made from them? If the Lancashire county council does not make economies, the ratepayers will be heavily penalised by the Government. That is wrong. The Government must think again about their proposals.

The position of the borough of Burnley differs from that of the county of Lancashire. The borough's cash target is higher than its GRE. The GRE assessment for the year ahead is £5,422,000, which is £50,000 less than this year. We are not certain why the figure is lower. The cash target has increased by 3·75 per cent. on this year's target to £8,481,000—much higher than GRE. During the current year, the council is budgeted to spend slightly over its cash target. If the council budgets in 1985-86 to spend at target, what will happen as a result of the Government's proposals for next year's RSG? The reduction in grant alone will cost Burnley ratepayers £510,000, or the equivalent of a 6p rate on top of this year's 40p rate. Just to spend at target, the council will have to increase the rate by 8p to 52p. That is what will happen without inflation and extra services.

At the top end of spending on this basis, the rate of grant will be down by 12·5 per cent. That is the penalty incurred for having a cash target higher than GRE. Once a council spends above its GREA, the rate of grant decreases. When a council spends at the threshold level, RSG decreases again. That causes a considerable difference at the top level of 12·5 per cent. That is what the measures will mean to Burnley next year.

Burnley council feels that its GRE is far too low. That point has been made on many occasions to Ministers, but there has been no reaction from them. It is nonsense for Burnley to experience such a large difference and to receive such a large part of its grant at the lower rate once it has gone above GRE. The ratepayers of Burnley must, therefore, meet a much higher percentage of the cost, and that is wrong.

The Government recognise Burnley as a deprived area according to its designation in the Inner Urban Areas Act 1978. In 1983, Burnley was designated as a deprived area. Because expenditure arising from Burnley's designation is not disregarded and because there has been no adjustment in GRE, there have been revenue implications. Burnley can, therefore, incur further penalties, and that is wrong.

Burnley has not yet finalised its budget for 1985-86. At this stage, its estimates are well above target. Burnley council is not a high spender or overspender. Burnley is an old industrial town. It is like other towns in Lancashire, such as Preston and Blackburn, on which this country's wealth was built during this century and the last. Those towns, which have experienced industrial dereliction, must deal with many problems. Inflation has caused some increase in expenditure, because the inflation rate is higher than the increase in target.

I am worried about the fact that, year after year, the Government fail to recognise that capital allocations have revenue implications. Many people, on noting housing investment programme allocations, tend to think that that money is handed on a plate to local government. They do not think of HIP as permission to local authorities to borrow money or of the revenue implications. Capital allocations affect staff and thereby revenue.

Each year, Burnley council has great difficulty in ensuring that revenue demands are containable within the budget. Our HIP allocation is totally inadequate. Indeed, next year's allocation has been decreased by £1 million. We cannot deal with the housing problems facing us in

[Mr. Peter Pike]

Burnley. Burnley and many other towns are heading in the near future for a housing crisis in the public and private sectors, but that is a subject for another debate. It is appropriate to consider the revenue implications of the HIP allocation in today's debate.

When I was chairman and leader of Burnley borough council I believed that the grant portion of the HIP allocation had only a small revenue implication and that the council should spend more of the grant in the private sector because the revenue implication was less than new build of sheltered housing or improvement of council houses. However, the 10 per cent. revenue implication for Burnley on meeting the debt charge for improvement in the private sector is now running at about £250,000 which is equal to a 3p rate.

Mr. Straw: Does my hon. Friend accept that there are indirect as well as direct revenue implications from HIPs in boroughs such as his and mine upon all the current services of the borough and Lancashire county council from not solving the mounting housing crisis due to the additional burdens that will be placed on the social services?

Mr. Pike: I accept that point. The burden on social and other services will increase rapidly. In the long run, the cost to central Government will be high because we will reach a stage where we can no longer improve the housing stock but will face demolition and clearance, which is far more costly.

Ministers often imply that council balances are too big and that they should reduce them. As I have said more than once, a balance can be used only once. Once it has gone, the implication has to be met the following year. It also reduces revenue because interest is obtained on investments.

Next year only 20 per cent. of capital receipts can be used. That has serious implications. This year Burnley will have spent the 40 per cent. permitted. That will reduce the income to the housing revenue account from the money that has been invested and held in reserve. I utterly oppose the reduction. Capital receipts supplement the capital programme. If the council can pay from capital receipts, there are no revenue implications. Councils should have been permitted to continue to spend at the present level of their capital receipts.

Burnley is not an overspender. That applies to all Labour-controlled councils which are referred to continually as overspenders. They are trying to provide services for the elderly and transport for those who need public transport, to improve industrial requirements to maintain jobs, and to clear industrial dereliction and take their boroughs and citizens into the next century in the type of environment to which they are entitled. They are not overspenders. I challenge the Secretary of State to come to north-east Lancashire to see its towns. If he believes that we are overspending, let him tell the public what he would want to cut and where we could save money. I am opposed to the Government's proposals for next year's RSG.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): Unlike most speakers, may I begin with a kind word for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State? [Interruption.] I have no interest in the Secretary of State. My kind word arises from the outcome of the 1984-85 settlement. It is worth putting that on record, because we were told then by many prophets of doom that rate increases would be 15 to 20 per cent. They turned out, as my right hon. Friend said, on average to be 5 per cent., and some were even reduced.

My right hon. Friend has also said that he believes that the picture will be similar for the 1985-86 settlement. I join him in hoping that that will be true as I need no convincing that high rates are damaging to employment prospects and industry generally.

I hope that my right hon. Friend who is to reply to the debate will take it in good part if I devote the rest of my speech to analysing the 1985-86 settlement with, I hope, constructive suggestions of how we may proceed a little better.

It is perhaps stating the obvious that no one but the Treasury seems to welcome the RSG. This year is no different from any others. There seems to be a growing tendency for so-called high and low-spending authorities to claim piously that they, more than any other group of authorities, have been treated worse by the settlement. A moment of thought will convince us that both groups cannot be right. It is a consequence of the complexity of the system, which, in fairness, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has acknowledged, that all groups of authorities sooner or later find themselves out of sympathy with one or other of the many complex ways in which the settlement operates.

I shall consider, first, the rate-capped authorities. I fear that one consequence of the system will be the reduced accountability of rate-capped authorities to their electorate. The Government's stated intention is to have low rate rises and lower expenditure in real terms. In broad terms, I applaud that. As a consequence of the settlement, some authorities have received more grant and many have received easier targets. Let us consider the example of the Islington people's republic. It did not receive any grant in 1984-85. It has now been rate-capped and is scheduled to receive £25 million in 1985-86, and, because targets are based broadly on 1984-85 budgets, its target will be only 1·5 per cent. down on that figure, which, in relation to other London boroughs, was comparatively high.

I accept that penalties for overspending have been made considerably more severe in this settlement, although they are predominantly——

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): How much grant is Islington due to receive in the next financial year under the settlement announced by the Secretary of State?

Mr. Squire: As I said to the House a moment ago, according to the figures that I have, Islington is scheduled to receive £25 million in 1985-86. No doubt if I am wrong the hon. Gentleman will give us another version.

The effect of raising penalties on overspending will be felt proportionately more by the marginal overspenders than by the large overspenders. It is difficult to get away from the feeling that at least some of the wages of sin are high grants.

The key point is that the total of the grant adjustments and various assumed spending level adjustments affect rate demands by much more than adjustments in local authorities' spending levels. That worries me a great deal. I believe—I hope that my right hon. Friends accept this —that we should be moving towards greater accountability of local authorities to their electors, rather than appearing at times to be moving in the opposite direction. I contrast that with the position of low-spenders. This year —this is welcome—they received an improvement in their target figures of 4·5 or 4·625 per cent. on their 1984-85 budget.

However, the system, in effect, underplays the cumulative effect of years and years of overspending or underspending. Regardless of one's political view, that means, as we have already heard today from other hon. Members, that many so-called low-spending authorities face massively steep cuts in Government support. I can give a few examples. The royal borough of Kingston falls from £15·7 million to £14 million; Surrey county council falls from £46·5 million to £36·2 million—at that rate it will receive no grant in another three years—and Essex county council goes from £147 million to £132 million. They are all low-spending authorities. I know that my right hon. Friend, when he replies, will say that it is an unavoidable consequence of the system, arising from its treatment of high resource authorities, but it comes a little hard on such authorities when they compare that treatment with the treatment apparently meted out to the high-spending authorities.

I will use my own authority, the London borough of Havering, to illustrate what I think will happen in London. If I get it wrong, I am sure that my right hon. Friend will point me in the right direction. The London borough of Havering, like most outer London boroughs, is a responsible authority. As I understand it, the GLC capped precept for 1985-86 will be under 1 per cent, less than the current year, so we can probably assume that there will be approximately the same precept for the coming year as for the current year.

In addition, outer London boroughs will need to find the LRT precept of 10·8p. There is an overall reduction —we all know about it—of central Government grant, and clearly London will take its share of that reduction. All boroughs must also find money to fund the inflation-adjusted cost of their existing services, plus the inevitable improvements in some services. I do not believe that it is possible to find all that money without having a rate increase higher than the rate of inflation. I say that with some sadness, because I hope that we would seek to have rate increases at or about that level, but I am worried that it would be difficult, if not impossible, for that to be so in outer London.

I should like briefly to put down a marker for the settlement for next year. I noticed that it was done in the debate last year, albeit in a different context. My short and simple point concerns the financial arrangements for the abolition of the GLC. The present proposal is that certain functions will be charged to the boroughs on the basis of population, whereas in the past they have been charged on the basis of rateable values. I am the first to accept that in theory, by the time that we have passed through the equalisation process and all the other measurements, everything will turn out to be exactly the same, but that is in a perfect world. In this respect, perhaps more than in most others, I submit that we do not live in a perfect world. There is real concern in outer London boroughs that they will suffer as a result of the proposed new basis. I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider that problem in time for next year's settlement.

I should like to place on record the importance of the continuation, for much of London and the London boroughs, of the equalisation scheme whereby the inner London high resource authorities fund the rest of London. Much of that resource is generated by the activity, in employment or shopping terms, of outer London residents, and it is only fair and proper that they should continue to have some share of that benefit in the future.

With regard to grant-related expenditure, I should like to follow some of the interesting points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby), who is not at present in the Chamber. I welcome the improvements which have been made in refining GRE statistics, although there are still one or two bugs in the system. The two largest areas of expenditure are education and social services. The GRE figures for London boroughs show that no more than two or three of the outer London low-spending boroughs can come down to anywhere near the level of their GRE figures. I shall need some convincing that that is because they are wild overspenders and not because there are inherent faults within the system of measurement which, I am sure, also apply outside London. It seems unlikely in the extreme that all the otherwise very responsible authorities should consistently find themselves way above the figures for grant-related expenditure. If targets are to be abolished some day, and if GRE is to become virtually the sole source of control and measurement, reform will become even more essential because of its higher elevation within the system.

I welcome—as I am sure almost every hon. Member must—the recent announcement of a review of the system of funding local authority expenditure. However, there is some danger of the announcement that there is to be a review of local authority finance becoming the equivalent of, "Your cheque is in the post." None the less, we cannot have everything in life. Above all, I assume that my right hon. Friend will confirm that there cannot realistically be a prospect of a new system being in place before the next general election. Therefore, we shall be looking at at least three settlements—or perhaps more—the basis of the present system. That is why it is so important to improve it.

The present system relies on rateable values that are now 12 years out of date. It relies on a total rate support grant that has fallen below 50 per cent. On the basis of the principle that he who pays the piper should call the tune, now that local authorities are meeting more than half the expenditure, will my right hon. Friend, as a starter, consider removing the existing targets and controls from low-spending authorities, as they are already paying, in virtually every case, more than half the cost of their services? That suggestion at least seems to be worth looking at.

I remain convinced, as I think several hon. Members know, that the only real solution is a major long-term reform which above all recognises the social revolution that we have experienced. The old concept of one rateable unit and one wage earner in a household has long gone out of the window. The fact is that several earners within a home are competing, so to speak, with those homes with only one earner and it is the central fault of the present system. That is the only reason why putting still greater weight on local expenditure, as against income tax, must remain a little suspect until the necessary reform is in operation.

In essence, the whole problem with targets and penalties is that, the more we have, the more we seem to need. Perhaps it is a consequence of pressure building up. The more we seek to stop pressure here and there, the more we seem to need it. It is almost a form of addiction—a sort of local government bondage. The more controls we try, the harder it is to give up the habit.

Years ago the last Labour Government—it was years ago, fortunately — successfully managed to shovel largesse to their friends quite shamelessly year by year. Today, despite a vast amount of human and computer effort, and consequent expense, we simply cannot do that. That may be a gain or a loss, depending on how people look at it, but it is a reality. Perhaps, until we get the necessary reform, the safest thing for all of us to accept is that virtue in general will be sparsely rewarded, and that those seeking to achieve anything better than that will have to look forward to the long-awaited outcome of my right hon. Friend's review.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before I call the next speaker, I should tell the House that I understand that the first Front Bench speaker would like to rise at about 9 o'clock. I estimate that if those who are in the Chamber now speak for approximately 10 minutes each, I shall be able to ensure than everyone who wishes to participate in the debate will be called.

6.50 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): There is a common theme to debates on local government matters —that, in the many hours intervening between the time when the Secretary of State opens the debate and the Under-Secretary replies, there are no speeches in support of Government policy either from Tory or Opposition Benches. That is because every hon. Member is under great pressure from his own local authority or from people in his area, concerning local authority services and the way in which Government funding is continually taken away from local authorities.

With glee, Tory Members ritually attack the inner city authorities, the Greater London council, the metropolitan counties and all the others, and have voted through the Rates Act and with it rate capping. They will rue the day that they did that, because the Government are fundamentally attempting to destroy democracy for local government. They have been doing so since 1979. The political principle on which they have operated is sheer selective vindictiveness against the poorest people in the country. Every inner city area has been penalised by the Government because the Government's notion of overspending is that, if a council tries to provide services that go some way towards meeting some of the needs and aspirations of the poorest people, they kick the council in the teeth. If a council continues to do that, despite the Government's blandishments, it does not get kicked in the teeth, but has its head cut off and suffers an unprecedented media barrage inspired by the Government. If one looks at any inner city area, one finds that disgraceful pattern.

The Government's policies are not only unpleasant and vindictive but, in their own economic terms, very short-sighted. If all those councils made the cuts that are requested by the Government, what would be the cost in economic terms of paying redundancy money, unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit, and of the loss of tax income, rate income and all the other incomes that would be lost from those deliberately made unemployed by Government policy? There is a circular effect. The Secretary of State for the Environment might not care to reflect on that side of it, but when his term of office ends, as I hope it will soon, he might care to reflect that, during his time as Secretary of State for the Environment, he has done more damage to local government than any of his predecessors, without exception, because he has sought to destroy the very basis on which local government was set up.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): I have great respect for the hon. Gentleman because I know that he has some knowledge not only of inner cities but of Dorset. However, can he modify his strictures a little? Under the system, a county such as Dorset, which has followed the Conservative Government's guidelines, comes out worse, so it is said, than many other local authorities, particularly in inner city areas.

Mr. Corbyn: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, because it illustrates my point.

I represent an inner city area that has suffered badly at the hands of the Government, on rate support grant. It must be said that Islington borough council has not sought to follow the Government's guidelines on spending and has been penalised. However, county councils, shire counties and others that have followed the Government's guidelines are now also being penalised and the Government seem unable to recognise that a county council has services to maintain, often at great expense, as do councils in rural areas—something which, again, is not understood by the Government.

Tory Members might rub their hands with glee at the attack that the Government are making on Islington and other councils like it, but the time will come when the same attack will turn on them. There is an inexorable logic in the Government's process of destroying all local authority independence and democracy as they proceed over the years. Therefore, I hope that tonight there will be a large rebellion by Tory Members against the report, because it will destroy all forms of local government as the Government carry on destroying the welfare state.

I should like to refer to the effect of the Government's cuts on my constituency and Islington borough. I shall try to demonstrate to the House that, had the Government not changed the rules on local authority spending and not so shamelessly attacked certain borough councils, this year the ratepayers of Islington would not face large rate bills but there would be a cut of about 50 per cent. in those bills. That would have happened if the Government had played by the rules under which the current borough council in Islington was elected in 1982. The same could be said of many other local authorities.

The Secretary of State has said that the borough of Islington's budget should be £85·6 million. The council carefully examined all the costs of its services, the needs of the poorest people whom it represents and the implications of the manifesto on which it was elected in 1982. It feels that the budget should be £94 million. That argument can be supported in detail by the borough council. If the Secretary of State wishes, he is free to visit the borough of Islington and find out for himself what is going on there. I renew my invitation to him to come to Islington and join in a public debate on why he selected it for such vindictive treatment. I understand that the last time that he visited Islington he took part in a dinner of the Conservative association——

Mr. Tony Banks: Has it got one?

Mr. Corbyn: The borough has a Conservative association, but it keeps behind closed doors.

The Secretary of State proposes a cut of £8·4 million in the budget of the borough of Islington. The effects of the cut would be felt by everybody in the borough. There would be a loss of around 800 jobs, the closure of several important facilities and cuts in the street sweeping services, the library service, services to help those with disabilities, day centres for the elderly, and home help services. With that tale of misery, a further 800 people would be in the dole queue in a borough where the unemployment rate is already well over 20 per cent. In the two Department of Health and Social Security districts that cover most of my constituency, there are already over 34,000 registered claimants. Therefore, by any stretch of the imagination, it is an area of high unemployment and enormous, grinding poverty.

The Government's solution is to take money away from my borough and my constituency by cutting rate support grant and health spending and by rate-capping the other two authorities that are of great assistance to us—the Inner London education authority and the GLC. Therefore, we are not just rate-capped but tri-capped by the Government. I hope that the Minister for Local Government, for one, will begin to understand—he has some experience of local government—exactly what the effect of all that is.

If the Government had not altered the rules on holdback of grants, the borough of Islington would be £23 million better off. If they had not altered the slope, we would be £28·1 million better off. If they had not changed the rules on the GRE formulae on housing expenditure, we could have a budget of £94 million, which is what is needed for this year, and there would be a rate reduction this year of 40 per cent. for the ratepayers of Islington. That is the truth, which the Government are not prepared to listen to or concede. They are guided in their proposals for local authorities not by notions of efficiency or of the way in which local authorities should be run, but simply by vindictive action against the poorest inner city areas. That is what the rate-capping proposals are about. That is what the abolition proposals are about. That is what the rate support grant cut is about.

In examining each local authority's performance, instead of penalising those which attempt to provide for the needs of the elderly and single people and the housing problems in inner city areas, the Government should look at the high unmet need in any inner city area. I happen to represent Islington. Its needs are not that different from those of any other inner city constituency. We would like more home helps working for the council, more day centres for the elderly and better facilities for the physically and mentally handicapped, because in all those areas there are waiting lists, not at the wish of the council but simply because the Government treat our local authority in the same way as every other.

I believe that we are now coming to the end of the period when local authorities were in a position to argue with the Secretary of State and, if necessary, raise the rates in order to maintain services. That is a painful process that local authorities have gone through every year since 1979. But since the announcement of the rate-capping proposals and the further cuts in the rate support grant, we are reaching the end of the road on which local authorities can negotiate their way out.

The Secretary of State has succeeded in uniting a large number of local authorities of differing areas and in some cases differing needs, uniting all the local authority trade unions in support of those authorities' policies, but also uniting a huge volume of public opinion against the Government because people in the poorest inner city areas realise that public spending through local authorities matters, it is important, and it is a way of redressing some of the imbalances that are endemic in society as it is currently organised.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is not the point that my hon. Friend is making further support to the point that I tried to make to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) when he suggested that Labour authorities should go and argue their case with the Secretary of State? The Secretary of State is not interested in listening to a rational case. All the evidence on local government restructuring in the country is against what the Government propose, but the Government wilfully ignore it. What is the point of listening to people who have open mouths but closed minds?

Mr. Corbyn: Precisely. The Secretary of State continually says that the local authorities on his hit list should come and negotiate with him and talk to him. Frankly, they have had nothing but attacks from him for the past five years. Why should they assume that anything will be different now? Why should they assume that he wants to do anything but try to destroy the unity that has been built up between those authorities and the trade unions that support them?

The Secretary of State has created a monster in his rate support grant proposals and his rate-capping proposals. He has created the most enormous opposition to himself and the Government. The Government may well squeeze this nasty little measure through the House tonight, but the opposition that they have created will live for a long time. The unity of that opposition will live for even longer. It will destroy him, his Government and this kind of attack on democracy, and it will lead to the election of a Labour Government committed to the restoration of genuine local democracy that has been so shamelessly destroyed by the Government.

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): I shall endeavour to respond to your call for brevity, Mr. Speaker.

In following the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) — I am aware, having fought my first parliamentary election in that constituency, that Sevenoaks is an area with very different conditions from those of north Islington—I wish to bring to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State the way in which the rate support grant settlement has affected the Sevenoaks district council.

The council has done all that the Government have asked of it. I believe that three examples will suffice to demonstrate this fact. First is the record on rates. Expenditure has increased by only 8 per cent. over the last five years against an inflation rate in that time of some 50 per cent. Rate increases in Sevenoaks have gone up by 4·6 per cent. in four years. As to staffing, in the council there were 779 full-time staff in April 1981 and by October 1984 the numbers were down to 559, a drop of 28 per cent. in three and a half years. This has required major reorganisation of management, of structure, of staffing and of working methods. Nevertheless, the council has continued throughout 1984 to plan further economies, further streamlining of services and further productivity increases. At least some of these schemes are unpopular with ratepayers and politically difficult, but in my view they have been right and proper decisions courageously taken by councillors who are determined to achieve value for money for their ratepayers. I will not labour the point, but by any standards this is a record to be proud of. I believe that my right hon. Friend would not disagree.

However, financial planning for 1985-86 is made nonsense by the announcement by the Secretary of State last December of the rate support grant as it affects Sevenoaks and other district councils. Without adequate warning, this year's grant to Sevenoaks has been reduced for 1985-86 by a staggering 18·5 per cent. Of this reduction, one third had been anticipated by the council and taken into account in its proper and prudent budgeting, but the other two thirds comes as a bolt from the blue, far too late for the council—if, indeed, it has any further scope to do so—to make additional cost reductions in time for next year. This means, therefore, as night follows day, a rate increase way above the Secretary of State's guidelines and what the district council wished or deserved to have to levy.

I want to make it clear that neither I nor the Conservative-controlled council is disputing the necessity for the Government to achieve a reduction in the overall level of Government support for local authorities on current spending. That policy has my approval and support. What I do complain about most forcefully is the way in which the rate support grant settlement has continued to penalise the prudent and in some cases to reward the profligate. My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) has given another example on a far larger scale, as has my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill).

From my discussions with my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) and his advisers, it is clear that two factors in particular cause part of the problems for my district council. These are the change of criteria for assessing the recreational requirement of district councils and the fact that the spending of town and parish councils within the district is not subject to any overall control.

Parish precepts in recent years have increased by between 10 and 12 per cent. annually. In my view the grant-related expenditure factor for total parish precepts bears little resemblance to actual expenditure, despite the statement that GREs take special characteristics into account. I put it to my right hon. Friend that parish precepts should either come into both target and GREs on an actual basis or be excluded altogether. I ask for his assurance that this point will be considered further by his Department.

I return to the main complaint which I wish to put to my right hon. Friend in the strongest terms. Here is a council that has done all that the Government have asked of it. Prudent budgeting has been penalised and forward planning has been made impossible by an unexpected and heavy blow delivered at the eleventh hour. The rate support grant system is still a very blunt instrument. Further refining is essential and such refining must surely result in a very much greater reward for those councils that do what is asked of them. We were given assurances about that last year, but it still has not happened. This year's settlement, although necessary for the nation as a whole, is still far from satisfactory in its application to my own and other careful authorities.

7.9 pm

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): As I listened to the Secretary of State's presentation of the reasons why he believed that the House should accept the proposals, I thought on more than one occasion that it resembled something out of the well-known series, "Yes Minister".

The hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) brought in a new dimension when he pointed out that parish precepts were not covered by the legislation. If he is suggesting that parish council rates should attract rate support grant—he will be aware that at present they do not—I am sure that he will have the support of many Opposition Members. I hope that he will press his right hon. Friend on that.

In addition to 1985-86, the year under discussion, the Secretary of State advised the House that he could not envisage any relaxation of control or rate-capping for the following year, 1986-87. There are already problems this year. The right hon. Gentleman said that, although last spring there were claims that the rate support grant then proposed would mean rate increases of 15 to 20 per cent., rates had in fact been kept down. He boasted that that proved the success of the Government's restrictions, but rates have risen by only 5 per cent. or so because local authorities have had to cut their services. If they had been allowed to maintain services at their previous level, rates would indeed have risen by 15 to 20 per cent., and to provide that same level of services in the future would mean that the 5·2 per cent. increase proposed by the Secretary of State would in fact amount to a reduction of 0·05 per cent. in the money allowed for the provision of local government services.

The Secretary of State said that high rates contributed to high manufacturing and industrial costs, leading to a loss of employment. He said that rate increases were being kept to a minimum to ensure that hardship would not be caused to industry and commerce. If he genuinely means that, why does he not apply the same philosophy to the regional water authorities, which also levy rates? The Yorkshire water authority has imposed increases of 19 or 20 per cent., but rate-capping does not apply to that precept. If the Secretary of State is sincere in the belief that he must control high-spending authorities, he should apply the same rules to regional water authorities, which are creating the same problems for ratepayers as he claims Labour-controlled local authorities are creating in their areas. Incidentally, the chairman of the Yorkshire water authority has laid the blame for those increases above the rate of inflation fairly and squarely at the door of the Secretary of State. I hope that we shall have an explanation from the Government on that, as it seems very strange that there should be two sets of rules in the same game.

Mr. Tony Banks: It would also be interesting to hear an explanation from the Secretary of State as to why rate-capping does not apply, for example, to the Metropolitan police precept or to that levied by London Regional Transport since that area of authority was taken away from the GLC.

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing attention to those other anomalies. It is clear that the Government wish to attack only Labour-controlled authorities providing the services required by the people in their areas. The cut in rate support grant has created further problems for local authorities seeking to provide the necessary services for the people whom they represent. Having served in local government for 30 years, and having witnessed the recent actions by the Government, I am glad that I am now out of that area so that I do not have to explain to people that education, recreation, planning and social services can no longer be provided adequately because of the cuts in rate support grant and the rate-capping measures introduced by the Secretary of State.

There are also problems in the joint financing system involving local authority social service departments and area health authorities. In Wakefield and Leeds — I represent people in both ctities—the joint financing so necessary to provide the services required by an aging population and to meet the needs of the mentally sick and the disabled have been seriously affected by the cuts and restrictions imposed by the Secretary of State, so that the people most in need are being denied those services as a result of Government action. I ask for some special consideration to be given to the jointly financed schemes.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: In order to keep my speech short I did not talk about the disregards. However, I have made it clear that next year we will repeat the disregard for penalty for authorities' increased expenditure on schemes jointly financed with health authorities. The arrangements that apply this year will apply next year, too.

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful for that intervention. A number of hon. Members are very concerned about jointly financed schemes. I hope that the problems facing social service departments which have jointly financed schemes will be given serious consideration—problems connected with the aging population and the care of the mentally sick and the mentally handicapped.

Other hon. Members have referred to the rating system, to the anomalies that exist in the system and to the problems inherent in it. I share the concern that has been expressed. The valuations are 12 years old. The Secretary of State has said that there is to be a review of the financing of local government. If rates are still to be levied on rateable values, I urge the right hon. Gentleman to consider updating the valuations on which rates are levied. The system is 10, 12 or 15 years out of date. When those whose rates have been assessed on those out-of-date levels appeal against assessment, they have to refer back to the value of the property 12 or 15 years ago. That is most confusing. I am sure that the Secretary of State could ease the problems by dealing with some of the anomalies in the system. I appeal to him carefully to consider doing so.

As there are anomalies, and as services are to be cut in many areas, and in my own area in particular, I ask the House not to accept the report. Some Conservative Members have, on behalf of their constituents and local authorities, described problems similar to those described by my hon. Friends. There is some unity about the problems facing local authorities. I hope that those hon. Gentlemen will join us in rejecting the report.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): I am grateful for the opportunity to say a few words about the rate support grant settlement in general and its effect on Suffolk.

If the House stands for anything, it stands for justice and fairness. I am not entirely convinced that, in this settlement, Suffolk is given a fair deal. I support fairness. That is why I support rate-capping and welcome unreservedly the Secretary of State's hope that he may be able to abandon targets next year.

I understand only too well the almost impossible dilemma in which my right hon. Friend finds himself in bringing back under control the runaway expenditure of local authorities in toto. He has the difficult responsibility of controlling local authority expenditure as a whole while, if we are not careful, some hon. Members are tempted to concern themselves solely with their own local problems. I also understand how difficult it is to cut back the wildest spending authorities as quickly and harshly as would be appropriate without causing a degree of hardship and perhaps unrest that would be too high a price to pay.

My right hon. Friend makes no secret of the fact that this is a national problem. It is a problem that we all share. Indeed, some sensible local authorities may have to suffer to some extent as the highest spenders are brought under control. However, that is seen by many people — certainly in Suffolk—as rough justice. In their view, the Government are robbing Peter to pay Paul; and in the past, that has sometimes led the Government to reward profligacy and penalise prudence.

Suffolk county council has a history of managing its affairs carefully and sensibly, yet it now finds itself in a difficult position. In the current year the difference between its GREA and its target is £5·6 million. Next year — 1985-86 — the gap will widen to £12·4 million. In 1985-86 the council will try to use reserves to bridge the gap, but if the situation continues into 1986-87 that will be increasingly difficult to do. Burdens on services will increase and there will be excessive rate increases. For example, the growth in the number of old people in Suffolk far exceeds the national average, yet the number of residential places is below the national average, as is the number of home helps and the provision of meals on wheels, even though I am sure the social services departments are doing their best to manage their services with great care.

The Government may assess the financial needs of a local authority carefully and in detail, taking into consideration all the factors involved, in order to establish its GREA. They may then, by setting a target, deny it the necessary finance. They may do so not because of the behaviour of the authority concerned, but because of the behaviour of other authorities over which they have no control. That cannot be right. I was therefore delighted to hear of the Secretary of State's intention to end targets as soon as possible.

My right hon. Friend has my sympathy in dealing with an intractable problem. However, I return to the question of justice and fairness. The present system cannot be regarded as fair. If, when he replies to the debate, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is able to confirm my right hon. Friend's suggestion about abolishing targets next year, I am sure that the whole House will be delighted.

7.27 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): One day soon, I hope to find myself discussing in this House something other than local government business. Local government matters seem to be gradually taking over our entire proceedings. Indeed, the Government seem determined to turn this place into a mega town hall and all hon. Members into souped-up councillors—although the material on the Government Benches is not promising.

We discuss the rate support grant every year but, to an increasing extent, the Government are attempting to force the House into interfering with and attempting to control the day-to-day affairs of local government. Hon. Members on both sides have pointed out how arcane the system of local government finance has become. Few hon. Members fully understand it. It is clear that the Secretary of State is not among them. The Prime Minister does not understand it either. A few weeks ago, attempting to answer a question during Prime Minister's Question Time, the right hon. Lady became completely confused between GREAs and targets. I do not blame her for that, but I see her as the spectre behind her Ministers, pushing them into doing things about which they are unhappy. If Ministers are unhappy about what they are doing, they know what —in all honour and integrity—they should do about it. However, I doubt whether we shall see much of those qualities.

The subject has become confused and difficult to understand. That might explain why so few right hon. and hon. Members on either side are present. That has been true for all this important debate. Hon. Members are getting fed up to the teeth with being required to discuss and make decisions on matters that should be left to locally elected councillors. That is why hon. Members decide to take their pleasures elsewhere. We elect councillors to deal with these issues. Why do the Government want to interfere in the day-to-day running of town halls and county halls.

We have heard that the level of rate support grant for next year is to be nearly £12 billion. That sounds a lot of money, but the percentage of Government funding of local authority expenditure has decreased from 60 per cent. in 1978-79 to the 48·7 per cent. of next year. That represents a massive switch of tax burdens from the Government to local government. It is no great surprise that local authorities — Conservative and Labour-controlled — are beginning to rebel.

The grant-related expenditure that the rate support grant proposes for the Greater London council shows a need to spend GREA of £549 million — an increase of £32 million on the settlement for 1984-85. However, if we allow for London Regional Transport and the transport supplementary grant, it represents an increase of about 18 per cent. That leaves a substantial gap between the council's basic budget of £853 million and the £549 million "need to spend" assessment. We can therefore see the great problems that the GLC will face.

The Secretary of State has told us that GREAs have been altered. The GLC was surprised and pleased to learn that there was an increase of £27 million in its GREA for the housing revenue account. We need to know whether the GREA figure for the housing revenue account for last year contained the large error that we understand it to have contained. We have to explain the great differences in the figures. It does not surprise me that miscalculations are now rife in Marsham street, as civil servants struggle to understand the system — just like Members of Parliament.

I asked the Secretary of State why the GLC's target had increased so remarkably. Far be it from me to complain about that, but I need to know the Secretary of State's reasons. Last year, the GLC was accused of being one of the so-called overspenders but, even after allowing for the removal of London Transport, the increase in the GLC's target for next year is a 63 per cent. hike on last year's settlement. The GLC would like to know why there has been such an increase. I should have thought that many of the right hon. and hon. Members who should be sitting behind the Minister would be interested to know why there has been a 63 per cent. increase for what the Government say is one of the highest spending authorities in the country.

I believe that the increase merely shows that the figures are infinitely manipulable and that the Government can change them at whim. That merely makes the system even more uncertain. Moreover, the GLC's targets for last year were the very targets that were used to criticise that council's expenditure levels. Indeed, they were given, in part, as a reason for its abolition. The Government owe the House an explanation for these dramatic changes.

London's total rate support grant has been eroded steadily in real terms since 1979-80. Had the total been maintained at that level, London would have received about £3·3 billion more grant from 1981 to 1985-86. That estimated loss is based on the assumption that London local authorities will spend in line with their targets in 1985-86. If those targets are exceeded, the loss will be greater. When the Government start talking about the level of rate increases in London, they should remember that, since 1979-80, they have filched £3·3 billion from London ratepayers. That is yet another example of the massive switch of tax burdens from central to local government.

The Secretary of State said today that if all local authorities had shown equal responsibility in spending, there would be no need for these levels of targets. In his defence, I should add that he said that rate support grant had steadily decreased since 1979-80 and that the average level of rate increase has also decreased. However, he said that those are only averages. They cover up all of the big differences between local authorities in different parts of the country. The figures do not tell us about the level and quality of services that are now provided in different local authority areas.

It is easy and cheap for the Secretary of State to talk about over-spending local authorities. It becomes a matter of how the Government manipulate the figures, as I said in regard to the 63 per cent. increase in the GLC's target.

Overspend or underspend is what the Secretary of State decides it will be. They depend on the figures that he manipulates in Marsham street. It must occur to the Secretary of State in his more reflective moments that overspending also comes with local authorities concentrated in urban areas, where the problems are greatest —as we heard in yesterday's debate on infrastructure, investment and unemployment. The greatest concentration of problems is found in our great urban areas. It is no wonder that socially responsible Labour-controlled local authorities are attempting to protect their ratepayers from the impact of the Government's economic and social policies. The Government's manipulating the figures pushes them into so-called overspending, whereupon the Government systematically attack them, in alliance with their poodle press in Fleet street.

The Secretary of State said that local authorities can now plan their budgets for 1985-86. That is a joke. How can the GLC or any other responsible local authority plan its budget now for 1985-86? The first reason why local authorities cannot budget is rate-capping. We shall have a long and, I suspect, acrimonious debate on rate-capping in a few weeks time. When considering the timetable that the Secretary of State has set, the GLC consulted counsel. Mr. Roger Henderson, QC, advised the GLC that the Secretary of State's rate-capping timetable can be challenged on the grounds of irrationality and procedural impropriety. Mr. Henderson also said that the Secretary of State is acting with unreasonable haste to implement rate limits which are based on faulty arithmetic.

We know how faulty the arithmetic is. The Secretary of State has estimated that the GLC has about £71 million in reserves. According to the GLC's official estimates, given by professional officers to elected members, the GLC's reserves stand in the range of £2 million to £12 million, depending on the outcome of litigation. As we all know, the GLC is perforce in and out of the courts these days to try to defend itself against the attacks of central Government. No information is given by the Secretary of State about how he arrived at the calculation of the GLC reserve of £71 million. How can a responsible local authority plan its budget when it is clear that it is operating on completely different figures from those that the Secretary of State makes up as he goes along? Therefore, the GLC must use the courts to proceed against the Government on rate-capping.

Rate-capping, and the influence it has on trying to make a budget in line with the gratuitous advice of the Secretary of State, is compounded by what Mr. Justice MacNeill said in a judgment in the High Court on 11 January on the demand of the Secretary of State for Transport for at least £50 million more from the GLC than he was entitled to ask in support of London Regional Transport. Mr. Justice MacNeill said that the Secretary of State for Transport had acted

"unlawfully, irrationally and procedurally improperly".

In that case, costs were awarded against the Secretary of State for Transport. As my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said, despite the fact that the Secretary of State for Transport acted illegally, he will not be surcharged for what he did, because surcharging does not exist for incompetent central Government Ministers. It exists only to penalise democratically elected local authority members who try to defend their services. The difference in approach and in scale of values as between local government and central Government is deplorable.

Mr. Straw: Is my hon. Friend aware that the Public Accounts Committee of the House roundly condemned the present Minister with responsibility for consumer affairs, then a junior Minister in the Scottish Office, for selling off Hamilton college of education at a loss to the taxpayers of £5 million? If he had been a councillor, he would have been surcharged and discharged from office. Because he was a Minister, all that happened was that he was promoted.

Mr. Banks: It would appear that Government Ministers can act with total disregard of the laws that they or previous Parliaments have made. That is grossly unfair. Surely all hon. Members on both sides of the House must accept that standards are different for the conduct of central Government Ministers and of locally elected councillors. The dice is loaded heavily in favour of central Government. The Government come along like a bunch of bully boys and stamp all over town halls and county halls; they declare that their mandate is so much greater than that of democratic local councils that they can do what they want. I believe that hon. Members on the Government Benches are beginning to realise how unfair it is.

When the Secretary of State for Transport demanded that extra £50 million from the GLC, I do not believe that he was acting out of sheer incompetence. We know that he is more than capable of that, but in this case I think he was doing it deliberately to make it difficult for the GLC to keep to its budget. Of course, he has been found out and he will have to get his fingers out of the till.

All this makes it much more difficult for a responsible council like the GLC to proceed with its budget making for 1985-86. How can my council make a budget when there is so much uncertainty and so many legally dubious decisions by incompetent and vindictive Ministers? Labour-controlled local authorities and councils are discussing extensively what they can do. Law-breaking comes into it. The Secretary of State for the Environment, in regard to the Greater London development plan and the Secretary of State for Transport, in regard to the excessive demand from GLC for London Regional Transport, are not setting a good example for law-abiding councils because they have both been prepared to break the law.

The Government are gradually forcing local authorities into a position where they must choose between bad and vindictive laws or the services that they were elected to preserve. The Secretary of State for the Environment is criminalising democratically elected and responsible councillors. Sooner or later, someone will have to give ground. I am convinced that it will not be the majority of Labour-controlled local authorities. I am reminded of the words of George Lansbury in 1921. He was not a head banger. He would not be described as an ultra-Left member of today's Labour party or, indeed, of the Labour party of the 1920s. He held firm Christian beliefs. He said that wicked laws ought to be broken. When Poplar council was resisting unjust laws he also wrote:

"The question is not whether what we are doing is legal or illegal but whether it is right or wrong."

That question is as relevant in 1985 as it was in 1921.

Labour councils would be well advised to decide whether they should set rates at all. As an option, they should now think about refusing to pay debt charges of any sort. When Third world countries got themselves into financial problems over debts owed to the industrialised world they decided that they would not pay and, of course, rescue operations were mounted. Some Labour local authorities might decide to emulate that example during 1985-86. Local authorities might also decide to defy the Secretary of State and set illegal budgets.

These are real options. I would support and advocate a combination of such measures. I believe, like George

[Mr. Banks]

Lansbury, that wicked laws ought to be broken. If laws are to be party political and if this place is to be used to force through bad administrative law which is clearly based on party political spite, it will become a duty rather than a crime for democratically elected Labour local authorities to defy the Government. From that defiance, we will be able to mobilise the sort of support that is needed to throw the Government out of office.

Dr. Michael Clark (Rochford): I might talk about Essex county council or Rochford district council, because both have suffered as a result of the rate support grant. There are 15 other Members of Parliament who could speak for Essex county council so I shall confine my remarks to Rochford district council.

Rochford is a well-run council which has never before taken issue with the Department of the Environment on rate support grant calculations, even though those calculations leave a lot to be desired. Rochford has supported the Government in all their objectives to reduce public expenditure. It was the first council to consider privatising refuse collection. Although in the end it did not go ahead with it, its refuse collection costs compare favourably with neighbouring Southend, which has privatised its refuse collection service. In recent years Rochford has cut its staff by 15 per cent., even though it was tight on staff compared with other councils of a similar size. It sold off surplus buildings and centralised offices. In its policy on council house sales it was well in advance of Government legislation.

As a result of these prudent policies Rochford has, over the last nine years, kept its rate increase every year to single figures. Generally, rate increases have been about 6 or 7 per cent., but in 1979, the year in which the Government were returned to office and inflation was 28 per cent., Rochford district council reduced its rate by 7 per cent.

During the past nine years, Rochford's rates have risen by 52 per cent. while the retail price index has risen by 170 per cent. That has been achieved by effective use of balances and capital receipts and by identifying long-term savings well in advance so that they could be realised and taken into account. Auditors' reports on Rochford show that, in almost every area, its spending is lower than the spending of other councils in the same family of district councils.

At a council meeting before Christmas and before the RSG settlements were known, the council proposed to increase its rates, for two reasons. First, it proposed to increase them by 5 per cent. to allow for inflation and, secondly, by 7 per cent. to allow for the expected reduction in RSG. That 7 per cent. was to take into account a transfer from central taxation to local taxation which would have to be borne by the people of Rochford. The plan to increase rates by a total of 12 per cent. would have meant that it would be the first time in the history of Rochford district council that rates had been increased in double figures.

When the RSG settlement was known, the grant was cut by 19 per cent. more than the council officers and councillors had expected. There had been a major cut of £263,000. That might not appear to be a great deal of money compared with the money referred to by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), but it is a great deal of money for a small council like Rochford. The cut meant that the rate had to be increased by 24 per cent., and we must bear in mind that the highest previous increase during the past nine years had been 9 per cent.

If we look back, the block grant from central Government to Rochford district council in the four years to 1984 actually paid for 44 per cent. of the council's revenue expenditure; last year, it paid for 36 per cent., and this year it will pay for 26 per cent. There has been a major cut in the financing for Rochford from central Government.

The 24 per cent. rate increase that is now a possibility in Rochford—although we hope that it can somehow be avoided—will come about despite Rochford spending in line with Government targets and no grant penalty being incurred. Rochford will have to increase its rates because it has followed and adhered to all the guidelines set by the Government.

One has to ask what the reasons are for that. We are told that one reason is that the method of grant distribution has been amended and that Rochford's GREA has been reduced by 3 per cent. in 1985-86 even though nationally GREA has been increased by 6 per cent. We all know that GREA is calculated on a variety of factors—the number of people in an area, the physical features, the cost of providing services, social and environmental problems and recreational requirements. Of those factors, the number of people in Rochford has decreased, the physical features have not changed, the cost of providing services has risen in line with the rate of inflation, the social and environmental problems have got no less, and recreational requirements are ever increasing as people expect more to fill their leisure time.

Why is Rochford facing such a cut? I do not understand it, Rochford district council and its officers do not understand it, and I have no doubt that the people of Rochford do not understand it.

The second reason we are given for the cut is that there is a change in the calculation. I must tell my right hon. Friend that there is no change in the income of the Rochford ratepayers, nor in the services that they expect. I want to draw his attention to the shire areas, counties and districts that will receive a lower share of the grant. That appears to be inconsistent with my right hon. Friend's claim that the shire areas will be treated better.

When we asked the Department of the Environment to give reasons for the cut in Rochford's allocation, it said:

"The main reason for the loss of GRE for recreation is a major change in the methodology"—

a lovely word—

"designed to take account of the differential use of recreational facilities by different groups in the population, the demands placed on city centres and resorts by commuters and visitors."

Rochford prides itself on its recreational facilities, and it has a right to the same recreational facilities as any other district council.

I wonder whether the Department has looked at its map and realised that Rochford is adjacent to Southend—only half a dozen miles away. Many of the summer visitors to Southend use Rochford's recreational facilities, as do Southend's residents.

I want to ask my right hon. Friend a few questions. Is he aware that the Association of District Councils estimates that, as a result of the RSG calculation, 231 district councils will have to increase their rates by more than 10 per cent., 67 by more than 20 per cent.—that includes Rochford—and 18 by more than 30 per cent.

Does my right hon. Friend accept that a 24 per cent. increase in the district rate is acceptable and that an authority making such an increase is not necessarily being irresponsible? What advice does he give to a local authority that has met every one of the Government's requirements, yet finds itself in the same position as those councils that have ignored them? I echo the comments of my hon. Friends the Members for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) and for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) on that point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) asked what guarantees there were for 1986-87. If Rochford exhausts its balances or reduces its services, what assurances are there that next year a further adjustment in the methodology will not occur that will once again disadvantage Rochford? I hope that my right hon. Friend will accept that the rate support grant calculations are so complex that few people understand them. We had budgets that were replaced with GRE, we have GRE that is qualified by targets, and the Government choose the figure, the title, the word or the set of circumstances that best suit their purpose.

District councils do not know where they are. They cannot plan for the future. They are in the frustrated state of not knowing how to establish or to begin a three-year, let alone a five-year, plan. I believe that as a result of these complications, people will begin to reject local democracy because they reject that which they they cannot understand. Local democracy is now in the first stage of being rejected. To a large extent, it is being ignored, as the hon. Member for Newham, North-West pointed out. That is shown by the low turnout at local elections.

I fear that it will not be long before local democracy moves from being ignored to being rejected, and that would be a dangerous precedent for democracy both for the country and for this place. I ask my right hon. Friend to attempt to simplify the whole of the structure that finances local government.

I regret that it is unlikely that I shall be supporting the Government tonight. If the Minister's reply persuades me, I shall be happy to support them, but, as things stand, it is unlikely that I shall support the Government.

I ask the Secretary of State, in the short term, to review the system and its injustices, and in particular to review Rochford's case. In the medium term, will he abolish the current incomprehensible rate support grant calculations and replace them with a simpler system that facilitates long-term planning, demonstrates fairness and, above all, encourages understanding of and support for local democracy?

8 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): It is notable that, one after another, year in and year out, Government Back Benchers, make the same claims and ask their Government to try to do something about local government finance and to deliver that which clearly has not been delivered in the past.

My hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) took his place in the Chamber a few minutes ago. He has been a Member for 11 years and within seconds of arriving in the Chamber tonight he said, "We hear the same speeches every year." That is evidence that it is about time that the Government did something. Promises, words and hopes for the future are not enough.

Exactly 51 weeks ago today the House was asked to consider the Government's proposals for the current financial year's rate support grant settlement. The Government were under enormous pressure, particularly from their own Back Benchers. They were under even more pressure than they are today.

The Government were repeatedly told that low-spending authorities were not able to spend what they needed to spend without penalties because their targets were below the Government's declared expenditure. On that occasion, the Secretary of State laid great store by two matters. The first was the efficiency and accountability of local government. I have no doubt that the phrase "the magic of the market place" was in his mind, although not uttered. In that context he praised the Audit Commission's work.

The second was the effect of the Rates Act, implemented late last year. The Secretary of State did not concede that the system was ramshackle and needed to be replaced. He simply said that he would try to reward the low spenders.

Those of us who live in high-spending authority areas —because they have high need levels—thought that it was a simple, political buying-off operation. We thought that we were witnessing a crude political device to buy support in the Lobby. The Secretary of State succeeded to some extent by persuading some of his colleagues not to vote against him, but to abstain, so he reduced the number who voted against the order.

Unfortunately, logic and the Chancellor of the Exchequer have made it impossible for the Secretary of State to fulfil his promise. Public expenditure levels have been set and the Chancellor has said that in real terms this year local government expenditure will be cut by 3 per cent. We protest about that.

If the Secretary of State was to do what he promised and give low spenders the benefit of low spending for this year, he had to fiddle with the arbitrary targets and arbitrary penalties for the high-spending authorities with the biggest needs. Unfortunately, he failed on both counts. He is still being criticised by his back benchers who say that the system is still inadequate and has not met their needs. Essex is a good example of a Tory-controlled shire county. The urban areas are equally unhappy, not least because they have been rate-capped.

The hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill), who represents the area covered by the Tory-controlled Trafford authority in Greater Manchester, makes it clear that the system has not worked. That is because in theory the system is fundamentally flawed and in practice hopeless—and it is becoming worse.

Since last January, 51 weeks ago, there has been a 3 per cent. cut in central Government's contribution to local government expenditure. The much-lauded Audit Commission produced a stinging report in August which said that the system was responsible for adding £1,200 million to the rates bill. The Government were so sure of their ground that the Secretary of State's response was that the Government would not examine the report in detail. The Secretary of State praised the Commission last January and now hides from its conclusions.

Under the Rates Act, for the 18 rate-capped authorities —16 Labour-controlled, one hung and one, Portsmouth,

[Mr. Simon Hughes]

Conservative-controlled—the squeeze comes from both ends. The Government's contribution to them is being reduced but they are told that they cannot raise the money by putting up rates because that is illegal and such rates would be invalid. They cannot meet their expenditure requirements.

Many obligations imposed upon such authorities are statutory. The Government do not now even believe in accountability. In the context of education, they say that people should be allowed to vote with their feet and take their children out of school A into school B. They say that that is the principle of the market economy. The Government do not apply that principle to local government. They do not say that the results of local elections should be determinative. They do not think that locally elected councillors, many of whom are members of the Conservative party, should be able to make ultimate decisions.

The only ray of light is that at the Tory party conference last year we were assured again — 10 years on — that there would be consultation about reform of local government finance. We welcome that, provided it produces results.

Consultations were referred to by the Minister for Local Government in Committee recently. I hope that the consultations that he offered the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and the Labour party will be offered to all other party spokesmen in the House.

Our view does not parallel that of the Labour party. We do not believe that the problems of local government will be solved by increasingly funding local government from central Government through block grants. We believe that local government should be made more accountable. That means reducing the money that comes from central Government and raising more money locally. As my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) said, that means local income tax in addition to rates.

We have to have reform to make local government more accountable. I hope that real progress will be made before next year and that we shall not have to listen to ever more plaintive cries from more and more hon. Members.

The only way open to people outside the House who want to protest is to vote against the Government at every opportunity. They will have that opportunity this May in the shire county elections and next May in the London borough elections. I hope that in their thousands they will vote against this ridiculous imposition of central Government policy on their local councils by their Conservative Government and reject them and all their works.

The Guardian yesterday made it clear that the local authority settlement that we are being asked to approve tonight threatens to cause big rate increases in most of the Tory counties only a month before they go to the polls in the four-yearly county elections. It says that, unless the councils are able to raise their balances, they will be forced to raise rates significantly higher than inflation, even if they keep fairly constant in real terms.

The effect will be even more severe in the districts, as the hon. Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) said. A whole list of counties will be affected — Berkshire, East Sussex, Essex, Gloucestershire, Hampshire, Hertfordshire, Surrey, Warwickshire, West Sussex and Wiltshire. I quoted the example of Warwickshire last year when it said that it had done everything possible but still could not meet the targets. That is still its position. It also applies to other Labour, Tory and Liberal-controlled county councils.

We have heard that, except for Bedfordshire, all the shire counties have targets below GREA. Avon, a Labour-controlled council, has reached the stage at which, because its GREA is £6 million higher than its target, it would incur a penalty of £18 million if it spent up to its GREA. I was told that the people of that area are saying that they must empty the cocoa tins and use all possible reserves to avoid cutting services. Allowing even for that, because of Government policy, next year it will need a 19p rate increase if the system is not altered.

My hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) has received a letter from the chief executive of Northumberland county council, sent with the approval of the political leaders of that area. In that Labour-controlled council—just: it has a majority of one—the settlement continues to be poor; it follows a series of poor settlements for that area. The letter to my hon. Friend points out that the Government make insufficient allowance for inflation, continue their policy of transferring the burden from the taxpayer to the ratepayer and impose policies the implications of which are that if the council was able to contain its spending to last year's level, allowing for the Government's assessment of inflation, the authority would receive £5 million less in grant in the coming year than it received last year, which would represent a 10 per cent. reduction. In fact, it would be much worse because of pay settlements, which would mean the authority losing £7·5 million more.

There is insufficient assessment of the needs of such counties, which have huge rural areas. In Northumberland's case, it has been greatly depopulated, particularly for educational assessment purposes. It is clear that the Government's calculations do not work. Northumberland has had to reduce highways manual staff from 580 10 years ago to 307 and has had to reduce the number of teachers from more than 3,000 to 2,500. It cannot do more.

Northumberland, looking at the whole situation from a different perspective from, say, the Isle of Wight, says that, while it might do well out of a particular alteration —in Northumberland's case, the changes in rules about transport grant benefit the authority, whereas the Isle of Wight does badly out of that alteration—nobody wants a system under which proper assessments cannot be made because one decision goes in their favour and the next goes against them. They do not know where they are.

Northumberland serves also to illustrate an important constitutional point. It says that the effect of Government policies is driving out the people who were in control of the area — the same applies in other areas — the moderates in the Labour party, to be replaced by extremists. In other words, the Government are forcing people to take extreme positions by making extreme proposals, and that cannot be good for the future of local government.

The Isle of Wight, on all definitions, has been a low-spending authority. It has been Liberal-controlled for a long time and, I hope, will remain so for even longer. It cannot begin to do what the Government expect of it. The Isle of Wight has probably the highest percentage of population over pensionable age, plus 17 per cent. unemployment. It is told, nevertheless, that it cannot even have the money that is needed to carry out a fundamental service such as providing facilities for the disposal of waste. All the holes in the Isle of Wight where waste could be deposited have been filled, and the authority is not being given the money to put the waste elsewhere. What is it supposed to do, remembering that the disposal of waste is a statutory duty?

Further, the Isle of Wight wants to deal with its unemployment problem, but instead of being allowed the money to buy land to develop for industrial purposes, it is not even given central Government assistance by way of area status. The Isle of Wight is in a hopeless position, all because of the Government's policies. There should be no friends of the Government in that island.

I could go on giving examples. Consider Bedfordshire, which is having to reduce the number of old people's homes and even police overtime; this Government of law and order are forcing their colleagues in Bedfordshire to cut the services of law and order.

In Cheshire, a hung council, for the first time in 93 years the Tories cannot produce a budget. They say that they could make savings of £12 million to meet the Government's requirements, yet they are not producing a budget. Thus, not just Labour and Liberal authorities, but the Government's supporters too, are in difficulties. In other words, Cheshire's example shows that local Tories cannot cope and take the strain.

Cambridgeshire is likely to incur a penalty of £19 million. Things got so bad in Somerset that the Tory education sub-committee proposed making a charge on youngsters for the water they consumed while eating packed lunches. The full committee rejected that idea, but the council did decide that the local authority could not afford to buy any fiction for local libraries. Perhaps one can say that the facts are so appalling that to add fiction would be a distraction.

The shire counties are in a desperate position, but the urban areas are in an even worse state. I made the point earlier that the distribution of block grant means that London has had a reduction of 1 per cent., even though GREAs have been increased, that many London authorities will not be able to meet their targets and that the penalties for overspending are being increased enormously.

In Southwark, the method of calculating GREA for the social services is inadequate. It does not reflect changes in the needs of the population. We have one of the highest calls for social services in the country and, of the 12 inner London boroughs, we are first in the list with the largest number of blind, deaf, and handicapped people; we are fourth highest in the number of social workers; we are top of the league in the number of elderly; third in the number of young people who are handicapped and in care; fourth in the number of mentally handicapped; and second in the number of children boarded out in care.

Only about two thirds of those factors are recognised by the Government. The GREA data for social services are out of date, too few factors are taken into account and simple population figures dominate the assessment of social service needs, leaving out the social isolation of people — for example, the elderly are not taken into account — with the population at risk not being sufficiently considered. I understand that next year the Government are to set up a working group of officers of local authorities and the Department of the Environment. I hope that something will be done to meet the needs of the social services.

The Government promised to do something last year and they have failed to deliver. They have not rewarded prudence—Conservative Members are telling them that — and they have not made an objectively accurate assessment of profligacy. They have misjudged. Some councils, however hard they try, will not be able to preserve essential services within the financial constraints, the straitjacket, that the Government are imposing on them. The Government will have to concede that people may be forced into breaking the law. Unless there is a realistic concession that adapts policies to people's needs —not formulae from Marsham street—the Government will be running themselves and local government into disrepute.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): Is my hon. Friend aware of another problem that is looming up fast? I refer to the White Paper on buses, remembering that we have been promised a Bill a fortnight from now. Evidence from Kent county council is being taken tonight by the Select Committee on Transport. It is reckoned that what is proposed in that Bill will cost that authority an additional £2·5 million, which will immediately put it into penalty, in that it will not be able to meet that expenditure without going into penalty.

Mr. Hughes: My hon. Friend reiterates the point that we are making constantly. It is that the Government must say, "Enough of the old system." If we in this House insist on imposing duties on local government—for example, relating to buses — we must at least compensate local government. Authorities cannot be expected to provide local services without the necessary resources. Central Government hold the purse strings. If local authorities are not permitted to raise money elsewhere, they cannot be expected to find the cash out of the air. Conservative Members are fond of telling people that money does not grow on trees.

I urge the Government to think again. I warn them that, if they do not, the electors will go on voting even more consistently against them at local elections and will increasingly withhold their support, even in the traditionally Tory shire counties, which are becoming less and less traditionally Tory. Until the Government return to what we were led to believe were traditional Conservative views, and lay off local government—returning accountability to local government—they will find resistance in Parliament to this and all similar measures.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): I tried to make an intervention this afternoon during the speech of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. My right hon. Friend did not allow me to intervene, so I shall make a speech instead.

Many of us have been concerned recently about surrogate motherhood. The issue has not crept up suddenly on the House, but it is with us. The Government have formulated no policies or plans to deal with it. The same can be said of local government. Local government issues are creeping up on central Government and they are not making proper plans to ensure that the type of scaremongering that is indulged in by the hon. Member for

[Mr. Richard Holt]

Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) is treated in the way that it deserves. I notice that the hon. Gentleman has had the good grace to make his speech and leave the Chamber. He seems always to fail to listen to those who speak after him. I always thought that it was a tradition of the House to remain in one's place to listen to succeeding speeches. Of course, the hon. Gentleman is not a traditionalist. Indeed, he seeks to abolish this establishment altogether —[Interruption.] If any Opposition Member wants to intervene, I shall be glad to let him do so.

I was first elected to local government 22 years ago, and much of what I have listened to so far has caused me a sense of déjà vu. However, I must compliment my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), who made an excellent contribution, as did several of my hon. Friends subsequently. I have been disappointed by the contributions of Opposition Members, especially by that of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who spoke on behalf of the Liberal party. The hon. Gentleman talked about local income tax as though it were a wonderful panacea and a workable solution. That must be a broad-brush strategy, and I invite the Liberal party to address itself to the attendant detail.

The Conservative party has been giving local income tax considerable thought for a long time and it is clear that there are many questions to be asked. For example, who will pay the local tax? Will it be paid by the unemployed man or old lady? Will it be received by a head office or at the place where we happen to live or in which we work? Where will a travelling seaman pay his local income tax? If local income tax is the best policy that the Liberal party has to offer for reforming our rates—it is the only one that it has produced this evening—it is clear that it has nothing to offer that will be meaningful in future.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The hon. Gentleman may not know that for many years the Liberal party has been putting forward detailed proposals for local income tax. I assure him that we are ensuring that our proposals are brought up to date and made even better in time for the next general election. The hon. Gentleman will be able to pass judgment upon them when they are placed before the electorate.

Mr. Holt: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but I have not been much encouraged by his intervention. It was a bit of flannel to cover up the fact that the Liberal party has been rumbled.

I think that most hon. Members will agree that GRE is a lottery. Several of my colleagues have already drawn attention to the way in which it is formulated. I doubt whether many members of the general public have delved into the White Paper for the purpose of bringing out some of the statistics with which local government is expected to grapple and to understand. I was a councillor for 22 years, and I never understood exactly how local government was financed.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Huh!

Mr. Holt: I doubt whether many Members of this place including the hon. Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Park), ever understood how it was done.

Mr. Park: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman does not know that I was the chairman of a local government finance committee for many years. I thought that I understood how local government was financed. That is why I said, "Huh!"

Mr. Holt: The hon. Gentleman may think that he understood it. As he was a Labour chairman of a finance committee, that suggests to me that he did not. No Labour chairman understands financing fully.

I shall refer to the details under which we are supposed to work. This is what prompted me to try to intervene during the speech of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. As I have said, he refused to allow me to do so. I think that many members of the general public would be thrown into a sense of wonderment if they knew the details with which councillors and hon. Members have to grapple when dealing with GRE.

I do not know—I am willing to allow my right hon. Friend the Minister to intervene to explain this to me—whether the Treasury sets a global figure for all time and whether everyone within the Department of the Environment has to work within that constraining figure. Alternatively, is someone confronted with all the statistics and indices which are contained in the White Paper and required to work with them carefully and diligently in coming to a conclusion? There is every chance that the person who does that will find that he has overshot the Treasury target by several thousand millions of pounds.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey referred to the figures in the White Paper and said that there were too few of a fine-tuning nature. An example of detail is to be found on page 66 where, under the heading,

"Children aged 5-17—factor for residential care",

we are told that

"(X6) is calculated as the number of children aged 5-17 in the area of the authority, multiplied by the sum of the factors below:

(i) a constant of −0·0033014;

(ii) Indicator X4 as defined above, multiplied by 0·000028512;

(iii) Indicator X5 as defined above, multiplied by −0·000016818 ;

(iv) the proportion of children aged 5-17 in households that contain a lone-parent family as estimated by the Secretary of State on the basis of the 1981 Census, multiplied by 0·04786."

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Is that why my local ratepayers are facing a rate increase of up to 42 per cent. this year?

Mr. Holt: I am not qualified to answer my hon. Friend's question. However, if those who are setting the rate within my hon. Friend's constituency even understand the formulae, they are doing extremely well. That is only one of the marvellous elements which, when combined, produce GRE at the end of the day.

We are told at the beginning of annex K that GREs have been calculated by means of previous years. However, the marginal indicators are minus 0·000 something. What happens if the sum total overshoots or undershoots the Treasury target? Does someone have to revise the noughts, the pluses, the minuses and the indices so that local government can understand exactly what is happening? It would not be too bad if these nonsensical figures were themselves understood to be of relevance in assessing rates in a local area. They do not take sufficient notice of whether an area is in the north or the south.

"a formula which is a development of that used for"

Another interesting section is to be found on page 55. B12 is followed by the heading "Weather adjustment factor for road maintenance".

The first subsection states:

"the annual average number of days of snow-lying during 1979/80 to 1981/82 as estimated by the Secretary of State for Transport, multiplied by 7·10522."

That is followed by

"the annual average number of days of frost during 1979-80 to 1981-82 as estimated by the Secretary of State for Transport, multiplied by 0·77115."

That is the road/weather adjustment factor for maintenance purposes that is supplied by the GRE assessors for local government departments.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): Does my hon. Friend agree that the scheme or system was invented by idiots and applied by fools for the benefit of no one in particular?

Mr. Holt: I suggest that I am not qualified to answer my hon. Friend's question. That is an issue on which everyone should make up his own mind. A factor in which we are all interested is unemployment. C9, which is headed "Total unemployment", states:

"The number of persons who were in receipt of unemployment benefit at May 1984 as estimated by the Secretary of State on the basis of information supplied to him by the Secretary of State for Employment."

There is no factorising there. No account is taken of whether unemployment is long-term, short-term, medium-term or permanent. That is one more example of the calculative methods by which GRE is put together.

I do not feel sorry for my colleagues on the Government Front Bench, for they are big enough to look after themselves. I am not sorry for Opposition Members, because I do not have much time for the majority of them in any event. I feel sorry for the civil servants. They must work with and understand these methods. I do not know how they cope with the mass of figures which no one else understands.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that if this system has become the law of the land, one should not have any sympathy with the civil servants? They obviously are the power in the land, because they have in their captivity all those who do not understand the system. They will not let those people be free, so they must struggle out. The sympathy of the good Conservative Members behind the hon. Gentleman for the people who may well be the GRE assessors is probably a little out of place. We should have more sympathy for the rest of the people, who are their prisoners for a long time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I remind the House that Mr. Speaker appealed for brevity. Interventions make speeches even longer. A number of hon. Members are still waiting to catch my eye.

Mr. Holt: I accept your stricture, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I come to the real reason why I wished to intervene in this debate. We have had all the fine tuning and figures. This morning I recevied a missive from Cleveland county council. There are six Members of Parliament from Cleveland, five of them Socialists. Not one of the five Socialists has been in the Chamber at any time during the debate. Perhaps that reflects the fact that the Tory party is to take over in Cleveland shortly and the Labour party has already washed its hands of it.

That is possibly why I received that missive, which asked me whether I would draw to the attention of the Secretary of State the fact that Cleveland was upset, not by the GREA machinations, but by the fact that between last year and this year, according to the civil servants who do not make the mistakes to which the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey referred, the county of Cleveland has shrunk. It may well be that the population has moved, but it takes some believing to accept that a geographical land mass change is sufficient reason to justify an alteration in GREA.

The letter from the chief executive of Cleveland county council stated:

"The error has been pointed out to the Department of the Environment. The Department accept that the area used is wrong".

Mr. Wilkinson: Coastal erosion.

Mr. Holt: There is a little, but not that much. The Department is using a different ordnance survey from the one used last year. The result is that £221,000 has been wiped off from Cleveland's GREA. The Cleveland council is a profligate Labour-controlled authority, and I have little brief for that body in that respect. The council is, however, entitled at least to the honest effects of the rules as long as those rules exist.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is to move the GREA and the grants, but he is moving the goal posts by changing the land mass area of Cleveland during the 12 months. Worse still, having admitted the error, the Department is not prepared to correct it until some time in the future. Because of a simple error by the Department of the Environment, every ratepayer in Cleveland will have to pay extra next year. I hope that, if nothing else comes from the debate today, my right hon. Friend will take on board the need for something which is so complex and misunderstood as the current system to be urgently reviewed. I shall vote with the Government, but I shall do so out of loyalty and not conviction. Next time, I might change my mind.

8.33 pm

Mr. Stan Thorne (Preston): A number of hon. Members have said that they served their apprenticeship in local government, and I am no exception. During the 1960s and early 1970s, there was some concern about the services that local authorities were providing. Looking at the services provided by local authorities attempting to meet social needs—whether in social services, housing or education—one must feel that councillors taking on the responsibility of local government do so with a definite commitment. As the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) attempted to suggest, councillors may have had an education that is not adequate to equip them to deal with the responsibility of local government in terms of finance and so on, and that is understandable. The Labour and Conservative parties have failed to give the type of training and skills to our local councillors that should have been provided. Generally, councillors attempt to meet their responsibilities and commitments. They do so not lightly, but in their determination to oppose cuts in services that are not in accordance with their views on what local authorities should be providing.

The Government are changing the word "needs" to "targets". Those targets are to be determined by central Government, thereby reducing local authorities to mere instruments of Government policy. It is no wonder that the Government see elections in Greater London as superfluous. Local government is a major aspect of our form of democracy. I use the word "democracy" with some trepidation, because it is almost non-existent in Britain today.

The rate support grant measures, far from protecting ratepayers, will mean cuts in jobs and services. Certain jargon appears to be relevant these days when debating expenditure by local government. Reference is made to low and high-spending authorities. It is fairly clear, especially when listening to Conservative Members, that low-spending authorities are apparently responsible bodies according to the Government's Victorian values. The Secretary of State or other Ministers have given no specific examples of what irresponsible spending is. Is it irresponsible to provide bus passes for the elderly, old people's homes, sheltered accommodation, community centres for young people, meals on wheels, and nursery facilities and to adapt property for disabled people in need? We in Lancashire seek to meet those needs as far as we are able, given the resources available to us.

The rate support grant in Lancashire will be £24 million less than if the current year's percentage had been maintained. That is equivalent to a precept of 17p in the pound. Grant penalties could ensue to the county council if it spends up to the Government's GRE formula, as my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) said. The penalties would have to be met from the rates. Some local authorities may find it acceptable to reduce services and to create further unemployment, but they have a responsibility to defend the interests of their local residents. The statutory political and moral obligations of local authorities are held by many local Labour councillors as serious responsibilities to uphold, and rightly so. To protect the elderly, the sick, the young and the disabled is the responsibility of local authorities. Many of them will not accept the Government's clear dictates directed towards ignoring those responsibilities. In essence, local authorities are asked to collect more in rates and to provide fewer services.

Yesterday we debated unemployment. Today we do not hear from the Government how they intend to reduce unemployment; we hear the direct opposite. An increase in unemployment of between 70,000 and 80,000 will be the product of the Government's rate support grant proposals. The Government have been trying to get across the idea that they care about unemployment, but this measure proves beyond doubt that unemployment is an instrument of economic control for the Government to which they are fully committed. The people of Britain may appear to be slow to grasp that fundamental point, but I am convinced that unemployment will yet be the basis of the Government's ultimate downfall.

8.40 pm

Mr. Warren Hawksley (The Wrekin): I do not wish to follow the line of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne); I wish to be unashamedly parochial. Most speakers have been parochial today and that is right on an occasion such as this. I also hope to be brief, but as I served on a county council for 12 years, I think that I can offer some explanation of why Shropshire county council feels bitter about the way that it has been treated under the orders that we are discussing.

I served for four years as chairman of Shropshire county council's general purposes sub-committee. During that period it was a responsible authority. During the period of the previous Labour Government when the IMF had to come in and bail them out and we saw even greater public expenditure cuts than we are seeing today, Shropshire county council, then a Conservative-controlled authority, responded to the Government's demands and cut its expenditure in line with Government requests. Ever since, Shropshire county council has responded to the needs and requests of Government, yet today it finds itself with problems. It is unfortunate that by these orders we should again appear to be hurting those authorities which have shown prudence in recent years. It is paying a heavy price for the responsibility that it has shown.

Irresponsible authorities which have occasionally spent money as if it were going out of fashion even today can possibly find room for further cuts, but responsible authorities do not have that option. By using the year that the Government use as the base for their calculations, they are creating problems for those authorities which were responsible when it was not fashionable to be so. The Government should not penalise the authorities which were good boys in those days.

The Government are right to tackle overall local government expenditure. They should not increase the total amount of local government expenditure; they should consider carefully the way in which they allocate the money that they have available.

My arguments on the rate support grant order will not be about the total amount of money available, as Members on both sides have argued. My arguments will not lead me to vote against the Government or abstain, like some of my hon. Friends. That is not because I think of the orders as great support for local government but because the Department of the Environment and the Government generally have supported Shropshire and Telford in other ways. They have supported the new town of Telford, given us a new motorway, a new hospital, regional aid and an enterprise zone, but with a 22 per cent. unemployment rate, the rate support grant should also be used to help councils in the area. It is not enough to suggest that all the other aid can, by itself, respond to our needs.

Shropshire is the fourth hardest hit of the shire counties. Its social services are running at 75 per cent. of the national norm. That has been the case for some years. We do not complain about that; we are happy to run them more cheaply than some other areas. It shows that we have tried to run local government as cheaply as we can.

Last year, as has been mentioned, we were given a pledge by the Secretary of State in the RSG debate. It is right that the House should hear the wording in which it was given. He said:

> "I would expect in 1985-86 and thereafter to be able to set targets which take greater account of GREs and thus recognise the efforts which low-spending authorities have made." — [Official Report, 23 January 1984; Vol. 52, c. 642.]

What has happened in Shropshire? Last year, the gap between GREA and target was 5·4 per cent. This year it is 8·9 per cent. The move has been in the wrong direction. Despite the 4·5 per cent. spoken of by the Secretary of State when he started the debate, the anomalies of the responsible low-spending authorities have not been tackled this year. I hope that when my right hon. Friend replies he will tackle the problems that will arise. Although I shall support the Government tonight, the problems will be even greater next year if we do not have a stronger and clearer commitment than the one we had last year, so that there can be no getting out of what last year we thought was a commitment. Shropshire based its budgeting on the assumption that there would be action.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I hope that my hon. Friend realises that his speech is one that I should have made if I were going to be called. If for Shropshire one reads Wirral district council, I should have made exactly the same speech. Does he accept that the only way that we will solve this ridiculous problem, whether it be in Shropshire, Cleveland or Wirral, is by a fundamental review of local government finance? If we have to go through this procedure time and time again, the Government will have to accept that those of us who are loyal to their macro-economic policy will lose patience.

Mr. Hawksley: I agree with my hon. Friend's comments, but I do not think that that is relevant to the debate today. As the Inland Revenue computer centre is in my constituency, I should encourage the idea of moving to local income tax to replace the rates. That has been advocated by other hon. Members.

About nine months ago, Shropshire county council expressed anxiety at the lack of capital for educational work. I took a delegation to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. As a result, he sent one of his officials to Shropshire to see what the position was. He reported to my right hon. Friend and as a result the capital allocation for education in Shropshire was increased from £2·1 million to £3·9 million but—this is the important point — no allowance has been made in the rate support grant for the extra revenue which is necessary to go with that capital. One Secretary of State accepts the need, so I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment can work in tandem to provide the necessary resources. The cost to the revenue is about £250,000, which is a large sum to a small rural county. I ask the Secretary of State to repeat with greater strength the commitment that he made last year.

Problems also arise at district council level. Wrekin district council is Labour-controlled. The county council has no overall political control. The Labour authority shouts along political lines even before it is affected, made dire forecasts of its rate increase. Its target is way below its GREA, which I gather is common for district councils in areas which have new towns. I wonder whether the needs of the new town possibly throw out the GREA calculation in some way. There would seem to be the possibility of some problems in that respect. Perhaps in reply the Minister will say whether the GREA for new towns in district council areas is accurate.

Wrekin district council has suffered through the reduction in the block grant this year, but before I support its protestations I suggest that, as a fairly high spending Labour council, it should put its own house in order. I will give some examples of its expenditure. The council has a lottery in the neighbourhood which is supposed to help with, for example, appeals and social services. This year resources have been allocated from that lottery to the striking miners—of whom, I am glad to say, there are very few in Shropshire. Resources have also been allocated to the local Anti-Apartheid organisation, which does not have much relevance to the electors of the Wrekin area.

The council has a public relations department which employs three officers full time, as far as I can see, on Labour party political propaganda. Our county council, which has a budget of about £150 million, recently discussed whether it needed a public relations officer. It decided that it did not. Some of the Socialists on the county council led the attack against the proposal. The district council's budget is about one twentieth of that of the county council, yet the district council is employing three such officers. The county council reckons that the cost of a public relations officer would have been about £30,000. The district council must therefore be spending about £100,000 on political propaganda.

The district council prints a broadsheet, the "Wrekin Report", which could be produced, I should have thought, by Transport house. It has nothing to do with providing information to the electorate; it is purely and simply a political document. Until such time as the district council is prepared to cut out those frivolous expenses, my support —however hard the council has been treated under the block grant—will not go to it.

I finish where I started, by appealing to the Secretary of State to think again and to make sure that the shire counties have a better settlement, and the GREA is used as a basis for targets. The problems that the treasurer, the members of the Shropshire county council and I foresee as being even worse next year should not be allowed to develop. It is important to be fair to those authorities which have been so good over the years.

8.52 pm

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): I do not suppose that anything that has been said during the debate will make much difference to the outcome. However, I am amazed that from all parts of the House — from the Conservative, the Labour and the Liberal parties—there has been a very good coverage of the criticisms of GREA and the way that the rates are assessed by each county borough or county council. Although, as I have said, it will not make much difference to the outcome, surely the Minister in his reply, and in the coming months, must look seriously at the anomalies, discrepancies and injustices created by GREA throughout the country.

We all compare our own areas with similar areas. Many anomalies have appeared within the area that I represent, and they have still to be dealt with by the Government. The Minister and the Government have been asked why they have produced a rate settlement such as the one before us.

The 1985-86 GREA for Sheffield has been assessed at £187·1 million—an increase of 3·5 per cent. on 1984-85 —yet the national average is 6·7 per cent. Perhaps it is thought that Sheffield does not have problems connected with unemployment, the environment or the elderly, but that is not so. Although we are to some extent getting used to the difficulties which arise from the reduction of grant from central Government, the situation is getting out of hand. The city council has been accustomed to adverse RSG settlements. It has been calculated that the combination of all overall grant reductions, cash limiting and distributional charges caused by GREA, as well as tapering and penalties, has cost the city £151 million since 1980-81 — in other words, that money has been taken from the Sheffield ratepayers.

I cannot understand why Conservative Members are always criticising the high spenders when areas such as Sheffield could, if it had not been for so many penalties and cuts, have provided the same services last year without any increase in rates. I do not think it is fair for the Minister to say that the Government are looking after the ratepayers' interests when the Government have made the position worse than it need be. Indeed, in some cases the situation would not have been at all bad. The problem seems to be related to the complications of GREA itself, as many hon. Members have said.

The Minister should endeavour to convince the House that the system is fair. In the Sheffield area, in regard to museums and arts, the GREA element is calculated according to shopping and floor space. Obviously, there is no direct relationship between the authority's function in providing museums and arts and the area of shopping floor space. Over 50 per cent. of the Sheffield GREA is calculated by reference to school pupil numbers. The calculation assumes that expenditure changes result from changes in pupil numbers occurring within 18 months. The Department of Education and Science knows and recognises that such is not the case; thus, the calculation is wrong. The cost is 10 per cent. of the education budget in Sheffield, and there is a reduction of £5·5 million in 1985-86.

With regard to education for people over 16 — a statutory obligation—the GREA assessment is made by reference to the number of pupils in education at the time in question. But that is only half the calculation, because the demand for that sort of education is much higher. It is estimated that another 600 full-time places could be filled if the city council could provide the facilities. Obviously, with the present restrictions, it cannot do so. Ironically, because the places cannot be created to meet the demand, the city is penalised even further in GREA, to the tune of £1·2 million.

I should like to refer to the Library service. Everyone has libraries, but in the calculation no consideration is given to the fact that we are a major polytechnic and university city. Thousands of students who use the facilities are not brought into the calculation. I refer also to environmental health. No calculation is made of the special circumstances of industrial decline over the past 10 years. We also have problems of air, water and land pollution that are not given fair consideration when GREA is calculated. Finally, I refer to the elderly. Sheffield has one of the highest numbers of elderly of the major cities, yet that is not properly calculated for in the GREA.

Whether hon. Members vote for or against the report, the Minister must justify carrying on without taking into consideration all the points that have been made. It is hardly fair on authorities, whether they are considered good or bad, to have to struggle on year after year with this crazy system of GREA.

9 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): I thought for a moment that the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) was going to be unique in the debate and complete a whole speech from the Conservative Benches without uttering a single word of criticism of the Government. However, he did not break ranks, as I originally thought he would. With his contribution, speeches from Conservative Back Benchers were completed with not a single Member speaking in full support of the Government. Not one Opposition Member spoke in support of the Government either. Conservative Members will make up their minds whether to drag their feet or sit on their hands in the Chamber when we vote, but there is virtually no support on either side of the House for the settlement.

We have had some excellent speeches from the Opposition. I show no favouritism when I commend in particular my hon. Friends the Members for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and for Preston (Mr. Thorne). I note the fact that all three Labour Members representing Lancashire have spoken—or are speaking—in the debate and that not a single Conservative Member from Lancashire has even deigned to be present during a debate of critical importance for our county.

I welcome the Minister of State to what I think will be his maiden speech on the rate support grant. Perhaps this is yet another occasion on which he wishes that he was back in the calm waters of the Department of Trade and Industry or anywhere but enveloped by GREA — an animal to be found only in the zoo.

Over the past five years we have witnessed the application of an ever-tightening vice over local authorities by the Treasury and the Department of the Environment. Long-standing conventions—which were respected by both sides — governing the relationship between the Government and local authorities and operated by both parties over many decades, have been unilaterally jettisoned. The Conservative party, once the champion of local democracy and choice, has become its destroyer. Sir Winston Churchill's famous injunction to "set the people free" has been turned upon its head to "set the people free to do as this Administration tells them." Even the much more recent pledge, under which all members of the Conservative party were enjoined to roll back the frontiers of the state, has been torn up. Instead, an ever larger and more monstrous leviathan has been unleashed, in the form of the Secretary of State, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister, to devour local freedoms and arrogantly and autocratically to replace the decisions of 24,000 councillors and 500 separate communities by central diktat. The haunting spectre, the nightmare raised by the present Lord Chancellor that a Government with a large majority could become an elective dictatorship has, in large part, turned into reality.

In terms of their principles and claim to be the party of freedom, the Government have extracted a heavy price from their supporters in the country for their policies towards local government. The question that many wiser counsels on the Government Benches may ask—and, I suspect, even the Secretary of State in one of his rare moments of peace—is whether all this has been worth it. What exactly has been achieved in return for the destruction of the hallowed principles, the conventions governing the relationship between the Government and local authorities, and the destruction of some ministerial reputations besides?

If there has been a major shift in power between town hall and Whitehall over the past five years, there has also been a major shift in Whitehall itself, from the headquarters of the Department of the Environment in Marsham street to the corridors of the Treasury in Great George street. Local government has been sacrificed and the Department of the Environment Ministers sometimes nearly crucified upon the alter of pseudo-monetarism. What that one true believer, the Chancellor, has asserted and will assert is that controlling the totality of local authorities' current and capital expenditure is central and essential to the cause of the Government's economic policy.

What I have to say to the House—I address my remarks particularly to Conservative Members—is that, even within the criteria set by the Chancellor for the success of this policy, the case for controlling local authority expenditure in the present way is wholly unjustified. It is that case that I first wish to examine by reference to our own recent history and by reference to the current practice of other countries more successful than we are.

Local authorities, as the Secretary of State told the House earlier today, spend £24,000 billion each year. It is a large sum, of which just under half is met by central Government and the other half from local revenue—principally the rates, charges and rents. What local authorities spend in totality is classed as public expenditure. The Pavlovian response of the Chancellor, when challenged upon this, is to say that unless all public spending is strictly controlled, the whole of the Government's economic strategy will be knocked off course.

I am self-evidently not a monetarist economist—there are very few of these, and it is an ever-diminishing breed — but, even for those who are, control of public expenditure is not an end in itself but a means to the end of controlling the things about which monetarists worry — the money supply, the public sector borrowing requirement and, they say, through both of those, the rate of inflation.

The Government's fundamental error is to believe that what local authorities spend from their own local revenue can have any significant effect upon public borrowing or through that upon the money supply, interest rates and the rate of inflation. Local authorities are not allowed by law to borrow to finance their current spending. That means that except in the most marginal and indirect way what local authorities spend out of their own current resources cannot affect the monetary aggregates upon which the Government—not we—say that their policy should be judged.

In short, the Government have made a rod for their own back by seeking to control that which there is no need directly to control, even within the terms of their own policy.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Perhaps I may cast the hon. Gentleman's mind back to the passage from the memoirs of Lord Barnett in which he explained that the Labour Government took a totally different view and in fact insisted on regarding local authority current spending as part of total public spending.

In those circumstances, is the hon. Gentleman now saying that the Labour Government got it all wrong and that the Opposition are going to pursue an entirely different policy?

Mr. Straw: I am happy to reply to the point raised by the Secretary of State. Indeed, I anticipated it in my speech.

There is a fundamental distinction in terms of practice between this Government and the last Labour Government, and that concerns the control that the Government are exercising. This Government have viewed all items within the public expenditure survey operation as items which have to be directly the subject of control. I fully accept that in terms of public expenditure conventions the die was cast in 1962 when the Plowden committee recommended the present system of public expenditure survey committee. The fundamental difference is that, even though Plowden recommended, and Otto Clarke implemented, that all local authority public expenditure should be classed as public spending, initially that was only for the purposes of indicative planning by the Treasury to give it an idea of what was happening elsewhere in the economy, not for the purpose of control.

I accept that the last Labour Government introduced cash limits over their expenditure. I have no objection to that; nor do I have any objection to cash limits over rate support grant. It is the duty of any institution with responsibility for public money to ensure that it spends that money wisely and efficiently, and cash limits in my judgment are one way of ensuring this. We have never questioned—and neither did Mrs. Margaret Hodge, the leader of Islington council, who appeared recently on television, dispute—the right of central Government to close-end and cash limit what they gave to local authorities. We will argue about the amount as we are doing tonight, but none of us has said that central Government are not entitled to say, "That is the amount, and no more."

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: This is very important. The hon. Gentleman's argument simply will not wash. My quotation from Lord Barnett makes it abundantly clear that the Labour Government used the rate support grant not just to close-end the amount of Government grant to local authorities, but to reduce the percentage so as to reduce local authority current spending. I shall not read the quotation again. That is what Lord Barnett said and that is what the Labour Government were trying to do.

Mr. Straw: The Secretary of State ignores the fundamental difference in the relationship between central and local government before 1979 and now. I anticipated all those questions. Of course central Government have sought in the past and will seek in the future to influence what local authorities do, just as local government seeks to influence what central Government do, but there is a fundamental difference in terms of the democratic balance of power between seeking to influence what an institution does and seeking directly to control it. Since 1979, the Secretary of State and his predecessors have sought to break the convention that Governments should control what they give to local authorities and to seek in various ways to influence what authorities do and to say that in future central Government should wholly control all local authority spending, leaving the authorities no discretion whatever. If the Secretary of State thinks that the present system is the same as that operated by the Labour Government, he should ask the local authorities themselves. Conservative and Labour-controlled authorities and the Association of County Councils will tell him that there has been a fundamental change and that they want the old system back.

Mr. Norman Atkinson: The Government, and especially the present Secretary of State, have said that they have no objection to local authorities selling off their assets to fund their services so long as they pay their penalty to the Government. The Government deserve even more condemnation if they are not just seeking to control local authority expenditure with certain qualifications but actually encouraging local authorities to do their own asset stripping to fund their services.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I did not say that.

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Atkinson) is quite right. There are all kinds of anomalies, even in the present public expenditure conventions.

We must deal with the fundamental argument here. I have taken part in more debates on this than I care to recall. The Secretary of State has constantly claimed that local government expenditure is part of public expenditure and must therefore be controlled in totality, but he has never answered our point, with which some Conservative Back Benchers agree, that what local authorities spend out of current resources does not and cannot affect the things that the Government regard as the test of their economic policy—the money supply, the public sector borrowing requirement and interest rates.

It is essential that the Government address themselves to that point. Let them consider the example of other countries. The United States and West Germany have both to some extent been following monetarist policies—certainly until 1982 in the United States, and until now in West Germany. Both those countries are more successful than ours, but neither seeks centrally to control local authority expenditure. The Secretary of State may argue that they are federal countries. Constitutionally that is so, but they are as unitary in economic terms as this country. If they do not find it necessary to control local authority expenditure but still have more successful economies than ours, why is such control so necessary here?

Ten years ago, the Prime Minister, when she was the Shadow Environment spokesman, promised to abolish domestic rates. That promise was repeated in the 1979 Conservative manifesto. Worn down by utter failure in that respect, the Prime Minister has sentenced the Minister for Local Government to the purgatory of seeking to redeem her pledges. If he succeeds, no doubt the right hon. Lady will claim the credit. If he fails, his efforts to reach the Cabinet Room will be thwarted—at least under the present Prime Minister.

After four major Acts, GREAs, targets, rate-capping and endless Green and White Papers, we are now to have a fundamental review of local government finances. We wish the Minister nothing but well, and look forward to the results. However, unless the review addresses the central economic question, it will not lead to the removal of the fetters on local democracy, which Conservative councillors seek as ardently as do the Opposition.

The Minister must not deceive himself into believing that there is a middle way. The hon. Member for The Wrekin and the Association of County Councils have suggested that the local authorities' tax base should be broadened to include a local income or sales tax and that the central Government grant should be correspondingly reduced from half—as it is today—to, say, a quarter. In fact, the broadening of the local government tax base would not make the slightest difference to the Treasury's present case for controlling every penny spent by local government. The Treasury and the Chancellor wrongly, but powerfully, believe that every pound of local government expenditure must be controlled by the state, whatever its source. The proof of that lies in the fact that, contrary to the conventional wisdom of Layfield and many others, control has increased as the contribution of central Government has decreased.

Central Government's control is greatest where its contribution is tiniest. Central Government now seeks control of the total expenditure of Islington, Camden, the GLC and ILEA, while those authorities have received not a penny from central Government or from the Treasury.

If the Minister is to spring out of the trap in which he and the local authorities are currently imprisoned, he must first fundamentally challenge the accounting conventions which are the gaoler. It is often assumed that those conventions are God-given, permanent and value-free. They are not. They are man-made and politically weighted, and they can be changed.

The Secretary of State referred to the example of the Labour Government. In 1976, the present right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins), a member of that Government, made a speech in Llangefni in which he said that with public expenditure crossing the boundary of 60 per cent. we were close to the frontiers of social democracy. Six months later the Treasury reworked the conventions, and it appeared that public spending was not 60 per cent. but 47 per cent.

Mr. David Howell: The hon. Gentleman says that the convention that all local authority spending should be controlled is man-made. Would he agree that the conventions were established by the Labour Government in 1976?

Mr. Straw: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman was not present during my exchanges with the Secretary of State at the beginning of my speech. As I have said, there is a fundamental distinction between the practice of previous Governments of both major parties, who sought to influence the level of local government expenditure, and the practice of the present Government. If I seek to influence an institution, I respect its right to do something different if it disagrees with me. That principle is fundamental to the democratic balance. The present Government seek to control local authorities and, in doing so, to take away their democratic rights altogether.

In short, there is no economic justification for this monstrous system of controls. However, the system is doubly damned because it has not even worked out as Ministers intended. Ministers have claimed to be anxious about rate increases, but their policies have led directly to rate rises which have been far faster than the general rate of inflation. No doubt the Minister for Local Government will rattle through a list of figures showing how, year by year, the rate of increase in rates has declined. He will not say, however, that, year by year, rate rises have been far higher than the rate of inflation. Since 1978-79, rates have increased by 141 per cent., whereas prices have risen by 50 per cent. The Tory-dominated Association of County Councils has said that the reason for the increase in rates above the rate of inflation is the direct responsibility of the Government in cutting grant.

We must also consider the fairness of the system. The ACC has damned the settlement, complaining that it is the most complex ever in a system that is renowned for its complexity. It has challenged the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, who prayed the ACC in aid in favour of reducing grant. The Government will seek any alibi. So incensed was Mr. John Lovill who, as far as I know, is not known to be a rabid Socialist, by what the Under-Secretary of State said, that the ACC wrote to him saying that it was quite untrue that it supported such a reduction in the level of rate support grant and that it was unacceptable when accompanied by constant accusations of local authority overspending and a refusal to allow the deficiency in income to be made good from other sources.

The inequity, unfairness and sheer insanity of the present system derives from the ever more frenetic efforts of Ministers to second and third-guess decisions which should sensibly be left with councillors. It also derives from their trying to substitute bizarre mathematical formulae for individual judgments, as the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) said. He should know because I understand that he used to be in the bookmaking industry, as it is delicately described, before coming to the House. It is ironic that the modern, extremist Conservative party has become the arch practitioner of rigid central planning and control. It is ironic that, while we are opening our ears to the need for greater decentralisation and more local sensitivity, the Conservative party is closing its ears. It is extraordinary that the Conservative party, above all, should have ignored the warnings of Karl Popper—that although it is possible to centralise power, it is not possible to centralise the knowledge needed to exercise that power widely. Popper, drawing on the Tories' favourite guru, Hayek, said of the central planner:

> "Unable to ascertain what is in the minds of so many individuals, he must try to simplify his problems by eliminating individual differences . . . But this attempt to exercise power over minds must destroy the last possibility of finding out what people really think . . . Ultimately, it must destroy knowledge; and the greater the gain in power, the greater will be the loss of knowledge."

As much of what is intellectually respectable among modern Right-wing Conservatism derives from Popper and Hayek, it is time that some Conservative Members took notice of their philosophies.

Virtually every social and economic need from the cradle to the grave is now measured by GREA, but so detached have Ministers become that even the apparently simple issue of the demand for cemeteries and crematoria has not been measured, until this year, by reference to the number of people who are expected to die but by the number of people who are expected to go on living. It took the local authority associations four years to persuade the Department of the Environment—the hon. Member for Langbaurgh will know that this is the E8 factor—that a better measure of the demand for cemeteries and crematoria, far from being the number of people who are likely to carry on living, is the number of people who are likely to die. It is no wonder that we are in a mess.

GREA is bad enough, but now, quite contrary to the undertakings that have been given, it is used not merely to allocate grant but as a means of control. In addition, we have target, which is based on separate yardsticks and is inconsistent and in conflict with GREAs. One measure tells authorities what they need to spend and the other tells them what they will be allowed to spend. Of the 39 shire counties, 38 find that their target is below their GREA and that they will therefore be penalised heavily by the Government if they do no more than spend the Government's own assessment of their needs. The Government have consistently sought to hit at Labour authorities working in areas of serious social and economic need. The settlement will do so again.

Some authorities have been rate-capped and their position is worse. All face cuts. Some, like Hackney and Haringey, face catastrophe. Some, like Leicester, have been told that they have got to cut their rate by 50 per cent. even though, if the assumptions were correct, that would lead to a doubling of their rate next year.

I have not been in the Chamber all day so I did not get this at first hand, but I understand that rate-capped and high penalty authorities have decided today to seek a collective meeting with the Secretary of State to put forward representations about the dire problems they face. The hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) spoke of the impossible position of Conservative authorities. Labour authorities are in the same difficulty. It is the hope of all my hon. Friends that that meeting will be fruitful and that the Secretary of State will recognise that he is pushing authorities into a corner from which they may not reasonably be able to extract themselves.

In regard to the shire counties and Conservative authorities, last year Environment Ministers staved off a major Back Bench rebellion only by giving promises to the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) of better things to come. The hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) gave a categorical "yes" when asked by his right hon. Friend:

> "from 1985-86 and thereafter, will the Minister be fairer to the low-spending authorities than his statement suggests?—[Official Report, 23 January 1984; Vol. 52, c. 737.]

I remind the Minister and Government Back Benchers that that promise has not been met.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Hear, hear.

Mr. Straw: That "Hear, hear" came from the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) on the Government's Back Benches.

Hon. Members need not take this from me. They should have listened to the comments of their hon. Friends and of the Association of County Councils. The hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) described the settlement as manifestly unjust. The hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) said that his authority had been kicked in the teeth. We have heard many similar epithets about the settlement.

The final absurdity about the system, if it can be adorned with that name, that the Government have created, is that the Government claim that they have had to hit Labour overspenders so as to help Conservative underspenders. Some hon. Members on the Government Benches understand this, but it is so bizarre that most people turn off when it is explained to them. So crazy is the system that Conservative underspenders have only escaped even more massive cuts in grants and increases in rates because of overspending by Labour authorities.

If the Government's policy for Labour authorities works, if those authorities sack staff by the thousand and make massive cuts to meet the Government's targets, who will benefit? Not the low-spending shire authorities—quite the reverse. As expenditure came down in the high-spending Labour authorities, they would earn more grant. As the Treasury will not give the Secretary of State more total grant, the additional grant for the Labour authorities would come from Conservative authorities. Hon. Members do not need to take it from me; it is in the Official Report.

When Government Back Benchers go through the Lobby tonight they should appreciate that they are voting for higher rates in their own areas. If Labour authorities meet the Government's targets, Berkshire will lose £35 million in grant and have a 20 per cent. increase in rates. The right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East is not here, but before he goes into the Lobby he should weigh with care the fact that Cambridgeshire would lose £26 million in grant and its rates would go up 21 per cent. Essex would lose £35 million in grant and its rates would go up by 25 per cent. Kent would lose £90 million in grant and its rates would go up by 35 per cent. Wiltshire would lose £80 million in grant and its rates would increase by 22 per cent. West Sussex would lose so much that its rate would go up by 44 per cent. and it would get no grant at all; it would be in the same position as the GLC.

It is said that those whom the gods wish to destroy, they first make mad. This is a mad, crazy system in which the Secretary of State has imprisoned himself and the other authorities. If he were kicking the guts out of Labour authorities, one would have thought that at the very least Conservative authorities would benefit, but not a bit of it. If that policy works, and Labour authorities sack thousands of people, the result will be cuts among Conservative authorities and massive rate rises. That is written in the Minister's own answers.

The Government's policy towards local government is bereft of compassion, comprehension and common sense. The system that they have created defies rational analysis or explanation. It savages authorities which spend too much and impoverishes those which spend too little. Above all, this system has already destroyed local choice and freedom in pursuit of an utterly bankrupt economic policy. If carried through, it will destroy thousands of jobs and undermine the quality of life for millions of our citizens. That will be the consequence if this report is approved. That is why the Labour Opposition condemn it utterly and will vote against it tonight.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Kenneth Baker): As the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) said, this is my maiden speech in a rate support grant debate. In the years that I have been in the House, when I have looked in on such debates, I have soon found that on the whole hon. Members keep away from them unless they have been alerted to attend by their local authorities. Rates debates are occasions when the disgruntled speak to the disenchanted in front of the disbelieving. Every system of rate support, including the one which existed in the 1960s and 1970s, is well nigh incomprehensible and is understood only by the initiated. Thankfully, few hon. Members wish to be initiated.

I accept that the system is byzantine in its complexity and that it is probably fully comprehended only by those who have a taste for scholastic theology. I can only recall the remarks of Palmerston on the Schleswig-Holstein question last century, when he said that only three people understood it—himself, a Danish professor who was in an asylum and a third who had died.

I appreciate that it is exceptionally difficult to explain our system and that in double quick time, in attempting to discuss it, one sinks into a jargon which Mr. Edward Pearce of The Daily Telegraph referred to as "the verbal sludge of municipal speak". Therefore, I have every sympathy with those on both sides of the House who are impatient with this system and want to see one that is more easily understood and more predictable in its effect.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) made that point in his speech when he called for a more strategic, systematic and sustainable way of running our affairs. My right hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour) also made that point, as did my hon. Friends the Members for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) and for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt). They welcomed the review that I am undertaking. So did the hon. Member for Blackburn, who, in an elegant and interesting speech—it was a pity that more of his hon. Friends were not present to hear it—addressed himself to some of the fundamental issues which I shall have to include in the review. In that review it will be possible to cover some of the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill), who referred to the extreme differences in rateable resources. Inevitably, such questions will have to be considered in the review.

I noted the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) who pressed me to consider the fundamental changes that are needed.

Mr. Bowen Wells: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Baker: I hope that my hon. Friend will allow me to press on for a moment, because I should like to answer the points that have been raised.

My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) spoke about Hillingdon. I very much appreciate the efforts made by Hillingdon council to reduce the high level of spending that it inherited. I regret that in a year when we have provided more favourable targets for most authorities, we have not been able to do as much as it would have liked.

Mr. Wilkinson: I appreciate, as always, my right hon. Friend's generous sentiments, but I must vote against the settlement. Last year my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment made some reassuring remarks to my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym). We were led to expect a better settlement than this, and for that very good reason I shall not be able to support the Government.

Mr. Baker: I understand. My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) has made his position clear to me. Accompanied by his colleague the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks), he brought a delegation to see me. I shall deal shortly with the commitment on targets that was made in last year's debate. The target was directed towards low spenders.

I did not hear the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson), but I have been told what he said. I was aware of his view because he, too, brought a delegation of councillors to see my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary. I shall certainly examine the important matter of the parish council precept for his area.

My hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh, apart from supporting the review, said that apparently some acres of Cleveland county had been overlooked. If we have lost bits of Cleveland, I assure him that they will be discovered and the appropriate changes will be made.

Mr. Holt: When they have been discovered, will we receive the correct rate support grant, which we have so far been denied?

Mr. Baker: If the areas have been lost and they are discovered, justice will be done.

I enter a note of caution about the review. Any system which seeks to distribute £12 billion to over 400 local authorities by way of grant must be complex. The attempts to recognise the different resources and expenditure needs of different areas adds a great deal to the complexity. Attempts at trying to be fair in that distribution of central Government grant make the system complex.

The system which preceded that which now operates was equally complex and equally difficult to understand. It was based upon what mathematicians call regression analysis, which meant that the more one spent, the more grant one received. That gave a great boost to the continual high spenders.

One of the advantages of the present system is that it has broken the link, but it is complicated. The old system required 14 variable step-wise multi-variate regression analyses. In the late 1970s that could be done only on a computer in America. I say that because to find a system which is transparently simple and clear might be difficult. I have no shadow of doubt that I have to try to point the way towards a system which more people can understand and explain.

It is alleged that the complexity of the system increases the tension between central and local government. The real reason for so much tension about rate support is that since 1979 we have tried to restrain the total level of local authority spending. If one examines the pattern over the last 20 years, one sees that local authority spending in the 1960s and 1970s was rising by about 3·5 per cent. a year in real terms. Since we have been in office it has risen by about 1 per cent., or slightly less, in real terms per year.

The first Minister who tried to put the handbrake on local authority expenditure was Tony Crosland when, in 1976, he went to Manchester city hall and made a grave speech saying that the party was over. It was over for about a year, and then the high-spending pattern revived and we inherited a very high level and increasing rate of growth of local authority expenditure. Since 1979 we have been trying to reverse the trend, and we have had some success. However, I do not underestimate the difficulty that that imposes upon local authorities, whether Labour or Conservative.

The Government continue to keep a tight control on local authority expenditure. We have been able to set targets for 1985-86 which assist and reward the low-spending authorities. That fulfils the commitment given by my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary during the debate a year ago.

Those authorities spending just below GREA have been allowed to increase their spending by 4·5 per cent. A few authorities—those spending not only below GREA but close to target—can increase their spending by 4·625 per cent. That is much better than has been possible for the past two years. For those authorities, there should be no real cuts. I am aware that many of those authorities still feel hard done by, and some believe that the targets set for next year are still too easy for the high spenders.

Mr. Churchill: It is not correct to say that all low spenders will receive the 4·625 per cent. increase. Some, such as Trafford, are having it clawed back under the negative marginal rate. It is clear that that is not a fulfilment of the pledge given last year, because Trafford is being given £200,000 but will have £2 million taken away. For that reason I—and I am not alone in this—will have no choice but to vote against the settlement.

Mr. Baker: I appreciate my hon. Friend's point, but it is on a different part of the system. I am talking about the targets set for expenditure. The 4·625 per cent. increase applies to Trafford next year. My hon. Friend is referring to grants.

I am aware that many of the low-spending authorities still feel that the high spenders are getting away with it. That has been expressed by the leaders of some of the shire authorities. I have told them that the high spenders are not getting away with it. Targets set for overspending authorities spending above GREA have been tough. As Opposition Members have said, that has involved real reductions in expenditure—in some cases as much as 6 per cent.

The targets that we have set do not favour the high spenders, and the controls on them are threefold. First, there are tougher targets for them. The hon. Members for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) made that point. Secondly, there are higher penalties in the amount of grant that is lost if the targets are exceeded. The level of penalty has been criticised, but those who overspend their target this year will suffer a very severe cut in grant. Thirdly, the 18 high spenders have been rate-capped.

I appreciate that the low spenders feel that their regard for Government policy during the past four years has been inadequately recognised. That has been the burden of many of the comments from hon. Members from both sides of the House. My hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) made the case for the county of Shropshire and my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) made the case for Suffolk. I re-emphasise the point made by my right hon. Friend during his speech. I repeat again that we would like to abandon targets and holdback altogether, but that depends on the level of local authorities' budgets — how much they spend in the next year, 1985-86—and on the alternative pressures which can be brought to bear to achieve the delivery of the Government's public expenditure plans. We are considering various alternatives urgently to see whether they would be operable.

Mr. Charles Morrison: As my right hon. Friend began by speaking of targets with reference to tight controls and notes of caution, will he give a guarantee, looking further ahead—this is important in relation to an intervention of mine when the Secretary of State was speaking—that, whatever happens, the situation facing shire counties in 1986-87 will be better than it is now?

Mr. Baker: I remind the House that my right hon. Friend said earlier that the more favourable targets which we have been able to give low-spending authorities for 1985-86 have been possible only through the savings which have been achieved in public expenditure terms by rate capping the highest spenders. Rate capping will continue to produce savings in 1986-87 as we continue to bring down the excessive spending levels of the high spenders.

Thus, low-spending authorities will benefit from rate capping. For authorities which budget in the coming year, 1985-86, to spend at or below both target and GREA, targets for the following year, 1986-87, will take account of those further savings to be achieved from rate capping the highest spenders. To answer my hon. Friend's intervention, these low spenders' targets in 1986-87 will therefore be both more favourable than they would have been but for rate capping, and more favourable than for authorities which budget this year to spend above either target or GREA.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): As one who will be supporting my right hon. Friend in the Lobby tonight, may I remind him that many of us will be doing so because of the prospect that has been held out of targets being got rid of altogether? That cannot come too soon. I appreciate the Government's difficulty in giving commitments against the changing background of public expenditure. Nevertheless, will my right hon. Friend give to shire counties, or at least to low-spending counties, some incentive which will enable them to assist the Government to get rid of targets that have been unjust?

Mr. Baker: I shall consider what my hon. Friend has said. The undertaking that we have given is to set targets which recognise low spending by the shire counties.

Dr. Cunningham: That question was asked in last year's debate, when many Conservative Members went into the Lobby in support of the Government on the basis of the assurances that they were then given. The outcome, according to the Association of County Councils, is that the average target increase for shire counties is 4·6 per cent., compared with the national average increase in target of 6·8 per cent. It remains the position, therefore, even under the present White Paper, that the lower-spending authorities receive lower average target increases. That is the reality of the situation, so what is the right hon. Gentleman's assurance worth?

Mr. Baker: I shall tell the hon. Gentleman what it is worth. I regret that we become involved at this stage in a great deal of what I described earlier as the verbal sludge of municipal speak. The hon. Gentleman is seeking to make target-to-target comparisons, but the real measure is the target-to-budget comparison. What was said a year ago about the low-spending authorities has been met. The low-spending authorities below GRE have had increases of 4·5 per cent. The increases for the very lowest spending authorities have been 4·625 per cent. The undertakings that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have given during the debate have been explicit. The leaders of the Tory shire counties have made it clear again and again that they expect recognition to continue of their efforts to keep spending low.

The hon. Member for Blackburn made an interesting and important comment. I was delighted to hear from him that the Labour rate capped authorities are now prepared to discuss the Rates Act 1984. My right hon. Friend said last week that if they wished to meet him collectively he would be happy to see them, and the Government stand by that. The earlier the meeting, the better. However, as the circumstances of authorities vary greatly, any decision to change the rates limit of a particular authority must take account of its circumstances. I hope that the authorities will come to the meeting ready, if they wish, to make clear their views on their proposed rate limits in their respective financial positions. My right hon. Friend will be able to consider any new information before reaching his final decision.

Rate capping has been mentioned on several occasions during the debate. I remind the House that there will be other opportunities to discuss the matter, as the orders applying to the precepting and rating authorities will have to be debated. The help that we have been able to provide for the low spending shire counties this year depends essentially upon our rate capping proposals.

The proportion of local expenditure which central Government have funded through grants will fall next year from 51·9 to 48·7 per cent. That was very much the main thrust of the speech of the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). The RSG has dropped from 61 per cent. since the Conservative Government took office in 1979. We have taken this course to increase the accountability of local authorities. It is the main reason for the drop in grant to the shire counties and districts this year.

I am aware of the campaign that has been run by many of the high-spending Labour authorities against the Government's policy. They are demanding that they should be given back the grant which they would have had if the level of Government funding had remained at 61 per cent. The hon. Member for Copeland said, in effect, "When you came in, Government support was 61 per cent. It has been reduced progressively to 48·7 per cent." It is claimed by many, including many Labour Members, that the moneys which have been made available belong to the high-spending authorities. They advance the argument that the Government have stolen their grant. Some authorities seem to imagine that they have an inalienable entitlement to taxpayers' money. They imagine that they have the right to put their municipal fingers into taxpayers' pockets. It is fanciful to claim that the Government have stolen local authority grant. It is not their grant, and there is nothing special or sacred about 61 per cent.

The grant percentage is calculated each year and authorities have no right to expect their grant in any particular year to be based on what they received in any previous year. The Labour Government reduced the percentage from 66·6 per cent. in 1975-76 to 61 per cent. in 1977-78 and 1978-79. That cut, which was introduced by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, was by far the largest ever made. If one counted up all that money, one would find that by the time the Labour party left office £1·4 billion had been forgone. I never heard arguments from any Labour Members that this money should be given back.

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Gentleman should not try to mislead the House about the record of the last Labour Government. When Labour came into government the rate of grant was set at 61 per cent., and it was 61 per cent. when Labour left office. The rate was increased to 66 per cent. to cover the exceptional increase in the cost of the Houghton recommendations in 1975. The last Labour Government's record was one of maintaining the grant at above 60 per cent., and this Government's record is of cutting the grant every year, year by year.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman's figures are correct. The rate started at 61 per cent., and went up to 66 per cent. The largest single cut of central Government support to local authorities was made by the Labour Government. We believe that we have been right since 1979 to continue to reduce that grant.

Mr. Simon Hughes: We certainly accept the proposition that local authorities have no inalienable right to taxpayers' money. In return, the right hon. Gentleman must accept the proposition that, when central Government impose duties on local authorities, and when services have to be provided, money must be found from somewhere. Establishing a system which does not allow that is not justifiable by anyone's reckoning.

Mr. Baker: The present system seeks to do that, and it does so. It seeks to measure the expenditure needs of different authorities. We have heard that many hon. Members are dissatisfied, and I accept their criticisms. The system is by no means perfect. We have been right in protecting the taxpayer by reducing the amount of central Government grant to local authorities. It is often said that the consequence is an increase in the level of rates. I remind the House that the average level of rate increase has fallen during the past four years, as the hon. Member for Blackburn reminded the House. In 1980-81 there was an average increase of 27 per cent. It fell to 23 per cent., to 16 per cent., and then to 13 per cent. In the last year the average increase in domestic rate has been 6·4 per cent.—the lowest for 10 years. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will note that fact.

What policy on local government expenditure would the Opposition follow? Would they allow expenditure to go through the roof and force up rates? That idea was implicit in the speech of the hon. Member for Blackburn. Would the Opposition increase the central Exchequer grant to local authorities? That would be bound to increase taxes.

Local government expenditure can be financed from only two sources, because local authorities cannot borrow for their current spending. Local government expenditure can be financed from either rates or taxes. Several hon. Members have rightly said that it cannot be satisfactory to have rates as the single tax base because that places too great a burden on too few shoulders. Each year, a smaller number of householders pay rates. My hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch made that point, and that is one matter that I shall have to study carefully in my review.

The ratepayers know only too well which party protects their interests. This Government's record should leave them in no doubt. We have reduced the seemingly inexorable growth in spending, without unacceptable reductions in services. We have abolished supplementary rates, which has prevented ratepayers from being caned twice in one year. We have obliged all authorities to consult properly and fully with their industrial and commercial ratepayers. We have set up the Audit Commission, with a new emphasis on value for money in the provision of services. We have introduced selective rate capping to protect the ratepayers of the highest spending authorities, including the GLC, from the extravagant waste of money by those authorities on political propaganda. As my hon. Friends know, £10 million was spent by the GLC on that propaganda. What would that money have bought in terms of meals on wheels or home helps?

That is the kind of unacceptable expenditure against which we are acting. It has nothing to do with services; it is purely political. If anyone seriously believes that ratepayers would have seen such achievements under a Labour Government, I suggest that he looks again at the history books. Average rate increases have fallen in each of the past five years. That is what ratepayers want, and that is what the Government have given them. It is what the 1985-86 settlement will achieve if local authorities behave responsibly. I commend these documents to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 2) 1984/85 (House of Commons Paper No. 81), which was laid before this House on 11th December, be approved.

Rate Support Grant (England) (No. 3) 1983/84

Resolved,

That the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 3) 1983/84 (House of Commons Paper No. 82), which was laid before this House on 11th December, be approved.—[Mr. Patrick Jenkin.]

Rate Support Grant (Wales)

10.16 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): I beg to move,

That the Welsh Rate Support Grant Report 1985-86 (House of Commons Paper No. 100), which was laid before this House on 12th December, be approved.

I think that it would be for the convenience of the House to discuss also the second motion:

That the Welsh Rate Support Grant Report 1985-86 (Amendment) Report (House of Commons Paper No. 147), which was laid before this House on 10th January, be approved.

Mr. Speaker: If the House agrees, so be it.

Mr. Edwards: The amendment report corrects minor errors in some of the expenditure guidance and associated figures in the main report which arose from a programming error. I am sorry that these errors occurred, but the changes involved are very small. The largest decrease in an expenditure target is only £4,000 in a target of over £200 million. However, it is only proper that, having been identified, these errors should be corrected.

This is the fifth main Welsh rate support grant report that I have put to the House. I will first examine briefly how far the Government's objectives for local authority expenditure in Wales have been achieved and the prospects for local government expenditure in the future.

I have to make the point that, despite all the assertions to the contrary, local authority current expenditure in Wales has certainly not been slashed. On the contrary, it has grown faster than the increase in costs in the economy as a whole.

I do not under-estimate the problems that local authorities face in trying to meet the many demands made on them. They have difficult choices to make. I acknowledge as well that many authorities in Wales have made considerable efforts to contain their spending. Although some authorities are overspending against targets, the general picture taking all local authorities in Wales together is one of current expenditure now broadly under control. I hope that we can build on this and continue to release resources for capital expenditure because of the relatively good performance on current account. Clearly local authorities, if they are to achieve that objective, must continue a vigorous search for improvements in efficiency, effectiveness and economy.

In circumstances where additional resources are not available, authorities are under an obligation continually to examine in a critical and searching way the services they provide, and to check whether the pattern of services developed in the past continues to be appropriate to present and anticipated conditions. This must involve authorities in a willingness to consider alternative ways of providing services, not least through utilising the competitive power of private enterprise.

A few authorities have avoided taking the hard decisions that are necessary and have taken the easy way out, using special funds to offset against expenditure—a method sometimes known as the creative accounting route. Using special funds in this way, of course, reduces an authority's total expenditure which counts against its expenditure target, but it is only a cosmetic adjustment. The use of these special funds only puts off the day when difficult decisions about expenditure have to be taken.

Dyfed is an example of an authority now facing unnecessarily severe difficulties because it has followed such a course and deferred necessary changes over a number of years. Individual schools in Dyfed now face constraints in resources and in some cases inadequate capitation because, during the period in which school numbers were falling by 5,000, the necessary rationalisation of services was not tackled and teacher numbers were actually allowed to increase. Expenditure on education in current price terms has varied very little in the county over seven or eight years of falling school rolls and if individual schools now find themselves short of resources it can only be because Dyfed has been putting off the necessary changes that would make the most effective use of its resources.

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): Is the Secretary of State saying that the education authority should have closed more small local schools than it has in the past four or five years?

Mr. Edwards: I am saying that, if there are 5,000 fewer pupils, about the same amount of money in real terms to spend and a capitation problem for individual schools, the authority should be making changes in the structure over a period of years to adjust to the new pattern. If it fails to do that, it will face quite unnecessary problems. Of course it will involve closing some very small village schools. In the part of Dyfed where I live, one school is down to 10 pupils. When pupil numbers decline very fast, there comes a moment when the education authority faces inevitable decisions about changing the pattern of education.

It cannot be argued that Dyfed has been particularly short of total resources. Its target per head is below that of super-sparse Powys, which has the same problem of village schools or the geographically difficult county of Gwynedd, which also has the problem of rural schools, but it is nearly 8 per cent. higher than that of Northumberland, 9 per cent. higher than that of Cumbria and 14 per cent. higher than the figures for north Yorkshire and Cornwall. Its target this year is 4·6 per cent. higher than its reported adjusted budget for 1984-85, so it cannot be said that Dyfed is a county starved of resources and the authority must take at least some share of responsibility for not having faced the necessary changes in the patterns of education.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): As the Secretary of State has now admitted what we all knew already—that he is in favour of closing very small schools—will he tell us what he regards as a very small school and which schools we should expect to be closed? Will he also give a commitment that in future when small schools are closed he will ensure that money is made available to pay for transport to the alternative schools, as that is not the case at the moment?

Mr. Edwards: Clearly there comes a point at which local education authorities must balance the choices before them — maintaining very small schools, changing the pattern of education or having inadequate capitation in existing schools. The authority must make those choices in the light of the situation that it faces. It must decide whether it wishes to allocate the available resources to transport or to maintaining the existing school premises.

With the aim of helping authorities in their forward planning and to avoid this kind of situation repeating itself, I have issued indicative expenditure targets for authorities for 1986-87 and 1987-88. These figures should provide helpful guidance at the individual authority level. In aggregate, they show that on average the cost reduction sought by 1987-88 is about 2 per cent. That would bring current expenditure back to the level reached in 1979-80. Authorities spending at or below target will have an easier task than others in securing these reductions.

If 1985-86 budgets show that authorities, both individually and collectively, are on course to spend in line with the Government's expenditure plans, I will be prepared to consider, with the local authority associations, whether an alternative means of containing expenditure and encouraging moderate rate increases is possible for future years, rather than continuing with the present regime of individual authority expenditure targets and grant holdback penalties.

I have made no secret of my hope that it will be possible to remove individual targets from the system. Notwithstanding that, no one should doubt my determination to retain guidance figures if it was likely that, if we abandoned them, expenditure would exceed our plans and one or two irresponsible authorities would be enabled to act in such a way that they unduly penalised others.

I turn now to the details of the 1985-86 settlement. Any unbiased observer would agree that the settlement is fair. Indeed, the Welsh office of the Association of District Councils goes a long way towards saying so in the document issued to hon. Members. After allowing for the abolition of the national insurance surcharge on local authority employers from next April and the greater role of the Manpower Services Commission in particular areas of further education, total relevant expenditure, at £1,514 million, is about 5 per cent. more than authorities' budgets for the current year. Within this, current expenditure is about £46 million, around 3·5 per cent. higher.

Aggregate Exchequer grant, at just over £1,014 million, is almost £50 million or 5 per cent. higher than the amount that authorities have included in their budgets for the present year, after once again making due allowance for the abolition of NIS and the MSC-related changes next year. It is the increase in the amount of grant from that assumed by local authorities in the current year that is the key element when councils consider what rate or precept they need to levy next year.

For the individual authority expenditure targets, I have retained the basic method used in previous years, although I have increased the weight given to GRE. As in previous years, I have tried to balance the need to give the maximum increase to low-spending authorities, against the need to provide higher-spending authorities with realistic expenditure targets that it would be possible for them to achieve. Thus, no authority has an increase in current expenditure of less than 2 per cent. or, generally, of more than 4 per cent., although authorities spending at or below target also have a 0·5 per cent. "bonus". In other words, a good number of authorities have been offered a 4·5 per cent. increase in current expenditure, which is in line with prospective inflation.

Deciding what the upper and lower limits should be involves difficult judgments. There is, of course, no way of satisfying everyone, but experience this year, when 31 of the 45 authorities have budgeted to meet their expenditure targets, suggests that we are not likely to be far out in our judgment.

The grant-withholding penalties have been increased for 1985-86, and at the same time the limit on grant holdback for low rateable resource authorities has been slackened. I make no apologies for these tougher measures. If an authority is an overspender in a particular year then, all other things being equal, it must be rating for the resources needed to cover the amount of grant withheld. If grant-withholding penalties were not increased, the incentive to such authorities to reduce expenditure or at least ensure that it is not increased in the coming year would be that much weaker. Authorities spending at or below target continue to be completely exempt from both grant holdback and close-ending. Such authorities have a good degree of grant certainty, and that is a very important aspect of the present grant arrangement in Wales.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): One matter of great importance to my own constituency is the supplementary grant for national parks. How did the right hon. Gentleman arrive at the figure of £2·7 million in respect of this expenditure?

Mr. Edwards: The amount that we have allocated to the parks this year is generous and above the average that has been allocated elsewhere. Perhaps I might respond to the hon. Gentleman's question in more detail later.

I should like to say something about rates. In recent years, Welsh authorities generally have kept their rate increases down, although there have, on occasions, been glaring exceptions. Between 1981-82, which was the first year of the separate Welsh rate support grant settlement, and the present year, the average general rate poundage in Wales has increased by 12·3 per cent. whereas the rate of inflation for the same period, as measured by the GDP deflator, is somewhat more at 16·6 per cent. Notwithstanding this record, Opposition Members have consistently predicted average rate increases that are very much higher than, in the event, they have turned out to be. The indications that I have previously given of likely rate increases have turned out to be pretty accurate, and much more in line with what has happened than what the Opposition suggested.

As to next year, I said in December that with an increase in grant and relevant expenditure of about 5 per cent. over this year's adjusted budgets, and the continued moderation of the great majority of authorities, it should be within their power to keep rates down to levels generally comparable with inflation. Indeed, the House will have noted from an answer that I gave on Monday to my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Hooson), that if, in 1985-86, every authority were to spend in line with its expenditure target and apply, where it is able to do so, the same amount of balances as in the current year, the all-Wales average rate increase would be about 3 per cent.

Of course, there will be variations around the average. Indeed, rate reductions are possible in some authorities, particularly in the heavily rated county areas of Mid and West Glamorgan. There could well be increases above the level of inflation in other authorities, especially cases such as Dyfed where, as I have said, special funds have been applied in the past artificially to reduce total expenditure, and where such funds are no longer available. The general picture should be one of an average rate increase below the level of inflation, and I see no reason why I should not be reporting that to the House later in the year.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Would the right hon. Gentleman like to outline, for the people of Wales, what effect his prescription will have on services that are provided for them rather than indulge in the money juggling to which his party is so accustomed?

Mr. Edwards: If the hon. Gentleman had been listening, he would have heard that local authorities are this year getting rather more than the rate of inflation. In setting out the targets and the reasonable expectations for rates that I have given, there is no reason to suggest that there should be such cuts in services as he envisages.

I repeat what I said when I announced the details of the settlement in December. I regard the settlement as very fair. That this is so reflects to an extent the restraint which has been exercised this year by most Welsh authorities. There need be no slashing cuts or horrendous reductions in services if authorities generally continue to act responsibly. They can maintain and improve key services and offer us a route away from expenditure targets. Not least important, the settlement offers the prospect of rate increases which, on average, should be below the likely level of inflation. That was never in prospect under the Labour Government. I commend my proposals for the 1985-86 Welsh rate support grant settlement to the House.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): The Secretary of State confessed to a blunder with regard to some of the inaccuracies in the report, and he is contrite. When the Welsh local authorities exceed their targets, the full majesty of the Secretary of State's penalty system crushes them. Welsh local authorities pay far too heavily for their errors on targets. I hope the right hon. Gentleman has not vented his spleen for this error upon his officials, because they operate a system of great complexity. Local authorities have consistently warned him of this. Surely with this system he is straining to the limit a Department which may be insufficiently staffed.

When I was thinking about how the error happened, I came across a press release entitled "Minister to meet brewers" which said that the Minister of State, Welsh Office would tour the Whitbread brewery in Gwent. It further said:

> "He will also discuss the brewing industry's campaign for liberalisation of the licensing laws."

Of course, the Minister of State is a very sober man, but we are perplexed as to how the error happened.

The right hon. Gentleman paid tribute to Welsh local authorities for restraining their expenditure. Nevertheless, an extremely harsh grant penalty regime has been introduced. The grant holdback scheme is to be twice as severe. The overall rate of Government grant is to be cut. The Government continue the policy of transferring the burden from the taxpayer to the ratepayer. Our local authorities are anxious about the allowances that may be made in next year's settlement with regard to the effect of pay awards. Some awards for last year, I believe, have still to be settled.

In regard to penalties, the right hon. Gentleman referred to the holdback limiter. To sharpen further the effect of penalties he has proposed to halve what is described as the limiter. As the House knows, this device modifies the penalty system for low resource authorities. It helps them because they need help. I have calculated that Mid-Glamorgan is one of the most disadvantaged local authorities in Wales. Its average rateable value is very low. Its share of grant-related expenditure has gone down. The authority is discontented. This initiative by the right hon. Gentleman will not help local authorities with economic and social problems such as Mid-Glamorgan has to contend with.

The Welsh districts have a good spending record. Only two overspent their targets in the last year. They seek stability. They are concerned at the large variations in targets and in grant-related expenditure figures. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to justify neighbouring authorities having such large differences in grant-related expenditure figures. I give as an example the county of Dyfed. South Pembrokeshire has an increase of 19·7 per cent. in grant-related expenditure, whereas neigbouring Carmarthen has only 2·8 per cent. increase. Again, I ask the right hon. Gentleman to justify neighbouring authorities having such differences in targets. In Gwent, Blaenau Gwent has a 19·2 per cent. increase, but Torfaen has a 10·5 per cent. decrease.

I also ask the right hon. Gentleman to commit himself to announce his intention to remove penalties and targets from the Welsh scene in 1986-87. There is no record in Wales of spendthrift, profligate local authorities. They do not deserve harsh treatment. They face major economic and social problems. Our councils have to tackle those problems. It is against this background that local government in Wales displays restrained responsibility. The councils are not irresponsible.

With regard to the quality of services in the counties, the Government have had five years in office, and this settlement and settlements preceding it have had an injurious effect on the quality of services provided by the shire counties. It is not simply a matter of social services being cut back; it is worse. Social service departments cannot expand to meet increasing demands caused by high unemployment and the pressure on the social fabric of our communities.

There is now demoralisation and bitterness. The shire counties find it increasingly difficult to meet their requirements. Having made a series of visits to authorities in north and south Wales, I can state categorically that as quangos such as the Arts Council and the Wales Tourist Board face financial problems, they look to the shire counties to compensate their central expenditure. It is not surprising that tensions have risen.

It is no exaggeration to say that councillors and officers are demoralised by the Government's financial policy towards local government in Wales. It is not a soft option to transfer the cost to ratepayers when the economy is so depressed. The prospect is that there will be increasing bitterness between the elected councils and the electorate. Central Government's policy introduces tension into the processes of local government.

It is perhaps in education that the counties face the most severe pressure. It is there that the greatest anxieties lie. I believe the right hon. Gentleman to understand that. Hence, his defensive series of remarks about the local education authority in his own county of Dyfed.

The Welsh counties tell me that they expect reductions in primary and secondary school numbers, in the number of temporary teachers, in capitation allowances, and in school swimming facilities. It is expected that the cost of school meals will go up; that the loyal army of school meals attendants will have lesser, revised terms of contract; that adult evening classes will be more costly; and that further education establishments will have to wait for the equipment needed to teach the new technology.

To make my point, I wish briefly to quote from an assessment by Her Majesty's Inspectorate — not a politically biased organisation — of the impact of financial stringency on education in Wales. under the heading "Premises", it states:

"this continues to be a cause of considerable concern in a majority of LEAs . . . The interval between redecoration is lengthening . . . The net effect is a slow but persistent decline in the quality of the learning environment".

It continues:

"The replacement of damaged and broken furniture is unsatisfactory in many schools . . . Replacement tends to be piecemeal and in small quantities. The effect is further deterioration in pupils' general learning environment".

Under the heading "Capitation", the report says:

"the replacement of worn and outdated stock is being postponed . . . pupils' learning experiences are impoverished as a result".

It adds, in my view humiliatingly:

"As textbooks wear out there is increasing dependence on worksheets . . . Parents continue to make a substantial contribution through school funds to the purchase of a wide range of equipment and materials. In only a minority of schools are parental contributions any longer restricted to the purchase of additional rather than essential items. In some schools the sums contributed are very large, in many cases they are equivalent to a substantial proportion of the schools' capitation and they actually exceed it in some cases."

This revealing document points a finger at the policy of the Department and the Government. It adds:

"the drab appearance of many buildings does little to enhance the learning of pupils in schools where pressure on resources has already led to some impoverishment of experience."

This settlement has missed a golden chance to quicken the pace of the economy and to tackle unemployment. If the Treasury had released its brutal hold on local government finance, we might now be planning to tackle rotten housing, the still awesome problems of environmental dereliction and the stubborn, long-term unemployment totals in Wales.

Would not it be better to fund our local councils more generously than to ladle out tax cuts to the better off? We could get our construction workers off the dole by a programme of house building and environmental renewal. We could better prepare the boys and girls in our schools for the challenge of the high-tech revolution. Even at this late stage, I urge the Government to think again because I believe that the Welsh people deserve a much better deal.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. There is but an hour's debating time left and I can see about 25 Welsh hon. Members, most of whom seem to want to take part in the debate. If many of them are not to be disappointed, speeches should be brief.

10.46 pm

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): In yesterday's debate on unemployment the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said:

"To the Opposition, a reduction in unemployment is an objective towards which every aspect of economic policy should be directed."—[Official Report, 15 January 1985; Vol 71, c. 197.]

If Opposition Members are true to that, they should welcome this settlement wholeheartedly. It is not only fair, representing as it does a 5 per cent. increase in expenditure grant, more than inflation; it is more much more than that. It will help keep the average rate increase below the inflation rate. Surely Opposition Members can welcome that. Surely they must welcome it if they are true to what the shadow Chancellor said.

Mr. Alex Carlile: In welcoming the settlement wholeheartedly, does the hon. Gentleman welcome Delyn district council facing a target reduction of 5·6 per cent.? Does he welcome all the cuts in services that will occur in his district as a result of the settlement?

Mr. Raffan: I am delighted to inform the hon. and learned Gentleman about my constituency. I spoke to the chief executive of Delyn borough council this afternoon and I can tell the hon. and learned Gentleman that no such cuts are expected. If he waits, he will be pleasantly surprised by the rate that is set for Delyn. I shall let him know when it is set. I have a good idea what it will be. No such cuts in services will be necessary. The hon. and learned Gentleman should concentrate on his own constituency instead of interfering in mine.

Opposition Members blithely speak about Britain being reduced to a one-commodity economy. They must therefore realise the importance of keeping local government expenditure under control so as not to increase the rate burden on industry. If we let local government spending rip, dramatic rate rises will greatly increase industry's costs. Indeed, industry's costs will soar. That will lead to either of two alternatives. Industry will have to reduce costs, including declaring redundancies — Opposition Members do not want that—or it will have to increase the price of products, which will give a further edge to foreign competition, increase imports and create jobs in foreign countries. Opposition Members do not want that.

I can do no better than to quote my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), who said yesterday:

"That must be plain even to the simplest mind."—[Official Report, 15 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 227.]

The labour party has made clear its desire for direct job creation. Surely it wants to avoid indirect job destruction, but that is exactly what would result from allowing local government spending to rip.

We do not really need the Opposition tonight because we know their reaction to this rate support grant settlement or to any rate support grant settlement. All that we need is a tape recording of their response to last year's settlement, or to the settlement the year before. Out come the same insipid clichés—"harsh treatment", "draconian measures", "slashing cuts in services", "putting local authorities under intolerable strain". They show scant respect for the English language, let alone the hard evidence. The Opposition always prefer wild rhetoric to the hard evidence.

The Welsh office of the Association of District Councils has caught that infectious disease. In its submission on the settlement it said:

"Unless certain councils are able to make substantial cuts in service costs . . . they will have to make substantial increases in their part of next year's rate bills."

No doubt many county councils would take a similar view, but there is a real alternative — reordering priorities, streamlining administration and concentrating on statutory obligations.

We all know that the last people administrators will cut are themselves. That was brought out clearly in the Audit Commission's profile on Clywd county council for 1984-85. The section on staffing shows that as at March 1984 the number in the chief executive, legal and secretarial departments was 176; 108 more — 250 per cent. more than the average number of staff in similar departments in directly comparable authorities.

The architectural department numbered 163; 72 more, or more than 100 per cent. more than the same department in directly comparable authorities. No private architectural practice would survive financially relating that level of staff to the level of work undertaken. The capital projects that are the responsibility of Clwyd's architectural department average a value of between £6 million and £6·5 million. A well-known Liverpool architectural practice undertakes capital projects of £30 million with just half the staff of Clwyd—just 80 people.

Clwyd county council must get its priorities right. What does it think it is doing, buying and trying to develop Bodelwyddan castle as a tourist centre and a palace for culture? The educational part, TVEI, could easily be placed elsewhere. Why does it have to contribute £2,000 towards a sculpture in Mold bus station? It is not by a Welshman, the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) will be sad to hear. It is not even by a Scotsman—it is by somebody from Sussex.

The council has no need for a dramatic cut in its services provided that it concentrates on its statutory obligations and streamlines its administration. To that end, earlier this year I and leading Conservative county councillors called for independent management consultants to be brought into the county council. The officers strongly opposed that, without giving any reason. If, as they said, their administration was devoid of waste and efficient, they should surely have welcomed independent management consultants with open arms, because they could have vindicated them.

The recent controversy over the education budget confirms my view that the sooner independent management consultants go into shire hall, the better. I am glad that I am supported in that view by the teachers union, NAS/UWT. I was also delighted to hear that at the education committee meeting on Tuesday 13 November Councillor Broderick—the vice chairman of the policy, finance and resources committee, and a Labour member — called for a detailed examination of Clwyd's base budget, something which I and Conservative county councillors have been continually calling for.

If Clwyd needs an excellent example of how to manage its affairs, it need look no further than from Mold to Flint. Delyn borough council — as the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) will be glad to hear —is currently examining its loss-making activities with a view to reducing the burden that they impose on the rates. It intends doing that by more effective management of resources and by trying to generate fresh income.

Many will watch with interest when the two authorities come to set their respective rates. We can then judge which council—in the words of the Audit Commission—has "made proper arrangements for securing economy, efficiency and effectiveness in its use of resources."

10.53 pm

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): Having listened to the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) denigrate the county that he represents, I wonder why he ever sought to represent it in this House.

Although we are discussing the Welsh RSG settlement for 1985-86, we cannot get away from the central fact of the Government's strategy for expenditure by local authorities which has been set out by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities in its briefing to hon. Members in respect of RSG settlements in these words:

"The RSG Report maintains that the Government's expenditure figures should enable the Government's policies for individual services to be maintained."

However, those figures imply a massive cut from the level of services provided by local authorities in 1984-85. For current expenditure—wages, goods and services—a cash reduction of 0·5 per cent. is demanded, which represents a real cut of £700 million.

All debates on matters affecting rate support grant, concerning England, Scotland or Wales, must be approached from a common standpoint — that the Government are determined to interfere in the activities of those who have a direct responsibility towards those who elected them. The public must accept that if the services provided by local authorities are cut, those cuts are the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Wales and his Cabinet colleagues. It is no use the Government trying to take it out on local councillors. The responsibility lies squarely on the occupants of the Treasury Bench.

The RSG settlement for Wales fails to take account of the need for economic regeneration in all parts of the Principality, the increase in total expenditure being only 5·4 per cent., which is 4·5 per cent. for current costs. The shortfall of 1·5 per cent. in the 1984-85 RSG provision has not been taken into account in the figure for 1985-86. It is reasonable to assume that the right hon. Gentleman, who has praised local authorities for their efforts in cutting costs in the last five years, should have taken account of that.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer seems glued to the idea of making cuts in income tax for the better off sections of society. If there is room for some relief, it should be used to spread the burden more widely. One way to achieve that would be to give a better deal to local communities. In the latest RSG settlement we are told that there will be a reduction in the aggregate Exchequer grant of 2·2 per cent., from 69·2 to 67 per cent., which is the equivalent of an average rate increase in Wales of 11p in the pound, or 6·5 per cent.

The block grant, which is the main rate support for Welsh local authorities, has been increased by only £12 million, or 1·5 per cent., which, when measured against the increase in the total expenditure provision, is a reduction of £30 million, or 3·5 per cent. — the equivalent of a 6 per cent. increase in rates in Wales for 1985-86.

So persuasive have the Government been in influencing local government expenditure, and so great is their confidence in that influence, that they have resorted to setting targets enforceable by penalties. Those penalties have been retained in this RSG settlement. Indeed, they have been increased, from 40 per cent. and 90 per cent. of excess expenditure in 1984-85 to an average of 150 per cent. in 1985-86—namely 100 per cent. for the first 1 per cent. excess, 200 per cent. for the next 1 per cent. and 150 per cent. thereafter—while the limiter on the effect of penalties for low rateable value authorities has been halved. As my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) said, that is resented by local authorities.

There is much more that could be said on this subject, but the time available to us in the debate is limited. In fairness to my hon. Friends who wish to make contributions, I shall bring my remarks to a conclusion. In this matter, as in so many others for which he has responsibility in Wales, the Secretary of State is failing Wales and the Welsh people. How much longer have we to wait before he goes?

Mr. Ian Grist (Cardiff, Central): Little would one have thought from the speech of the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Coleman) that after deducting the national insurance surcharge from the Manpower Services Commission's contributions to the higher education budget, the grant has been increased by about 5 per cent. I do not think that he has spotted that, although it was referred to by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State at the outset of his remarks.

It is worth looking back to last year's debate on the same issue, which continued for rather longer than, thankfully, this one will. Labour Members gave terrible warnings to the people of Wales during that debate of what would happen in the following 12 months. Most of their predictions fell flat on their faces. Rates did not rise to the extent that we were promised and old people's homes were not closed as they threatened. People were not left without a meals-on-wheels service, although we were told that that would happen. None of these things occurred. However, we were not warned of the devastating effect on the economy of Wales, especially south Wales, of the miners' strike, which is ardently supported by most Labour Members. The strike has damaged local life and the capacity of the British community to raise finance, because it has deducted 1 per cent. from the growth of the nation in the past 12 months. That 1 per cent. of growth could have been used to fund the causes which we all want to support——

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): Can you advise me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, whether the comments that the hon. Gentleman is making on the miners strike——

Mr. Grist: Is this a point of order, or is it an intervention?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Mr. Grist.

Mr. Grist: The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) obviously has a sore conscience on this issue, and it is one that he well deserves.

The settlement that we are debating will be a major contributor to reducing inflation and inflationary expectations. That will be its major contribution to the future of the Welsh economy and the people of Wales. We must reject the idea that 5 per cent. is a reasonable rate of inflation. At 5 per cent., the value of the pound halves in 14 years. If inflation is 10 per cent., its value will be halved in seven years. We must realise that 5 per cent. is a sharp level of inflation and one that a few years ago we would have considered a disgrace. We must reject the expectation of high inflation and the consequent costs. If we can hold down inflation to 3 per cent. this year, 1 per cent. next year and a flat rate the year after, so much the better for pay claims, the attraction of Wales to foreign industry and our own industry and the support of jobs in our constituencies.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be pleased to hear that the rate poundage in Cardiff is not likely to rise by the 5·5 per cent. which his figures suggest. We might very well undershoot 5·5 per cent., and Cardiff is one of the areas that is predicted to have an inflation rate that is slightly above the average. If the rate poundage does not rise by the percentage that is predicted, so much the better for the capital of Wales.

The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) was remarkably moderate in his speech. He did not belch the flames that he tried on us last year. Unfortunately, he picked, as did the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), on the education budget. That budget must take account of problems associated with demographic change. We all know of the figures showing that pupil-teacher ratios have been improving, despite decreases in the number of teachers. Studies should show also that movements in population and demographic shifts must lead to changes. Every hon. Member believes that, unless he is a populist who simply wants to gain every available vote. Everywhere the opening of new schools and the closing of old schools helps us to recognise population movements and structure changes. That process must be carried on.

Because elections will be held next year, some authorities and all political parties are sitting on their hands. I speak as a parent with children in local schools, and I believe that, unless our children have fairer opportunities with a better spread of subjects, some schools, even in the cities, will have to merge. The savings can be considerable, and we must examine that aspect.

Some of the difficulties in schools involving books, pens and paper have been the result of the National Union of Teachers urging higher pay awards than provided for in the original budgets. It is clear from the negotiating position of all parties involved in considering teachers' pay that extra pay above last year's 4·5 per cent. guideline would come straight from the education budgets. That money would otherwise go towards assisting pupils in schools. The penalty must be paid for union intransigence, supported by the Opposition, who always envisage a large political buck being gained from supporting union pay demands. If we can keep down the demands of populists and can lower inflationary expectations — part of the effect will show up in pay rises—so much the better for local authorities, the people they serve, the economy and jobs for our young people.

11.6 pm

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I remind the Secretary of State of something said in 1980, at paragraph 103 of the report on the role of the Welsh Office by the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs. The Committee said:

> "Our conclusion at the end of the inquiry is that, notwithstanding the actions taken by Government, there exists in Wales not a jobs gap but a jobs chasm into which the economic and social structures of large parts of Wales are in danger of falling. Only a sustained programme of Government assistance to the Principality can prevent this."

That Committee had a majority of Conservative Members. There is a strong feeling in Wales that that advice, based on long and considered evidence, has been totally ignored and that the Secretary of State and his colleagues, while they swan around opening showpieces, do not look at what is really happening — in housing, transport, education, industry, employment, agriculture and items such as the collection of refuse, water and sewerage. They just do not know what is going on.

It is a disgrace to hear the Secretary of State for Wales supported tonight by the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan), whose constituency has been so severely damaged by this settlement. Furthermore, it is apparent that the Welsh Office is not averse to being subtly disingenuous about what is happening in Wales. In answer to a question that I asked some days ago about the proposed development of pre-school and nursery education in Wales, the Minister of State said:

> "Provision for under-fives by local education authorities in Wales is at a high level, some 85 per cent. of 3 and 4 year-olds being catered for."

So far, so good. We are proud of that record. But the hon. Gentleman went on to state:

> "and Government policy assumes that provision will continue at this level."—[Official Report, 14 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 23.]

It is absolute humbug to suggest that the Government really believe for one moment that the provision for nursery education could continue at that level with this settlement in mind.

The Powys director of education, in writing to parents who have complained to him about the declining standards in schools and nursery education, is telling them openly that the quality of education in Powys is bound to suffer because of the financial stringencies placed upon it.

I do not believe that the Welsh Office or the Secretary of State could justifiably accuse the Powys education authority of being profligate or of doing anything other than trying to husband its money well and providing a reasonable standard of education. That responsible, non-political education authority is telling the truth about what is happening to education in Wales as a result of this settlement. Standards are being made to fall.

District councils face receiving about £17 million in real terms less than the total of the Welsh district councils' block grant in 1983-84. In real terms total targets have been reduced by 3 per cent. within the past two years. Some of the variations between Welsh local authorities are causing confusion, consternation and a feeling of rank injustice as between one local authority and another. The bottom line of the story is that we have seen a continuous regression of services in Wales since 1981 because of the Government's failure to recognise the conclusion correctly reached by the Select Committee in 1980 to which I referred earlier.

A large part of the problem has arisen from the Welsh Office's reliance on grant-related expenditure assessments as a measure of need. GRE is no longer, if it ever was, a realistic measure of need. It is interesting to note that, while the Government will latch on to anything that the Audit Commission says which enables them to make cuts, they have conveniently sought to avoid the Audit Commission's expressed doubts as to the method of calculation of GRE. The result of the way in which GRE is calculated is that local communities have lost the right to choose through local democracy, as represented in their councils, the balance that they wish to choose between rates and services.

We no longer have local democracy in Wales because of the parameters which are placed upon county and district councils by the Welsh Office and this settlement. In 1980, the Select Committee feared for the state of Wales then. Today, nearly five years later, we must fear seriously for what will be the state of Wales at the end of this Government's term of office.

Surely the time must come soon—though one doubts it with this Secretary of State—when there will be a radical review of the Welsh economy, and when local government will be recognised as one of the realistic means through which the Welsh economy can be revitalised. Surely the time will come when the Welsh Office will be forced to recognise that the limping Welsh economy will have to be regenerated by increased local government support.

We could have debated many issues tonight, but time does not permit us to do so, because many other hon. Members wish to speak. I wished to highlight the truly desperate problem of education. It is high time that we heard the Conservative party confess honestly that it means by its policies, as surely it does, to reduce the quality of education in Wales so that it becomes a second-rate system.

Mr. Peter Hubbard-Miles (Bridgend): I wish to highlight the subjects that the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) highlighted. He was correct to highlight education, which is by far the largest element in local authority budgets. He was right to single out Mid-Glamorgan, which is the largest shire county in Wales with the largest education budget. He was wrong in portraying Mid-Glamorgan as a county that is disadvantaged in its education budget and lacking in its resources, because Mid-Glamorgan only recently boasted about its expenditure on education, and pointed out that per head of population it spends 10 per cent. more than the average English and Welsh county spends on education. In certain fields it spends vastly more per head of population than the average English and Welsh authority. For example on nursery education it spends 250 per cent. more per head of population than the average English and Welsh county; on primary education it spends 38 per cent. more; on secondary education it spends 11 per cent. more. So the idea that Mid-Glamorgan education is somehow disadvantaged is absolute nonsense.

If Opposition Members are claiming that Mid-Glamorgan is disadvantaged, they are accusing Mid-Glamorgan of gross incompetence and mismanagement of its resources. That may well be the case but, far from being short of resources, in this year the Mid-Glamorgan county council has managed to find £668,000 out of its educational budget for non-educational purposes — in other words, for supplying free school meals to the children of striking miners. That has been shrouded in the idea that it is for the children of disadvantaged parents, but I wonder whether the free school meals will continue to be provided for those people after the miners' strike is ended. It will be interesting to see whether Mid-Glamorgan continues providing its free meals for all disadvantaged children.

The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside is somewhat optimistic in suggesting that in the future there will be no need to penalise counties for overspending, because Mid-Glamorgan county council is now deliberately intending to overspend in order to create a sort of mini-Liverpool situation in Wales; in fact, this year it is taking £3 million from its capital account to subsidise its revenue account, and has been warned by its chief officers over the past four years of the need to make reasonable economies in its budget to avoid a serious situation. Only in recent weeks it has been warned that unless it is prepared to accept certain cuts in its budget, next year it will face a very severe situation.

Therefore, far from being disadvantaged and far from not having resources, the Mid-Glamorgan county council's education budget has the resources, but of course it will continue to pretend that it does not have them.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): May I first make it clear to the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Hubbard-Miles) that Labour Members understand the problem that exists in Mid-Glamorgan. They understand the scale of deprivation and the problems that Mid-Glamorgan has to tackle as an education authority. The very fact that it spends more than the average means that it has greater needs than the average. That is the sole reason for that additional expenditure.

Let me assure the hon. Member for Bridgend that Labour Members do not want to see anyone starving. They do not want to see the children of miners starving. We regard it as a proper charge on the public purse that the children of striking miners should be prevented from the form of starvation that the hon. Gentleman wishes on them.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): It is really a question of representation. My hon. Friend has hit the nail on the head, because I have a press release from Clwyd county council which states:

"Mr. Raffan"—

the hon. Member for Delyn—

"in particular must know that making and repeating misleading statements does not disguise the real truth."

There we have it. Conservaative Members make misleading statements to disguise the privation in the Principality.

Mr. Davies: I welcome that point. With regard to misinterpretation, I should like to take issue with the Secretary of State because I believe that his statement today and his suggestions on Monday have done a disservice not only to the people of Wales but to local government in Wales. I noticed with interest that in the Western Mail on Tuesday this week he suggested that five of the six local authorities in Mid-Glamorgan would be able to reduce their rates. On Tuesday evening he had a dusty reply from the treasurer of Mid-Glamorgan. The South Wales Echo said:

[Mr. Davies]

"Mr. Ray Lacey, treasurer to Mid-Glamorgan county council, described the Secretary of State's announcement as a 'theoretical exercise which will only serve to confuse ratepayers . . . What Mr. Edwards does not know—and Mr. Edwards knows that he does not know—is the special circumstances in each local authority.'"

When the Secretary of State calls in aid independent assessors or objective judgments, perhaps he will accept the advice of the treasurer of the largest local authority in Wales.

With regard to the individual problems of our valley communities, I should like to draw the attention of the Secretary of State to the problem that we have in Rhymney valley. I remind him that between the two years from 1982-83 to 1984-85, the amount of rate support grant that the local authority received per 1,000 head of population fell from £66,750 to £57,000, a reduction in real terms in the amount of money received by that local authority. There was a marginal increase for the county authority. The grant rose from £264,000 to £268,000 over a three-year period, when no provision was made for inflation. Mid-Glamorgan is facing a crisis, which forced it at the end of last year to discontinue swimming instruction for young children. That is the nature of the society that the Secretary of State is creating for us in the valley communities in Mid-Glamorgan.

I should like to refer again to Rhymney valley, because I believe that the Secretary of State is misleading us. I refer him to the figure for 1984-85, the current year. He stated that the coming year's settlement for 1985-86 was good. He realises that it might be an easier settlement than the current year's settlement, but he knows that that settlement was the most punitive that we have seen in local government, certainly in the time that the right hon. Gentleman has been in that office down in Cardiff.

The expenditure in Rhymney valley during the current year will be about £8·417 million. The target set by the Secretary of State for next year, 1985-86, is £8·521 million —a marginal increase. However, if the right hon. Gentleman compares the expenditure that that local authority is likely to incur in 1985-86 on the basis of its expenditure in the current year, he will realise that there is a shortfall approaching £500,000. If the local authority attempts to meet that shortfall, if it goes 3 per cent., 4 per cent. or 5 per cent. over target, the right hon. Gentleman will take a further £500,000 of rate support grant away from it, thus forcing it into a crisis.

The Secretary of State may say that it is easy enough for the local authority to make adjustments, that it can trim a bit here and a bit there, but the fact is that it cannot do so, because local authorities have been forced to cut back time and again, year after year, by the successive settlements from the right hon. Gentleman. We are no longer cutting back on luxuries—we are cutting back on essentials. Therefore, the local authority in Rhymney valley, with 60 per cent. of expenditure on personnel and related matters, is forced to take the decision to sack people if it wishes to meet the targets. If it sacks people, it will achieve two things. It will increase the level of unemployment in our valley and it will mean that we have fewer services. That is the accusation that the Secretary of State has to answer.

I make one further accusation against the Secretary of State. The relationship between central and local government has been based on a contract that local government's responsibility is to improve services and central Government's responsibility is to help local government to meet the bill. The Government have broken that contract, and the responsibility for that rests on the shoulders of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): District councils throughout Wales have an enormous problem arising from this settlement, which relates once again to the lack of finance to abide by the promises made for renovation grants for houses. People who will be waiting for another year, two years or three years can thank the Secretary of State for that.

Some councils such as the Dwyfor council in my constituency have enormous problems with capital allocation. To meet their statutory responsibilities, they will have to spend the entirety of their capital allocation on refuse disposal equipment, and they will have nothing left for anything else. That is the magnitude of the problem.

I want to concentrate on the situation facing the counties, particularly Gwynedd. I want to concentrate on the 10 years from 1974 to 1984. In this period, the gross expenditure of the county has increased by only 211 per cent. compared to an expenditure of almost 300 per cent. by central Government. In the same period, the grant from central Government has increased by only 177 per cent. and the ratepayer has been left with an increase of 319 per cent. That is the outcome of the Government's policies. The county has lost the equivalent in current money terms of £9 million in grants from central Government since 1974.

I want to put to the Secretary of State the point that I have put to him before—the unresolved issue of the continuing privations suffered by Gwynedd county council through the formula. The grant-related expenditure generated for Gwynedd is £97·1 million. The target for 1985-86 is only £94·4 million, so the target is £2·5 million less than the Welsh Office recognises to be Gwynedd's needs.

The Secretary of State has repeatedly defended this on the basis that, before he took office, the county did not maintain such a level of services as was shown by the GRE to be justified, so why should it sustain them now? But the Secretary of State knows very well why Gwynedd could not sustain that level of services: it simply did not have have the money. He knows that those services were needed. That is clear from the speeches that he and the hon. Member for Conwy (Mr. Roberts) made during the 1970s when they were in opposition. Gwynedd lost some £4 million between 1974 and 1978. The Secretary of State referred to this with regard to the cuts that were taking place in 1976. As the hon. Member for Pembroke, he said:

"In terms of social need and stress, problems are as severe in some Welsh counties as in some metropolitan districts. The rural areas have fared particularly badly. Dyfed and Gwynedd suffer from low incomes, poverty and high unemployment . . . They also suffer from sparsity of population and have to cater for an annual influx of tourists for which sufficient allowance is not made in the present formula. Yet these counties are among the worst sufferers under the system of distribution that the Government have imposed."

In other words, the Secretary of State at that stage recognised the need for greater expenditure on services in a county such as Gwynedd. But what did he do? When it came to the rates, he said:

"To many, this further imposition of rates will come as a final straw, and they will go out of business."—[Official Report, 22 December 1976; Vol. 923, c. 840-2.]

He fought hard against the increase of rates.

If one needs the services and one cannot have the increase in rates, there is only one logical conclusion: the money has to come from central grants. It is that logic that Gwynedd is putting back to the Secretary of State now. In order to get the money that is needed to sustain the services that he and the Government recognise as being necessary through the GRE, there must be a great contribution from central Government.

The hon. Member for Conwy repeated this plea in 1977. He implored the counties not to exceed the 10 per cent. ceiling in rate increases at that time because of the effect that it would have on other people. He said that "even though that will probably mean cutting services to the bone"—[Official Report, 15 December 1977; Vol. 941, c. 1021.]

he wanted a reduction in rate increases. That is fair enough, but if these services are needed and the counties cannot get them from anywhere else, provision should be made for them from central Government money.

That could have been achieved this year if the 4 per cent. limit had not been applied to the increase in target from 1984-85 to 1985-86. Gwynedd could then have increased the £94 million to £96·2 million and been much closer to target. I implore the Secretary of State yet again to ensure in the next 12 months that the target and GREA for Gwynedd are the same so that we can achieve the services that we need.

11.29 pm

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): Having listened to the Secretary of State today, I tend to agree with the Welsh Office of the Association of District Councils that the settlement must be regarded as a lost opportunity to provide resources to revitalise the Welsh economy.

In the Secretary of State's handling of these matters the weakest invariably go to the wall. For instance, his favourite target is Mid-Glamorgan—an attitude in which he seems to be supported by the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Hubbard-Miles)—which is probably the most deprived county in the whole of Great Britain, with astronomical unemployment figures, appalling housing which has affected life expectancy, an ageing population and social services strained to breaking point. With all those difficulties, the county might reasonably have expected a sympathetic hearing from the Government, but all that it gets are exhortations to cut the rates and threats of new and further penalties if it does not.

Thousands of disabled people are waiting for specialist conversion work on their homes, but Government cuts have left local authorities too short of money. In Newport alone more than 500 disabled people are now waiting for adaptations to their homes, ranging from stairlifts and bathroom conversions to ramps and handrails, but the cash is simply not available due to the Government's Scrooge-like attitude. That situation applies throughout Wales. It is no wonder that Mr. Joe Hennessy, secretary of the Wales Council for the Disabled, has written to the Secretary of State demanding urgent action.

Councillor Lloyd Turnbull, leader of Gwent county council, wrote to the Secretary of State on 10 January—I understand that the chief executive, Mr. Perry, has written in similar terms—complaining about the jiggery-pokery involving £4·6 million that the authority believes is due to the county. Councillor Turnbull expressed surprise at the statement by the Secretary of State in December that, taking everything into consideration, rate increases should be about 4·5 per cent., as Gwent will actually receive less grant in cash terms in 1985-86 than it received in 1984-85. If the block grant is calculated at the same percentage as in 1984-85, however, the county would receive an additional £4·6 million. As that loss is equivalent to 10·5p in rate precept requirement, how can the council be expected to keep the rate increase down to 4·5 per cent. when services have already been cut to the bone?

The rate support grant provides the wherewithal for local government to carry out its essential functions in the community. Our local authorities realise that the Government are engaged in a cost-cutting exercise. Recently, for instance, in answer to a parliamentary question from my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones), the Secretary of State was forced to admit that since 1981-82 the amount received by our local authorities in rate support grant had declined by £65·7 million. That financial stringency has posed all manner of problems for our local authorities, which have to provide and operate the essential services.

Criticism is no longer confined to Labour-controlled local authorities. Only last week Councillor Parker, leader of Monmouth district council, which is heavily dominated by the Conservatives, warned his own Government of a coming revolt among Conservative councils over what he called the horrendous situation in local government. He asked, "What the hell are the Welsh Office and the Government doing to us?" I have no wish to embellish those words. To do so would be to gild the lily.

Finally, I endorse the criticism of the Secretary of State's presentation of the settlement. The fact that a second document, amending the first, had to be circulated is almost without precedent. It adds to the failure of the Secretary of State in so many other areas. In the eyes of the people of Wales, the right hon. Gentleman stands condemned.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) asked me about national park grant. National park supplementary grant has been increased by 5·25 per cent., and the overall level of accepted expenditure on which grant is paid has been increased by 6·8 per cent. in the current year.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) referred to Gwynedd. I have just written to him on the subject. I have pointed out that because of the problems to which he referred, Gwynedd, at £406 a head, has the fourth highest target of any authority in England or Wales. Its share of the Welsh rate support grant system has been increased, and it has been able to increase its current expenditure since 1981-82 by more than the rate of general inflation. Those are all signs that are moving towards meeting some of the problems of Gwynedd.

The hon. Members for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) and for Neath (Mr. Coleman) and the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) said a great deal about the contribution that local government could make to the economy and about the Welsh share of that contribution. If they argue that the settlement fails to take account of the need for economic regeneration, I am entitled to point out various facts. The settlement represents a 5 per cent. increase in expenditure and grant above the expenditure rate. The target per head in Wales is 21 per cent. higher than the target per head in England, because of the problems of the Principality. The net capital provision per head is 50 per cent. higher than it is in England, because there is in Wales a better record of control of expenditure by local government in Wales. We are likly to produce average rate increases of not much more than the general level of inflation, and that will make a substantial and significant contribution to economic recovery.

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): If I were to tell my right hon. Friend that the rate in Cardiff is likely to be the lowest in Wales, and possibly the lowest in Britain, would he agree that that is the best possible advertisement to encourage people to relocate there?

Mr. Edwards: Yes. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist) made the same point. That is the real contribution that can be made to the recovery of the economy.

The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside complained about rotten housing, but the Government of which he was a member spent £58 million on housing improvement in Wales in five years, whereas we spent £107 million in one year. His record is no basis on which to make such criticisms.

We have heard much about the problems of Mid-Glamorgan. Because those problems are understood and recognised, it has the third highest target per head in England and Wales. If it was setting out to tackle the problems that were described, it should not have increased its manpower by 1·8 per cent. since 1981.

We have heard many complaints about transferring the burden of supporting local government from the taxpayer to the ratepayer. However, I note that the Committee of Welsh District Councils does not dissent from the Government's policy of reducing the taxpayers' contribution, and I welcome that.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery and the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) talked about education. I am entitled to tell the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery that, in primary education, expenditure per head in Powys has increased by more than 13 per cent. since 1979-80 and that expenditure on secondary pupils has increased by more than 11 per cent. during the same period. There has therefore been a substantial increase in expenditure in real terms in Powys. Exactly the same is true for Mid-Glamorgan. The hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) recently tabled a question asking for information about expenditure per head in the counties of Wales and I gave him the answer. Expenditure has increased in Mid-Glamorgan as well, and is now at its highest level ever.

Mr. Allan Rogers: If the Secretary of State wants to quote figures to the House, will he say on what basis the figures are calculated? Are they calculated on a 1979 basis, or on some other one?

Mr. Edwards: They are calculated on the basis on which the hon. Gentleman asked his parliamentary question. I answered that question. They are expressed in 1983-84 prices. Expenditure per head on primary school pupils in 1979-80 was £639, and £788 in 1983-84. For secondary education it was £880 per pupil in 1979-80, and £979 in 1983-84. We should not therefore have all this nonsense about the devastation of education.

My hon. Friends the Members for Cardiff, Central and for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) rightly emphasised the importance of low rates to industrial recovery. My hon. Friend the Member for Delyn was criticised by the hon. Member for Neath for daring to make some critical comments about his county council and suggesting that it might call in consultants to improve efficiency. The hon. Member for Neath has an odd concept of the role of a Member of Parliament if he believes that his sole duty is to act as a mouthpiece for his county council.

The hon. Gentleman complained about interference with local government, but I think I am entitled to point out that the taxpayer still produces 67 per cent. of the cost of local government in Wales. Partly because of our low rateable values, and partly because of the good record of local government in Wales, that share has fallen by less than the reduction in England, where the contribution from the central taxpayer is 48·7 per cent. Once again that gives the lie to the allegation that in some way I or the Welsh Ofice have failed the people in Wales.

The Welsh Office of the Association of District Councils has admitted that this is a fair settlement. It is a good settlement, and I commend it to the House.

Wildlife (Northern Ireland)

11.57 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Chris Patten): I beg to move,

That the draft Wildlife (Northern Ireland) Order 1984, which was laid before this House on 22nd November, be approved.

This order, like the other which the House is to debate this evening, has benefited from the Assembly's scrutiny. A number of changes for the better have been included in it as a result.

I am particularly pleased to bring forward this proposal, as it represents the first comprehensive wildlife law for Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland's geographical separation from the rest of Europe has obviously been a constraint on the variety of its wildlife. It is therefore essential to protect what we have. The provisions will protect many species of wildlife. These correspond to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 which brought the law in Great Britain into line with four international agreements entered into by the Government of the United Kingdom—the EEC directive on the conservation of wild birds, the Berne convention on the conservation of European wildlife and natural habitats, the Ramsar convention, which is concerned with the establishment and protection of internationally important wetlands, and the Bonn convention on the conservation of migratory species of wild animals. Part I of the Wildlife and Countryside Act and the Deer Acts 1963 to 1980 are the main sources of the draft order.

The order is in four parts. The first is procedural and deals with the title and commencement of the order. Part II relates to the protection of birds and other wild creatures and plants. The provisions relating to wild birds cover articles 4 to 9. The EEC directive contains the basic premise that all birds, their nests and eggs shall be fully protected and that requirement is achieved in article 4. Control of bird species is obviously essential, for example, in relation to pest birds which can be damaging to activities such as agriculture, and the birds which have traditionally been used for sport or food or both. The necessary exceptions can be found in article 5, although inhumane methods of killing and taking of such wild birds are banned by virtue of article 6, which restates the existing law on wild birds' protection in relation to the prohibition of traps, snares, hooks and nets and includes several new methods proscribed under the EEC directive. An additional provision has been added since the proposal was published for consultation, making it an offence for a landowner to permit or allow the use of these prohibited methods on his land. That provision is repeated later in the order in connection with wild animals.

Article 7 deals with the sale of live or dead wild birds. The sale of any live wild bird is prohibited entirely and only one species of dead wild bird may be sold—the wood pigeon. Regulations will be made, however, to permit certain individuals—taxidermists in the main—to trade in dead species. There is a later similar article on animals.

Under article 9 it will be an offence for any person to be involved in any event where captive birds are freed to be shot or hunted by trained birds of prey immediately after their liberation. That offence is a substantive change made since the proposal was published. The practice is apparently growing in some European countries and this provision, which is not included in the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, is designed to prevent its spread to Northern Ireland.

Provisions on the protection of other animals begin with article 10. Creatures such as the badger, pine marten, otter, red squirrel and certain butterflies are protected for the first time. A full list of protected creatures is contained in schedule 5. There must, of course, be exceptions—allowed for in article 11 — to safeguard domestic livestock, crops and other forms of property. In article 10 there is a further change from the published order. The protection afforded to structures or places used by wild animals for shelter has been extended to cover also anything that conceals or protects them. That change was made in the light of the difficulty experienced by the Nature Conservancy Council in interpreting the corresponding provision in the 1981 Act.

Article 12 prohibits the use of inhumane methods of killing and taking wild animals, and the ban on the use of self-locking snares has been reinforced by a new provision prohibiting their sale.

The special protection of plants is contained in article 14. In view of the possible difficulties in enforcing these particular provisions, it is my firm intention that there should be the widest publicity to impress on the public the importance of leaving the countryside as they find it. the provision is not entirely restrictive. The picking of wild flowers, apart from those in the specially protected category, is still permitted, but for obvious reasons it is an offence to uproot or destroy any wild plant.

Article 15 deals with the introduction of new species. There are two main reasons why introductions require strict control. First, foreign species may thrive and spread rapidly because of the lack of competition. Like the grey squirrel and the mink, they may then cause damage to trees, livestock or other forms of property. I think that that has been a problem in parts of County Tyrone. Secondly, they may cause the number of our native species to decline by competing for their food and space. The presence of American mink in Northern Ireland is an expensive reminder of how an introduction can be harmful both to property and to wildlife. The penalties for an offence under this article are high and reflect the need for tight controls on non-native species of plants and animals.

Article 16 deals with the establishment of wildlife refuges under which, for example, bird sanctuaries may be designated by order. The provisions of this article will not override the existing statutory rights of landowners as designations will only be through agreement.

The licensing provisions of the order are contained in article 18. There is a substantial list of activities that may be carried on that are otherwise in contravention of the provisions of the order, provided they are done under and in accordance with a licence issued by the Department of the Environment. It is intended that the administrative costs of issuing licences will be partially offset by a suitable charging system.

In this article there is a further change from the published order in that a licence relating to the killing of a species will require to specify the particular species which may be killed and the person authorised to do so. This tighter control is felt to be justified in such circumstances.

Part III of the order covering articles 19 to 23 relates to deer. During the late 1970s, several unsuccessful Deer Bills were introduced by various private Members at Westminster, each including the protection of deer in Northern Ireland. The final version, the Deer Act 1980, turned out to be a truncated version of earlier Bills and did not, unfortunately, embrace Northern Ireland. An undertaking was then given by one of my predecessors that the protection of deer would be included in any subsequent wildlife measure in the Province.

Until now, Northern Ireland has had the unenviable distinction of being the only country in western Europe not to have national laws for the protection of deer. The present proposals closely follow those contained in the Deer Acts 1963 to 1980 and cover items such as close seasons, nightly shooting times, prohibited weapons, poaching and the purchase and sales of venison.

Certain exceptions have been provided which will allow for the veterinary treatment of deer and the killing of deer out of season by an authorised person on certain agricultural land and garden grounds. The exceptions provided for deer farmers and for the purpose of protecting any person threatened by a deer have been limited in the former case to specified acts, and in the latter to circumstances where there is an immediate threat and by the application of a standard of reasonableness to the act carried out. This, again, is a change introduced following the consultation process.

Part IV of the order contains the miscellaneous provisions and deals with standard items such as enforcement, summary prosecutions, penalties and forfeitures and regulations, orders and notices. The level of penalties emphasises the gravity with which any breach of the laws on wildlife is and should be regarded.

I am confident that hon. Members will welcome this order as a necessary measure to protect the wildlife heritage of Northern Ireland. It places Northern Ireland on at least an equal footing with the rest of the United Kingdom and gives us a comprehensive code that will meet the requirements of various international agreements to which the United Kingdom is party.

I commend the order to the House.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I commend the Minister on taking us so carefully and succinctly through the order. Hon. Members who represent Northern Ireland constituencies will be as anxious as I am to ensure that provisions which offer protection to additional fauna and flora should be the same in Northern Ireland as they are on the mainland.

The positive aspect of this order is that while it is somewhat overdue — the bird section, for example, should have been in force by April 1983 to comply with the EEC directive on the conservation of wild birds—it offers protection to fauna and flora that were previously unprotected in Northern Ireland.

As the Under-Secretary said, the order brings us into line with our international obligations. Though it is sometimes overlooked, if not forgotten, these apply as much to Northern Ireland as they do to the mainland. Some of these obligations are imposed on us by the EEC, and we are dealing tonight with one such obligation which arises from the application of article 4 of the European directive to which I referred.

Those who take a strong interest in these matters in Northern Ireland are broadly satisfied with the provisions for the protection of the species. Their concern, however, is that the provisions should be fully implemented and that the powers, such as those which exist in article 4(10) to enable Northern Ireland to join in the special protection measures for, for example, quarry species in cold weather —measures which are currently in force in Great Britain —will not be weakened by any lack of resolve on the part of the Department of the Environment in Northern Ireland. We join the Minister in commending the order to the House.

12.10 am

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I give a general welcome to the order and share the opinion of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) that we should appreciate the manner in which the Minister presented it. The Minister talked about the need to preserve wildlife because it may be in peril. I am happy that a similar order was not in force at the time of Patrick, who is alleged to have cleared the snakes out of Ireland. Many of us would like him back with us.

The Assembly has recommended that action should be taken to preserve the Irish hare. I do not think that that was a nationalistic or a Unionist ploy; I believe that the recommendation reflected the concern of the people of Northern Ireland.

The Minister has assured me in a letter that action would be taken on what he described as a "running sore" in Northern Ireland, which is the live coursing at Crebilly. In the Minister's response to the concerns of the people of Northern Ireland, we were told that it was not intended to legislate for the protection of the Irish hare as that came under gaming legislation. However, the hope was expressed that something would be done as soon as possible. Can the Minister say when such a measure might be brought before us? If there was a sense of urgency in bringing the order before the House because of the European directive, there should be an equal sense of urgency to respond to the will of the majority of the Ulster people on an evil form of sport of which few have spoken in support, irrespective of class, politics or creed.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): This is perhaps the first time that I have approached this subject in the House, but I have dealt with it for many hours in another place in Northern Ireland. During that process I have been struck by the widespread interest in it, which I, as a public representative, had not detected was so deeply held in the community. For that reason, I welcome the substance of the orders, which include provisions that will protect the flora and fauna and our wildlife. These are matters of primary interest to the people of Northern Ireland. They are interested especially in the conservation of wildlife.

The substance of my remarks is one of welcome, so it is unfortunate that any cloud should appear in the sky, especially a grey one, in taking up the remarks of the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) on the practice of enclosed live park hare coursing in Northern Ireland.

Those in this place who do not represent Northern Ireland constituencies may think that hare coursing is hare coursing whether it is in Great Britain, Northern Ireland or even the Republic of Ireland. It is not the same throughout the United Kingdom. Hon. Members should be aware of what park hare coursing in Northern Ireland really is. In Great Britain—I do not argue the merits of hare coursing there — the rules allow a hare an opportunity to escape that is not availabe to a hare in Northern Ireland. If a hare in Northern Ireland escapes once, it is recycled and again put through the process. If it escapes the next time, it is recycled and put through the process once more.

I have protested at Crebilly, so I can tell the House about the procedures adopted. The hare does not have a great opportunity to escape. It is given a relatively short start with the hounds following on after it. The hounds can follow the hare into the enclosure and corner it in a smaller and more confined space. The stewards are simply in the area to kick the hare to death rather than see it torn to pieces by the dogs. That is park hare coursing Northern Ireland style. It is more barbaric, cruel and evil than the style practised in the rest of the United Kingdom.

With that background in mind, the Assembly would have considered the proposal for a draft order and the section dealing with the prohibition of certain methods of killing or taking wild animals. It would be appropriate to include a proscription of the use of enclosed park hare coursing.

The political parties in Northern Ireland did not line up with the Unionists on one side of the argument and the Nationalists on the other or with Protestants and Roman Catholics on different sides. There was a degree of agreement that the Minister might like to see in other subjects. With a great deal of agreement, the Members of the Assembly accepted the argument and recommendations presented by the Environment Committee that there should be a ban on enclosed park hare coursing. The Assembly's view was not out of tune with what the people in the country as a whole felt. There was widespread worry about the practice of hare coursing and widespread approval for the Assembly's recommendations.

I support the principle that Northern Ireland politicians should have a role to play in their own affairs. The Assembly has been useful in that it has a scrutinising role and has enabled us to put a bridle on hitherto unaccountable direct rule. The confidence of many people was shaken when they noticed that a proposal which had such widespread acceptance was treated so cavalierly by the Minister's Department. I should have thought that a Tory Minister would have had an excellent opportunity to agree with a proposal that would not cost anything, financially at least.

Some people in Northern Ireland are less generous than I am. If you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, had been in that other place, you might have been alarmed at some of the comments made. One Member said:

"The Minister responsible for this decision is either very stupid, very ignorant, or downright deceitful".

He allowed the Minister some grace, because he said:

"the latter is the most likely".

Although a constituent might forgive a politician for being deceitful, he could not forgive him for being stupid or ignorant. I do not believe that any of those three descriptions applies. I have noticed over and over that when the subject of park hare coursing has arisen in Northern Ireland, something always stops action. I do not know whether there is an over-abundance of tweedy sorts in the Department of the Environment. Whatever it is, something does not allow the Department to think in the same terms as the majority of the people and elected representatives in Northern Ireland. I wonder whether the Minister can support that activity. When he responded to the Assembly, he said that there were reasons for not accepting such a ban. He said that the Irish Coursing Club had decided to change its rules and that, with self-regulation, the Assembly might achieve what it sought better than by legislation.

I am not convinced that those who practise barbarity are the best people to regulate it, nor am I convinced that those people who only change the rules when under pressure are likely to keep them when the pressure appears to be off. With self-regulation, they could regulate the rules back to what they were. What is to stop a group that is not affiliated to the Irish Coursing Club from having a meeting similar to Crebilly before self-regulation?

Hon. Members should know what the great changes in the rules at Crebilly are that encouraged the Minister not to go ahead with a ban on park hare coursing. The first change was an increase in the number of stewards who would attend the meeting. I am sure that the hare was impressed by the fact that there would be more stewards to kick it to death when the hounds caught it. If it was not impressed, it would feel the same as Members of the Assembly, who were equally unimpressed.

The other great move was to give the hare a few yards extra start. It would be able to go a few more yards up the course before the hounds killed it. I am sure that the hare was impressed that under the new regulation it would have an extra couple of seconds to live.

The third change in the regulations was that the promoters of the event would clip the ears of the hares that survived after they had gone through the course, so that they could be released within 48 hours of the completion of the event. Neither the Minister nor the ICC has said who will referee such a procedure. The ICC's reaction to the RSPCA's previous request to watch the hares being let into the wild after the events was strange. I suspect that if the ICC is still reluctant to allow supervison of its activities, self-regulation is meaningless.

The Minister has been so impressed by the ICC's generosity in making those three major concessions that he does not feel it necessary to impose a ban. I say that, but I do him an injustice, because in a letter to me he says that he has decided

"for the present not to introduce separate legislation."

I seek some clarification from the Minister. He will be aware that the coursing club's rule 13 states:

"points are awarded during the course to hounds which do the most to kill the hare."

I am sure that the rules for hare coursing in Northern Ireland are different from those followed in Great Britain. As that rule has not been amended, how long does the Minister intend to allow the review of the ICC's self-regulation to continue before he is prepared to say whether it meets the criterion that he set down when he felt that self-regulation would meet the Assembly's request?

I urge the Minister to say that if the self-regulation does not meet his requirements for hare coursing in Northern Ireland and does not bring it closely into line with hare coursing as practised in Great Britain, he will introduce legislation to ban that barbaric and evil practice in Northern Ireland.

I end as I began, by giving a general welcome at least to that part of the order which appeared at the end of the day. It provides overall a better balance between the interests and responsibilities of the different users of the countryside. But in welcoming the order, I urge the Minister to consider legislation.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): As one who sat through the Committee stage of the Wildlife and Countryside Bill, and moved an amendment that the Bill should apply to Northern Ireland, I welcome the order.

Anyone who saw the film on BBC television on Sunday night will appreciate how rich and varied is the wildlife of Ireland, both north and south. It was marvellous to see red squirrels — there are not many left in Britain, but we have them in the Isle of Wight — as well as pine martens, hares, otters, peregrine falcons, chuffs, bitterns, and even the corncrake, which I think now exists only in the Western Isles. Long may they survive.

Under article 4(10), the Minister is enabled to introduce special protection measures for quarry species, particularly in cold weather. I believe that art this moment his colleagues in the Department of the Environment are thinking of banning wildfowling in Britain because of the prolonged cold weather that we are experiencing. May something similar be considered for Northern Ireland if the cold spell continues for any length of time? The weather may not be as severe in Northern Ireland; others will be able to tell me whether it is or not. But if there is to be a prolonged period of cold weather, that article should be implemented.

I am sorry to see that the curlew and the scaup can be hunted in Northern Ireland, because they are protected in Britain. We had an argument about curlew in Committee on the Wildlife and Countryside Bill. Perhaps the scaup might have been included in the order; I am sorry that it was not. However, I welcome the order and hope that it will be implemented speedily.

12.29 am

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): I was glad to hear the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) refer to an amendment that he moved in Committee on the Wildlife and Countryside Bill. If it had been carried, we should not have had to sit here until 3 am. No doubt many hon. Members on the Government Benches would have been even more pleased if that Liberal amendment had been carried.

The order deals with an enormous number of matters. The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) concentrated on one aspect of the order; indeed, that has been the hallmark of the examination of the order. Article 4(10) says that a person who "takes or destroys an egg of any wild bird . . . shall be guilty of an offence."

Most wild birds' nests are destroyed or interfered with by children—often relatively small children—who go bird-nesting. The practice is not as common now as it was when I was a child, but certainly in regard to small birds that is where the real problem lies.

I suggest that the Minister could approach the education authorities to see what could be done through the schools to relieve pressure on nesting birds from children. If we do not start the process of education when children are young, we shall never get anywhere in that respect.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): Will my hon. Friend agree with me that, because of the importance of conveying the contents of the order to schoolchildren, copies should be made readily available to them? We are dependent on the help of teachers in encouraging children to be thoughtful with regard to wildlife. Indeed, we are very much indebted to organisations such as the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds for the work they do and the literature they circulate.

Mr. Ross: I agree with my hon. Friend. I do not see any reason why the Department of Education and Science should not make material available to schools.

There is an enabling power to restrict shooting in hard weather. I assume that normally any such restriction would apply to the entire Province, yet it is not unknown for the Province to benefit, with regard to game and wildfowl, when there is hard weather in Great Britain or elsewhere in the island of Ireland. I am curious as to whether the Government are thinking of putting a blanket ban on the entire Province, or only on parts of it that might from time to time be affected by hard weather, when the rest of the Province would be clear and shooting could be permitted there. I should be obliged if the Minister told us what the Government's thinking is on that issue.

In article 6 of the order one reads about the means of killing or taking wild birds that are banned. Later it refers to wild animals. One thing that has concerned me very much is the banning of the automatic shotgun. I have not been able to understand why that should be so. I believe that the measure results purely from the EEC directive. I should be greatly obliged if the Minister could give us the benefit of the Government's thinking when they accepted that restriction. There is nothing wrong with an automatic shotgun. My experience, as a user of one, which I fear none of the members of the Assembly Committee are, is that whenever one fires a gun at any target, and misses two shots, one does not waste ammunition firing a third shot because the target is far out of range by that time. In the control of vermin and ferreting rabbits, the automatic shotgun has tremendous advantages over the standard double-barrelled shotgun. I cannot understand why the Government have been so willing to accept that demand from the EEC.

The Minister will appreciate the difficulties, especially in Northern Ireland, when an individual wants to get a second shotgun, and the police are most unwilling to grant a firearms certificate for that weapon. Therefore, the individual who owns an automatic shotgun may be prohibited when the order comes into operation from using that firearm in the taking of wildlife or game, and may find that not only has its market value diminished but that he is incapable of holding it and a second gun. Perhaps the Minister will have a word with the chief constable and his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about the matter when he is confronted with applications for a second gun.

I also notice that a shotgun that has an internal barrel diameter of more than 1¾ in. is banned. Perhaps the Minister will tell us what bore of shotgun that represents because elsewhere in the order we find references to the size of shot, the bore and so on. Instead of using the same measurements throughout, we seem to hop from one measurement to the other, which is confusing.

The order also refers to the prohibition of "any device for illuminating a target or any sighting device for night shooting".

It may not be known to the House, but several different gadgets can be used for shooting. There is the image intensifier, used by the Army, which is a highly sophisticated piece of equipment and extremely unlikely to be available to sportsmen. There are things such as the red spot that appears on the target when one has the device mounted on the gun. When one puts the gun to one's shoulder, once the red spot appears on the target, one knows that one is on it. Is that banned? There is also the extremely simple device for shooting duck in the late evening of putting a piece of white paper on the muzzle of the gun so that one can see it. I have used that device and am curious to know whether it would be banned. I wonder whether anyone asked the Minister those questions before, and whether any practical shooting men talked to him about what it is like on the ground when one is trying to bring down game in bad light conditions.

I am also concerned about the release of wild birds to be shot or to be pursued by birds of prey. The Minister has cleared my mind because I was worried that that practice was taking place in Northern Ireland, but has he any evidence that in any place in Northern Ireland or Great Britain the shooting of live birds in place of clay pigeons is still practised? If so, I should be surprised and shocked to hear it because I thought that it died out a long time ago, and I would not like to think that it had been revived.

Another matter that concerned a great many people was the use of the self-locking snare. A great many people have said a great deal about the cruelty of this device. Having listened to the views of a large number of people, and having seen the snare in use, I remain unconvinced by the arguments for banning it. Any snare that is properly set should catch and kill its quarry. The soft, brass-coloured wire used for rabbit snares would tighten up and have much the same effect as a self-locking snare. If the snare is properly used there should be no problems. We are really seeking to legislate not for responsible, able users but for the cowboys and we shall not stop the people like that by legislation unless the most extreme steps are taken to enforce it. I cannot see the necessary money and effort being put into enforcement to deal with the problem effectively, so I remain unconvinced by the arguments and I am unlikely to be convinced unless much stronger evidence appears.

The reference to the taking of animals through the use of gases and poisons is clearly directed at the use of cymag. Anyone who lives in the country knows how widely that powder is misused and the problems that it causes, especially for fish stocks, and I hope that serious steps will be taken to stop it getting into the wrong hands. This has been a matter of concern for many years to everyone who cares about wildlife. Yet the poacher still goes on his merry way, apparently getting away with it.

The provision about the purchase and sale of parts of animals is presumably intended to stop the purchase and sale of fox skins and I note that the fox appears in one of the schedules as an animal that may not be sold. I was not aware that the fox was in any danger of extinction in Northern Ireland. Indeed, the place sometimes seems to be overrun with them. Until recently there was a bounty on foxes and large numbers have undoubtedly been taken by various means and skinned. Yet there still seem to be quite a large number of them trotting around, causing a great deal of damage.

There is practically no fox hunting of the type practised in England. Foxes in Ireland generally are killed by trapping and shooting or gassing and they will go on being killed. All that is being done here is to remove an incentive to hunt them down. At the end of the day, there is no danger to the number of these animals in Northern Ireland, so I see no justification for the provision.

I was astonished to learn that primroses are to be protected. If there is one plant in Northern Ireland that does not need protecting, I should have thought it was primroses. Such a provision seems to me quite ridiculous.

Mr. Chris Patten: From my experience, one group of people from whom primroses may need to be protected in Northern Ireland is visitors from Great Britain.

Mr. Ross: Let us hope that the tourist trade benefits when they come and pick them. My experience of primroses is that they are rather too early in the season for most tourists anyway. What is the policeman going to say when he meets the five-year-old child coming up the road with a bunch of primroses for his mother, a child who would be breaking the law by picking a perfectly common flower? I think that the measure is quite unnecessary.

Article 15 is a useful and interesting one, and has not up to now received the attention that it deserves. It relates to the prohibition of the introduction of new plants and animals. The Minister mentioned two of these — grey squirrels and mink. This article is excellent so far as it goes, but there is not one word anywhere in the order about the responsibility of any person or any public authority to remedy the current situation. In the light of that, I think it is just empty words. If the Government intend to say that we must not introduce things that are harmful, they should be trying to get rid of the existing harmful species instead of allowing them to run round causing the damage that has resulted in Northern Ireland over many years.

Article 20 deals with regulations to cover smooth bore shotguns and so on. Could the Minister translate that into layman's terms? Could he tell the House what shot size is represented by the figures that are referred to and what sort of rifle calibre he is referring to? Is he really saying that instead of a ·236 or 6 mm the Government will accept only a rifle of ·240 calibre and a ball for the taking of deer? That is my understanding of the provision. The people in Northern Ireland who engage in these such activities need to know the exact position in layman's terms.

Article 28 provides for a number of wide powers. In my view, the Government, in exercising those powers, would be enforcing orders which would have no parliamentary sanction whatsoever. I hope that the Minister will say whether I am correct in my assumption and, if so that he will make some effort to ensure that parliamentary procedure exists before the orders come into force.

I welcome particularly the deer protection aspect of the order. Will a game licence be needed by a person going to shoot deer in Northern Ireland? That is not clear from what has so far been said.

On hare coursing, can the Minister say how these hares are captured? I assume that they do not grow on trees but that somebody has to go out and catch them. How are they caught, where are they caught and who has the shooting rights on the land from which the hares are taken? If the source of the hares could be restricted, many of the problems mentioned might disappear. During the Assembly's investigation, a number of people remarked that hares were an endangered species, or to some extent under threat. I recall clearly that before myxomatosis hit the rabbit population, hares were unknown in the lowlands in Northern Ireland except in a rare place like Nutts Corner airport.

Whenever the rabbits had been nearly wiped out, within two or three years the hares would appear in large numbers all over Northern Ireland. They stopped being an animal of the hill and the open moor. The explanation given at the time was that the male rabbits tended to kill the leverets in the first few days of their life. It was noticeable that, as soon as the rabbit population recovered, the hares in the lowlands diminished in number and eventually vanished. If the explanation was correct, the Minister should try to find out the size of the hare population in the hills today, and what it was before the rabbit population crashed. That might give us an idea of the abundance of hares today compared with past years. I do not believe that the hare is in as much danger as some people believe.

Mr. Peter Robinson: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could clarify his reference to the number of hares? Because the number of hares may be greater than was suggested by some members of the Assembly, would it be right to treat them in the manner in which they are treated at Clibelly?

Mr. Ross: The hon. Gentleman misunderstands me. I was not referring to anything said by any member of the Assembly Committee. I was referring to what was said by those who gave evidence to that Committee. At least two or three of them expressed that view. I would not want anyone to believe that the Irish hare is vanishing from the face of the earth. I do not believe it is. I believe that the population of hares rises and diminishes naturally, and not always in the same place. It is noticeable to any shooting man that there has been a vast change. Hares are now found in a more restricted area than they were a few years ago, and I wonder whether that fact has been taken into account by those who fear for the future of the species.

This important order is, in the main, to be welcomed. I have mentioned two or three points that I am concerned about — two or three Government decisions that puzzle me — and I hope that it will be possible for them to be reconsidered at a later stage.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I do not know whether the order is the right vehicle for a discussion of hare coursing, but I am sure that no hon. Member would support any sport in the United Kingdom in which the quarry was not given a fair chance of escape — whether coursing, shooting, fishing or hunting. The quarry must have a fair chance of escape if a sport is to be worthy of support in a civilised society.

Part III of the order relates to deer. Why has my hon. Friend not followed the useful precedent established in England and Wales with the Deer Act 1980 and in Scotland with an order of last December? Both the Act and the order gave deer of all species much more watertight protection.

I realise that the House would not wish superfluous additions to be made to an order that is already long, but both the Deer Act and the Scottish order gave much greater protection to the deer in relation to the disposal of the carcases. A schedule was incorporated in the venison register which all dealers in venison in England and Wales, and in Scotland, have to keep. The register must be kept, the columns must be filled in and it must be available for inspection for at least three years. Two years' operation of that scheme in England and Wales has proved of great benefit to the police and the authorities in curtailing deer poaching and in tracking down poached carcases of venison. I am surprised and disappointed that it is missing from part III of the order.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) and I shared the enjoyment of the Committee stage of the Wildlife and Countryside Bill. What he said about harsh weather is important. Provision should be made for it in the order. As from today, we have imposed a harsh weather ban on wildfowl, woodcock for a start. The order should enable the Minister to make a direction, when, as recently, there have been a couple of weeks of harsh weather, to ban or curtail the shooting of all forms of quarry that are under threat because of that harsh weather.

Having made those remarks, I welcome the order.

12.50 am

Mr. A. Cecil Walker (Belfast, North): I am a dedicated conservationist, especially with regard to the protection of all forms of wildlife, whether indigenous or visiting during migration.

In my younger days I was interested in sport shooting. I have given it up, not because I am a bit long in the tooth to by lying in wet ditches in the middle of winter or out in the mud flats of Strangford lough waiting for the morning flight, but because I feel that, with the drastic changes that have occurred in our environment, our wildlife is under more pressure for day-to-day existence. It needs all the help that it can get. That is why I give a generous welcome to the Government's efforts, through the order, which is an honest attempt to protect our wildlife from the human species.

I am especially pleased to see that article 6(1)(c) (iv) provides that it will now be an offence to use

"any shotgun of which the barrel has an internal diameter at the muzzle of more than one and three-quarter inches".

I remember such cannons being used on the shores of Belfast and Strangford loughs. They were mounted on what were known as duck punts, which were camouflaged to look like a piece of floating debris. They were manned by two people, who were usually lying down. They were always used during the hours of darkness. Moonlit nights were especially favoured because the quarry, the migratory flocks of ducks and geese, was more easily recognised then. One of the hunters quietly paddled the punt until he was among his victims and then the other one blasted off with this diabolical instrument of death and destruction. It was common to kill or maim upward of 20 to 30 birds with one shot. In the light, one could see many of them flapping about in the water, condemned to a lingering death if not retrieved and put out of their agony.

I am also pleased that article 6(1)(e) makes it an offence to use

"any mechanically propelled vehicle in immediate pursuit of a wild bird for the purpose of killing or taking that bird".

The prohibition extends to animals. I have seen fast planing boats manned by trigger happy so-called sportsmen running down on all types of sea birds. The swiftest birds might get out of range, but the diving species invariably fall victim as they have not the speed to get into the air. They are therefore slaughtered on the surface as soon as they exhaust themselves. I have seen the same tactics employed in seal hunting. Although many fishermen would say that seals are a legitimate target, the cruel killing of them by such methods must be condemned.

In article 12(1)(a) there is reference to "self-locking snares". Here I might have to take issue with my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross). I maintain that all snares can be self-locking; when the animal is caught, its struggles invariably cause a locking effect. If such snares killed the animals they trapped, as can happen when rabbits hit them hard, I would not be so concerned; but when the animal is caught by the neck, body or hind leg, it must suffer. The real cruelty occurs when the setter of the snares leaves them for several days before he inspects them. Many of his victims may be domestic animals. I have heard of instances where dogs, sheep and even cattle have been caught and severely injured in snares which were meant for foxes.

I would like to have seen a provision in the order for duly appointed wardens to be able to enforce the various prohibitions. In several instances culprits who were observed by wardens blatantly breaking the wildlife laws were not apprehended because the wardens did not have the necessary authority. It must be recognised in this connection that our police force cannot be everywhere at one time.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): The Minister has already taken on board a heavy cargo, perhaps more than he can cope with conveniently in his winding-up speech, contributed to not least in an expert fashion by my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) and others. I want to make only one addition to the cargo, of which I hope he will at least acknowledge the importance, namely, the matter of identification.

Most citizens will wish to observe the law as we are making it in this order. To do so, they must be able to identify the species that are protected. With animals, and to a lesser degree birds, there is no problem. Most people are familiar with and can recognise the species of animals that are protected by the order. Even if people are less commonly able to identify all the birds that are named, at any rate the general drift of the prohibitions which the order contains is clear and could be carried in anyone's mind.

There is a different order of difficulty in relation to the flora. Schedule 8, which occupies a page and a quarter, sets out a list of plants of which even those who, without being expert botanists, take an interest in the countryside are mostly unaware. Nor are they much helped by the fact that the popular names, so-called, are occasionally inserted. I found it no assistance to identify moschatel to know that it is also called town hall clock. I have to admit to not knowing what it looks like or whether I am likely to encounter it in my wanderings in the Mourne mountains.

No doubt the Minister, who referred in his opening speech to publicising the contents of the order, has in mind some ways in which this problem can be dealt with. It would be helpful if he could give some indication to the House in his concluding speech of what those are. It is not so easy perhaps to ensure that the only effective method of identification, namely, good and coloured diagrams and illustrations, are readily visible and available.

In some of the areas with which we may be dealing in the next order to come before the House one could, with perhaps not too much risk of falling victim to vandalism, erect a series of pictures of protected flora, as we find of the duck life in St. James's park. I do not have a suggestion to offer as to how the range of protected flora in schedule 8 can be brought to the knowledge and attention of those who might otherwise be tempted to pick a rather exciting and attractive flower and thus unwittingly break the law.

Having a wife who has a passion for picking primroses, I was at first alarmed by the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry, East, but then reassured by my inspection of schedule 8, which informed me that so long as she did not uproot them I did not have to restrain her from breaking the law on her many excursions into the lanes of County Down.

I hope the Minister will realise that the problem to which I have drawn attention is real and practical, and I trust that he and his advisers will address their minds to it.

1 am

Mr. Chris Patten: I am grateful to hon. Members for their thoughtful speeches on this important and valuable order. The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell), whom we again welcome to these debates, thought that the order might be a trifle overdue. At least we now have it. It is a good, comprehensive piece of legislation.

The hon. Gentleman said that the voluntary bodies in Northern Ireland were broadly in sympathy with the intentions of the order. I am sure that is right. I am equally sure that it is incumbent on officials in the Department of the Environment to show that we are determined to implement the order's provisions fully and vigorously.

The hon. Members for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) and for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) understandably introduced a slightly more controversial note into our deliberations with a reference to park hare coursing, on which I recognise that passions run high. As I have told both hon. Members previously, the introduction of provisions on park hare coursing would have been a significant change in the policy content of the draft wildlife order and would, under existing legislative conventions, have necessitated further consultation. That would have seriously delayed progress on the order, and that would have been unacceptable in view of the Government's obligations.

Given the content of the speeches on this subject, I should point out that the objections raised by the Northern Ireland Assembly about certain specific rules and practices of park coursing were discussed with the controlling body, the Irish Coursing Club. I am sure that it was an inadvertent mistake on the part of the hon. Member for Belfast, East, but the rule to which he referred stating that points are given for hares being killed was amended several years ago. It would, therefore, be injudicious to rest an argument on that point.

I understand that the Irish Coursing Club has introduced a number of practical changes this season to bring coursing in Northern Ireland more into line with coursing as practised in Great Britain. The Government believe that voluntary action of this sort is the quickest and most fitting response to the objections to park coursing, and that, in view of this development, it would not be appropriate to introduce legislation on the subject.

As the hon. Member for Belfast, East noted, the ICC has introduced a number of changes in park hare coursing, the effect of which, as I have said, is intended to bring park coursing more into line with open coursing as practised on this side of the water.

I have looked closely at the law governing coursing. There is no substantial difference between the state of the law in Northern Ireland and the position in the rest of the United Kingdom. When I was first lobbied on this subject, I was told that what was required was not the banning of hare coursing, but the bringing of the practice of coursing in Northern Ireland as far as possible into line with the practice in Great Britain. I was also told — which I dispute — that there is a substantial difference in the legal framework in Northern Ireland compared with Great Britain. Allowing for the differences dictated by topography, the ICC sought to bring it into line.

If hon. Members want to move further and faster and ban all coursing, they should use private Members' legislation, on which they have a free vote. It is nonsense to suggest that that route is not open in connection with Northern Ireland. For example, the Video Recordings Act, introduced as a private Member's Bill, is now the law and applies to the whole of the United Kingdom.

It would not be appropriate to use the order to try to ban park coursing. Since there is no difference between the legal position in Northern Ireland and Great Britain—certainly hares in Northern Ireland are at no legal disadvantage—it would not make sense to depart from our normal procedures.

Mr. Peter Robinson: Like the hares in Northern Ireland, I am thankful that they are not at a legal disadvantage, but they are dying because of the so-called sport which the Minister believes can be rectified only by a private Member's conscience. If the ICC's regulations do not have the required effect, is the Minister prepared to bring in the necessary legislative change instead of leaving it to hon. Members to pray and hope that they might have that opportunity?

Mr. Patten: For reasons which might not always be obscure, I retain the most profound antipathy to answering hypothetical questions. I repeat that when I was first lobbied by the hon. Gentleman and others on the issue, I was told to bring Northern Ireland into line with the practice on this side of the water. It is curious, but not surprising, that the argument has been changed — perhaps for understandable reasons—but my answer has to remain the same.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) referred to article 4(10). My hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) has great knowledge of the subject, and we welcome his contribution. That paragraph makes it possible to protect quarry species during what would normally be the open season whenever exceptional circumstances justify it—for example, in the event of oil pollution of inclement weather, such as we are having now.

I must tell the hon. Member for Isle of Wight that we can encourage a voluntary ban on wildfowling even before the legislation comes into force, as we did successfully in 1981. We were grateful to the parties to that agreement.

I can tell the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) that a ban can be applied to small areas of the Province as well as to the entire Province. That takes account of his practical and accurate observation about weather conditions in the Province.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight referred to the curlew. He and other's, including my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough, will recall that the curlew achieved complete protection as the result of an eleventh hour change to the Wildlife and Countryside Act by means of a Lords amendment. The species is more widespread and abundant in winter in Northern Ireland than it is in Britain. There is a tradition of shooting curlew—mainly inland birds, of which there are a large number in Northern Ireland—for food. However, there is no evidence that the species is suffering as a result of shooting, no doubt because the shooting of waders generally is infrequently practised by wildfowlers. The list of birds that may be shot during an open season has been substantially reduced. In the absence of compelling reasons, the curlew's status as a quarry species remains unchanged. That is obviously a position that we shall need to keep under review.

The hon. Member for Londonderry, East spoke quite properly of the importance of teaching children about conservation and wildlife. I wholly accept that. It is our intention to take a much more active role educationally, and we shall be distributing to all schools literature on this order and on the one that we shall be discussing shortly.

The hon. Gentleman asked about automatic shotguns. He was right in thinking that the ban on birds results from the EEC directive. He will probably know that automatic shotguns can still be used for controlling pests and that the ban applies only to those birds and animals listed in schedule 6. The hon. Gentleman explained the practical experience of a shooting man and asked whether there was any evidence of birds being shot after liberation. I can say that there is no such evidence of that happening in Northern Ireland. It is spreading in Europe and we do not wish to see it happening in Northern Ireland.

The hon. Gentleman asked about self-locking snares. I would have had a great deal more sympathy with his argument had he been talking about free-running snares. I share the view expressed by the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Walker), that self-locking snares are banned under the EEC wild birds directive.

Mr. William Ross: Can the hon. Gentleman tell me how many times he has actually set a snare?

Mr. Patten: I assume that the hon. Gentleman was being literal rather than figurative. I have not made it a practice to set snares. I appreciate that sometimes one is called upon to speak at the Dispatch Box on subjects of which one does not always have such an intimate knowledge as some hon. Members. This is clearly one such occasion in regard to snares, about which the hon. Gentleman knows more than I do. I can only say that I received a number of representations about that subject. It may be that views differ, but the overwhelming view agreed with the hon. Member for Belfast, North.

The hon. Member for Londonderry, East asked about article 15. I was interested to hear what he had to say. With the best will in the world, it is not possible for the Government to eradicate the existing species because of their widespread distribution. We are talking not only about animals, but, as anyone who knows and loves Strangford lough will know, about Spartina. The order is designed to prevent the spread of the undesirable species. I hope that we can do that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harborough spoke from his great love and knowledge of deer. Venison in Northern Ireland can be sold only to a licensed game dealer. I shall write to my hon. Friend giving details of the licensing conditions applicable to game dealers.

The hon. Member for Belfast, North made a powerful argument for conservation. He thought that the wardens, among others, should be given more extensive powers. I am bound to say that I have great personal reluctance towards extending police powers to those outside the constabulary. That is why I resisted arguments from a number of sources to do that in this order.

The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) spoke of the importance of being able to identify those species which are referred to in schedule 8. That is a substantial point, of which we shall have to consider how best to take account in our publicity and explanatory booklet that we shall be issuing about the order. I hope that we shall be able to satisfy him that we have done all that we reasonably can to identify the species, some of which, I fancy, are not familiar to either of us.

The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the primrose. He is right to say that the danger is the uprooting or tearing out of primroses which sometimes happens when people want to enhance the quality of their gardens, but at the expense of the countryside. That is why we have included the primrose in the schedule. On that Primrose League point, I commend the order to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Wildlife (Northern Ireland) Order 1984, which was laid before this House on 22nd November, be approved.

Nature Conservation (Northern Ireland)

1.16 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Chris Patten): I beg to move,

That the draft Nature Conservation and Amenity Lands (Northern Ireland) Order 1984, which was laid before this House on 22nd November, be approved.

In November 1983, the proposal for a draft Nature Conservation and Amenity Lands (Northern Ireland) Order was published for consultation. Comments were received up to 3 February 1984 and the proposal was considered by the Northern Ireland Assembly, which forwarded its report to the Secretary of State on 28 March last year. The Assembly welcomed the legislation and put forward 20 recommendations for amendment, together with 13 further recommendations seeking assurances largely relating to the implementation of certain aspects of the legislation. Eleven of the suggested amendments are included in the draft order and a number of the other recommendations are covered in substance by the provisions of the order as at present drafted.

I shall refer in due course to the more substantive changes resulting both from the consultation process and from consideration by the Northern Ireland Assembly, but I wish first to thank the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) for the contribution that he made to the order.

The Amenity Lands Act (Northern Ireland) 1965, which this order will supersede, is at present the cornerstone of legislation on nature conservation and countryside amenity in Northern Ireland. It was the first piece of legislation of its kind when enacted 20 years ago. In that time notable progress has been made with a planned programme of establishing nature reserves, areas of scientific interest and amenity areas. Several areas of outstanding natural beauty have also been designated.

However, the increasing pressures on the countryside from competing forms of land use and experience arising from the Act's operation over almost two decades have shown the limitations in its framework; amendments are now clearly necessary. These are incorporated in the measure, along with a necessary and perhaps overdue consolidation of the 1965 Act.

The order will bring Northern Ireland broadly into line with the rest of the United Kingdom in matters of countryside, recreation and amenity. It is not possible to do so precisely, because planning control is exercised differently in Northern Ireland. In addition, the executive responsibility in Great Britain for nature conservation and countryside recreation lies with two semi-autonomous bodies, the Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission. In Northern Ireland that function rests with the Department of the Environment.

However, the new provisions in the draft order draw heavily on Great Britain sources, specifically the Nature Conservancy Council Act 1973, the Countryside Act 1968, the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949 and the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

It is appropriate at this stage to mention that the publication of the proposal for a draft order prompted a debate on the question whether the existing administrative structure for conservation in Northern Ireland is the most appropriate or whether it could be improved by the establishment of a body, or bodies, on the lines of the Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission. As a result of the interest in this matter, the Department of the Environment of Northern Ireland is currently reviewing the existing structure. It has been assisted by a distinguished and independent expert in this sphere, Dr. Jean Balfour, whose report was published just before Christmas.

The Northern Ireland Assembly, among others, feels that there is considerable merit in the concept of a separate body for conservation in the Province. However, recognising the need for full public consultation following the review, and the desirability of bringing into effect at an early date the many improvements which the proposed order and the related wildlife order would introduce, the Assembly supported the order subject to the recommendations contained in its report. Any necessary alterations to the structure for conservation in Northern Ireland will therefore be the subject of a further Order in Council in due course. I am sure that we were right to proceed rapidly with this legislation and to consider the matter of structure at a more deliberate pace.

The existing functions of the Department in relation to nature conservation and countryside amenity are narrow. They are limited to the acquisition of lands for nature reserve and amenity purposes and the designation of national parks, areas of scientific interest and areas of outstanding natural beauty. These powers are restated in the order, but article 3 will enable the Department in future to exercise a wider range of nature conservation and countryside functions, similar to those administered by the Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission.

Article 4 recognises the land use demands of public bodies and requires that such groups, which include Government Departments, district councils and other statutory bodies, should take into account the requirements of nature conservation and countryside amenity in the exercise of their land-related functions. This has a direct analogue in section 11 of the Countryside Act 1968 and reflects an acceptance that the demands of nature conservation and countryside amenity should have the same consideration as other forms of land use planning.

Article 5 establishes a new conservation committee, the committee for nature conservation. It will assume the responsibilities of the existing nature reserve and wild birds advisory committees and will have certain additional functions under this order and also in relation to wildlife protection.

Parts III and IV are mainly consolidation and restate the Department's existing role in relation to amenity lands, national parks and areas of outstanding natural beauty. Consultation requirements in relation to the latter have, however, been considerably widened and fresh powers have been given to the Department to enable it to take more positive action towards the conservation of such areas.

In Part V, article 20 introduces the totally new concept of marine nature reserves and in that respect corresponds to section 36 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

The case for establishing statutorily protected marine nature reserves was made at considerable length in the 1979 joint Nature Conservancy Council — Natural Environment Research Council publication, entitled "Nature Conservation in the Marine Environment". It made the point that some of the primary objectives of conservation policy on land have been to conserve representative examples of plant and animal communities, to safeguard sites where research and experiment can be pursued without disturbance and to provide education facilities. It is illogical that such an approach should end at the low water mark, especially in view of the interdependence of marine and land-based life. Procedural instructions to designate marine nature reserves are precise and all power to create a reserve and to confirm byelaws regarding it will be vested in the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

For the first time, district councils are to be given the power to establish nature reserves within their areas and to acquire land for that purpose. It has long been a feature of Great Britain law that local authorities have this power and I look forward to district councils in the Province playing their part in conservation matters.

Part VI deals with areas of special scientific interest and its provisions represent the most substantive change in the proposal for a draft order since it was published for consultation. At that time it was recognised that considerable modification of the Great Britain procedure, found in sections 28 and 29, for example, of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, would be required in order to apply it to the Northern Ireland circumstances, in which, for example, the existence of a single-tier structure with the Northern Ireland Department of the Environment responsible throughout, required a single continuous procedure. It was clear that this was a matter that should be fully debated at the consultation stage. Hence, the proposal merely included a provision equivalent to section 28 of the 1981 Act with the Department at the same time encouraging full discussion of the matter through the circulation of a separate consultation paper to the main interests concerned and to the Northern Ireland Assembly. The provisions now included in the draft order are the result of that consultation. The procedure to be introduced will effectively protect areas of special scientific interest in Northern Ireland and at the same time enable the United Kingdom to comply with the requirements of the Berne convention. Parargraph (1) of article 25 eliminates the "three-month loophole" which has caused so much concern on this side of the water.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): The hon. Gentleman by-passed article 24. What do people believe to be the significant change? When article 14 was debated in the Assembly, the people's response was that it was better for the power to be discretionary than to be mandatory. A change in article 24 which shows that the power is discretionary rather than mandatory has caused concern. That was not on the list of changes noted in the response.

Mr. Patten: I am delighted to deal with that point, because I know that concern has been expressed in some quarters about article 24 as drafted. When redrafting this provision, it was felt that an enabling power similiar to that used for the creation of national parks, areas of outstanding natural beauty, marine nature reserves, and so on would be appropriate, achieving consistency of drafting within the context of the draft order. That decision was taken in the knowledge that the existing permissive powers in the draft order to which I have referred had not been challenged during the consultation process.

Our legislation runs together. The procedures in sections 28 and 29 of the equivalent legislation for Great Britain are mandatory in one section and ultimately permissive in section 29 which refers to the powers of the Secretary of State. The procedures give us a more streamlined and coherent mechanism. Nevertheless, I appreciate the concern expressed, so I shall give hon. Members a firm and unequivocal assurance that my Department will exercise its powers over areas of special scientific interest in a manner consistent with the objectives of these provisions. Scientific criteria for the selection of ASSIs are being prepared corresponding closely to those applied in Great Britain. I shall consider it an unshakeable obligation on my Department to declare as areas of special scientific interest all areas that meet those criteria.

We shall need to legislate again shortly if we are to implement, after a suitable period of consultation, the main recommendations in Dr. Balfour's report. If, at that stage, there are any reservations about the way in which we are implementing article 24, we shall be prepared—this is another firm commitment—to amend this order and to introduce a mandatory provision.

The financial provisions of article 29 widen the Department's existing powers to grant-aid voluntary bodies, which are presently limited to those under the Wild Birds Protection Acts (Northern Ireland) 1931 to 1968, to include any body which has among its objects the conservation of wildlife or of the countryside. This is entirely consistent with the position in Great Britain.

I am confident that the order will provide for the more effective administration of nature conservation and countryside amenity matters for many years ahead, although I accept that we may need shortly to introduce, as I have said already, further complementary legislation when we have all had a chance to form a view on the main recommendations of the Balfour report—sensible as I believe their broad thrust to be. I commend the order to the House.

1.29 am

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I am grateful again for the manner in which the Minister has taken us through the draft order.

There are two important aspects of the order. One is that it seeks to bring into line, as the Minister said, the nature conservation legislation in Northern Ireland with that in Great Britain. As he pointed out, it goes somewhat further, because it rectifies some of the weaknesses and loopholes that have become apparent in the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, and, not for the first time, we see legislation pertaining to Northern Ireland somewhat ahead of its counterpart on the mainland.

The other important aspect is that we meet our international obligations. We meet the obligations placed upon us by the European Community directive on conservation and wildlife and also, as the Minister said, the Berne convention.

The Minister was kind enough to take us through the consultation procedures which went on for about a year. There were therefore extensive consultations. The Northern Ireland Assembly Environment Committee subjected the order to detailed scrutiny. Amendments were made and, in general, the order was welcomed by those who have nature conservation at heart.

Notwithstanding that extensive consultation, one word in the text has been changed and the Minister met head on the point and the problem that that change might have brought about. He referred to consistency of draftsmanship. The word "may" has been placed in article 24, rather than the word "shall". Thus, powers which might have been mandatory have become discretionary. Discretion is always the better part of valour; free will is better than coercion; and thou mayest is better than thou shalt. It was the entire philosophy behind the play by Henrik Ibsen and a novel by John Steinbeck. The play by Ibsen was called "The Lady from the Sea" and the novel by Steinbeck was called "East of Eden". However, in relation to nature conservation and amenity, the change may be regrettable.

As the House is aware, article 24 deals with areas of special scientific interest. On the mainland, as the Minister said, the Nature Conservancy Council has a duty to notify sites which are of special scientific interest. Article 24 declares:

"Where the Department, after consultation with the Committee for Nature Conservation, is satisfied that an area of land is of special scientific interest, by reason of its flora, fauna or geological, physiographical or other features, and accordingly needs to be specially protected, the Department may make a declaration that the area is an area of special scientific interest."

The change in the wording from "shall" to "may" raises a number of issues on which we require elucidation.

Why was the change made after the consultation procedures had been completed? Why were interested parties not informed that the change had been made, but left to discover it only when they read the draft order published and delivered to the Palace of Westminster? Has the change in any way altered the obligation placed upon Her Majesty's Government by the European Community directive? Is the order still in line with the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981? If it is not, is it proposed to alter the Act to bring it into line with the order?

The Minister has explained why the amendment went into the text unannounced, but has it been before a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments? If the change was brought to the attention of the Committee, what, if any, were the comments of members of the Committee?

There can be little argument that when the order was originally published—and, indeed, even in accordance with the Amenity Lands Act 1965 for Northern Ireland—the Department of the Environment had a statutory duty to notify land as an area of scientific interest where that land, in its opinion, was required to be protected because of the wealth and richness of both flora and fauna. Now that that duty has become discretionary rather than mandatory, it gives the impression that there is a weakening of the sense of responsibility towards nature conservation in Northern Ireland. Having been brought in without consultation, it creates what the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds describes as "a very dangerous precedent" and one which

"undermines the good which has been done to improve the orders during the consultation."

I believe that the Minister's statement will go some way towards modifying that attitude, but, nevertheless, the point should be made.

The reasoning behind the change in the wording is further called into question when Ministers have argued in the past that the notification of land of special scientific interest is simply declaratory of its scientific value, rather than a decision as to its future management, but such designation is also of benefit to the landowner or farmer, for without that designation no information at all is forthcoming on the reasons for the site's value, and no advice can be given on future management. Indeed, no compensation would be available if permission were refused for further changes of land use in such an area.

Notification of some sites and failure to notify others of similar importance—an inevitable outcome of a may or may not policy—will cause confusion and increase rather than reduce concern over those valuable sites. In addition there are appropriate safeguards for the interests of those landowners and occupiers, including compensation where necessary, and those come into play at a later stage if and when there is a development proposal on the table to be considered.

Before leaving the subject I can do no better than quote from the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, which declared:

"We are at a loss to understand why the wording of article 24(1) has now been changed, and are moreover deeply disturbed by the perplexingly unorthodox way in which the change was introduced — tardily; unannounced; contrary to the expectations of the Northern Ireland Assembly; without consultation with any of the interested parties."

It is hardly surprising, in those circumstances, that the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds pressed for the withdrawal of the order and its resubmission in the form which originally contained the word "shall" rather than the word "may" in article 24(1).

As I mentioned earlier, in some ways the order is ahead of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, for that Act contains a recognised loophole. It became known as the three-month loophole; that is to say, during a three-month consultation period any owner of land subject to such a notification under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 might modify the land if he so wished. That would or might be to the detriment of conservation. In addition, he might do so without sanction. That preoccupied those Ministers responsible for the operation of the Act, and they are prepared to modify it when parliamentary time allows. Indeed, it may be that they will take advantage of the excellent private Member's Bill which my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) proposes to introduce to reform the 1981 Act.

The order is ahead of that Act because of the inclusion of articles 25 and 27. Article 25 prevents the owner or occupier of any land from tampering with it once there has been a declaration, and for so long as that declaration remains in force he cannot carry out, cause or permit to be carried out, on his land any operation or activity without written consent. My hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) introduced a private Member's Bill to modify the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 along the lines now defined by article 25 of the order. His Bill has now been superseded by that of my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields.

Should the Government take on board all the elements of the private Member's Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields, thus tightening, for example, the laws to prevent badger digging, empowering the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Forestry Commission to give Government grants for conservation practices——

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): What about Northern Ireland?

Mr. Bell: If the right hon. Gentleman is patient, I shall come to the matter to which he refers.

I was saying that should the Government tighten laws, empowering the Ministry and the Forestry Commission to give Government grants for conservation practices and making it easier for the Nature Conservancy Council to declare marine nature reserves, will those changes in the Wildlife and Countryside Act be followed by another order for Northern Ireland?

I should like to draw the attention of the House to article 20. Under the Wildlife and Countryside Act, it was thought desirable that there should be created marine nature reserves. The Minister referred to that in his explanation of the order and said that powers would be vested in the Secretary of State. Yet, because of the system of consultation on this side of the water, no marine nature reserves have been created. Are the provisions in article 20 the same as under the Wildlife and Countryside Act, and, if so, how many marine nature reserves does the Minister expect to be created in Northern Ireland as a result of the legislation?

Over and above the criticism which the Minister has taken on board and sought to assuage, a great deal in the order is welcome. We have seen that the habitat provisions of the order provide the long-awaited strengthening of conservation legislation in Northern Ireland. We are complying with our international obligations. We are witnessing, therefore, a significant stage in the development of conservation in Northern Ireland, and it should be further said that the order constitutes an efficient and practical framework for, to quote the RSPB again, "wise land-use planning and the conservation of natural resources".

However, two questions remain to be answered. Will this order and the Wildlife (Northern Ireland) Order be implemented? The Minister gave an assurance that the latter order would be. Secondly, will the resources be made available so that the orders can be fully implemented? There is an ungenerous suggestion abroad that the reason for the significant word change in article 24 from "shall" to "may" was based on resource considerations; that it would cost less to have a discretionary rather than a mandatory power placed with the Department of the Environment.

I am sure that the Minister would wish to take an early opportunity to refute such a suggestion. Nevertheless, it lingers on in the minds of those who have been involved in the consultative procedures. Any categorical assurances that he can give would be most welcome. They would be even more welcome if the Minister were to confirm that the resources overall will be available to implement the orders. These resources should mean greater staff and greater finance so that the conservation effort in Northern Ireland can be strengthened, rather than simply maintained. A desirable goal would be one where these resources were on a par with those available on the mainland.

We therefore join the Minister in commending the order to the House. We note the statement that he made in relation to the mandatory exercise of the power under section 25. He has offered to change the wording of that article in a future Order in Council if that is the appropriate course of action for him to take. We welcome that suggestion and, as he has done, commend the order to the House.

1.45 am

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): I am placed in the same embarrassing situation in which I was placed on the last order: while I naturally welcome the vast majority of recommendations contained in the order, I have one gripe. That flows, perhaps regrettably, from the procedures that are applicable to Northern Ireland business. The Minister will be aware, although the House may not, that while in the case of the last order I concentrated on dealing with what the Minister did not do, he did in fact accept 55 of recommendations of the Assembly.

In the case of this order, of the 33 recommendations of the Assembly, the Minister accepted 29. I leave to one side, perhaps ungenerously, those recommendations which he did accept and shall consider the areas in which we still have some difference of opinion. Nevertheless, I place on record the grateful acknowledgement of most people in the Assembly and in the Province of the contents of the order, which embraces two main themes, the first dealing with the structure of conservation in Northern Ireland and the second dealing with the protection of areas of environmental importance.

On the structure of conservation in Northern Ireland, I take some heart from a comment that the Minister made concerning the report of Dr. Jean Balfour. I have had the opportunity to read that report. I was relieved at the end of doing so because I am holding the ring, as it were, between colleagues in the Assembly and have to part my party leader from certain other colleagues; in other words, considerations of agriculture have been weighed against those of the environment. That Dr. Jean Balfour has steered what I consider to be a fair and balanced middle course helps me out of many difficulties that I might have experienced when the report is debated in the Northern Ireland Assembly.

I trust that, when I put this forward as a personal view, the Minister will accept every letter of it rather than putting it into the melting pot and considering afresh what emerges at the end of the process. I take encouragement from the fact that in relation to article 24 the Minister said that, if there were any reservations when he came to legislate for the structure of conservation, he would take that into consideration. This clearly shows that in his office he is already contemplating legislation for the structure of conservation. I for one would be eager to hear from the Minister at what stage that may be expected. More important, following the comments from the Opposition, does he believe that the resources for that structure can be found within his budget? I appreciate that there is pressure from priority areas such as housing and all too often conservation becomes a scapegoat and is left out when finances are allocated. I hope that the Minister will be able to say that it will be possible to meet the Balfour report in terms of finance.

In my discussions in the Assembly I discovered that the chasm that I had imagined between agricultural and environmental interests did not exist, that there was a great deal of common ground between them and that the two terms were not necessarily mutually exclusive. Indeed, many strong conservationists are members of the agricultural community and some of the best protectors of the natural habitat in the Province are farmers. I was pleased to find that the Ulster Farmers Union, the Agriculture Committee of the Assembly and even the Department of Agriculture in many ways were not unsympathetic to proposals to protect the environment.

The problem, however, is the unfortunate change of one word in the order. Again, this shows the weakness of our parliamentary procedures. Even when the Minister agrees that the word should not be as it is and the House would clearly be prepared to accept the change to which he has referred, he cannot do anything about it because Orders in Council cannot be amended, however sensible the amendment may be.

For once, the situation cannot be blamed on the Assembly, however much any hon. Member may wish to do so. The proposal for a draft order considered by the Assembly was perfectly satisfactory as it used the mandatory "will" or "shall" rather than the permissive "may". The Assembly made no recommendation because it was satisfied with the proposal, having had the advantage of both written and oral evidence from the Minister's Department which at no time referred to any proposed change in the wording.

None of the conservation and amenity groups made any comment on the matter because they, too, were perfectly satisfied. Indeed, we were aware that the 1965 Act was mandatory, as was the 1981 Act for Great Britain, so it was logical that the Northern Ireland order should take that form as its main purpose was to bring Northern Ireland into line with Great Britain. Suddenly, however, somebody somewhere in the Department brought out a rubber and a pencil and changed a proposal that had left everyone quite pleased into one that has alarmed the vast majority, if not all, of the conservation and amenity groups and bewildered many of the rest of us.

I recognise that the Minister in good faith has given an undertaking to the House. That is on the record and I know that he will stand by it. No matter how many of us may wish it, the Minister will not be with us always. He is undoubtedly destined for higher things. He may not be there to ensure that the guarantee that he has given to the House, and which the House no doubt accepts, will be upheld in the same spirit by his successors. The hon. Gentleman might—heaven forbid—even be succeeded by an hon. Member of another party, who might not take the same generous view of the interpretation of the legislation.

I hope that the Minister will tell us tonight that, regardless of whether there are major reservations, he will, when he finds that he can legislate for the Balfour report on the structure of conservation, correct this unfortunate mistake in the legislation and ensure that those who follow him have the strength of statute behind them when they take decisions.

I do not believe that the Minister was trying, by sleight of hand, to put one over on the Assembly, the conservation groups or the amenity organisations in the Province. Here is a way in which he can prove to us that I am right.

1.56 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): I join the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) in looking forward to the day, which is visibly coming closer, when the law in Northern Ireland will be made in a manner which enables it to be debated and amended in detail as is the law for the rest of the United Kingdom. Indeed, it was part of the encouragement of this evening's proceedings to have learnt that the Liberal party is now in favour of legislating for Northern Ireland, wherever practicable, within a United Kingdom Bill. Things are looking up, and we may not have to take part in niggling debates such as this for ever.

When there is a good row going on over a word—the argument between "may" and "shall"—the temptation to join in is irresistible. When I heard reference to the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, it occurred to me that there was a case for a royal society for the protection of parliamentary draftsmen. They are, as Dr. Johnson once defined a lexicographer, "harmless, necessary drudges" and it is only right that from time to time a word should be said in their favour. This evening, that is a task that it falls to me to take up.

I have read article 24(1) of the draft order without any inhibition caused by having previously considered a different draft, and I notice that the conditional part of that paragraph is voluntary. It is discretionary. For "Department" we have to read "Minister", doing the usual voodoo—that is now the in word—which is prescribed by the Northern Ireland Act 1974. The paragraph begins:

"Where the Department is satisfied that" such and such. We then proceed to the main sentence, of which the verb is now "may".

It seems to be self-evident that if a condition is discretionary, the act itself must be discretionary by nature and that, if the draftsman had originally written "may" he would have been acting in conformity both with good sense and with the drafting practice that, in other statutes, we have been accustomed to who in our younger days happily moved amendments to leave out "may" and insert "shall" and made such speeches as have been heard in the Chamber tonight.

I do not believe that there is anything wrong with paragraph (1) of article 24. What is wrong—this has come out in the debate—is the awkward manner in which the drafting was brought into consonance with logic and common practice at an awkward stage in the gestation of the order. This too is something which we would have avoided if we were legislating in the normal manner, for if we were legislating in the normal manner it would have fallen to the Minister in charge of the Bill first to decide whether he wanted to alter the drafting at any particular stage and then to come forward to Committee and move his amendment in the open. All of the speeches would then be recorded in the indelible pages of Hansard and there would be no suggestion of disappointment and no tremors of alarm would have run through the observing public as they have done as a result of this drafting alteration.

I hope that the Minister will take comfort from those remarks and also from the generous and comprehensive démenti of any other intention but that always expressed in relation to this article which he offered to the House.

I should like to raise with the Minister the relationship in this order between the functions of the Minister, or Department, and the functions of local authorities. Far be it from any hon. Member on this Bench to query powers entrusted to local government in Northern Ireland, but even when we see such powers entrusted, as they are in two places in this order in respect of nature reserves and areas of outstanding natural beauty, it is pertinent to inquire what is to be the division of responsibility and how that is to work out between the Minister and district councils. If the Minister is to make up his mind as to the nature reserves that need to be created, what scope is there to be for the district councils similarly to arrive at their own conclusions to create nature reserves? Are we to have competitive creation of nature reserves between local authority and Department, or is there some gradation of the desirability of nature reserves whereby the higher level of necessity will be met by ministerial decision and the lower level will be left to the discretion of the local authority? It seems to me that, with this order, we are entitled to some indication from the Government of the manner in which they believe these concurrent powers will be exercised by central and by local government.

The concurrence in the matter of nature reserves is on the face of the order. In the case of areas of outstanding natural beauty, the concurrence is between the powers in this order and some of the powers in the Access to the Countryside (Northern Ireland) Order 1983.

I draw the Minister's attention, and that of the House, especially to the provisions in paragraph (5) of article 14, which empowers the Minister to formulate proposals for, among other things, promoting the enjoyment of areas of natural beauty by the public and "providing or maintaining public access to it."

That latter provision is directly concurrent with the powers of local authorities under the access to the countryside order. It would be helpful if there were a certain statement of policy in that respect from the Government, especially as—in this I find myself in agreement with the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell)—the financial provisions in this order appear to be extraordinarily vague. Indeed, they are difficult to understand.

When one considers the financing of the provisions to which I have drawn attention, one learns in article 29 that the Department may "make grants to any body of persons" and

"give financial assistance by way of grant or loan".

There seems to be a strange inapplicability of the wording of that provision to the direct operations of the Department itself. It looks as if it were a provision of finance purely for the assistance of secondary bodies or secondary functions under the order. I hope that when he is replying to the hon. Member for Middlesbrough the Minister will be able to clear that up. I do not think it would be reasonable to expect him to offer in numerical terms any forecast or specification of the cost of implementing the order in successive financial years, but I think the House ought to understand better than it is easy to do from article 29 how the application of the financial provisions will work.

I return to the concurrence of powers for providing access to the countryside so as to utter a cautionary note which may have financial applications. About a year ago the Minister and I were in correspondence, helpful as correspondence with the hon. Gentleman always is, if I may say so, on access to the countryside in one of the areas of the most wild and glorious natural beauty in the most beautiful constituency in the United Kingdom, namely, South Down. I have in mind the Trassey valley in the Mourne mountains where public access exists, always has existed and should be properly preserved and safeguarded, if that were necessary.

Unfortunately, the result of unregulated public access is to bring considerable loss and damage to those who earn their livelihood or part of their livelihood from that countryside who happen to be members of one of those syndicates which for historical reasons control the use of the uplands in that part of the Province. They find that the unregulated access along undoubted rights of way to the joys of the countryside in that area results in damage and loss to themselves, simply because those who have access do not restrict themselves to the right of way nor their activities to enjoying the country but go as far afield as to collect firewood by demolishing fences and making fires for cooking and other purposes with the result of their ravages.

The correspondence between the Minister and myself terminated somewhat unsatisfactorily in February of last year with a reference to the fact that the district council could make an order, the terms of which could be agreed with the users of the land concerned. That left completely at large who was to do the policing of this access to the countryside and where the financial burden would be borne of any loss which rested with the users of the land as a result of the access that was accorded.

So we are brought back, not surprisingly, to finance in the end. One would wish to know how far the Department will stand behind the district councils in whatever is to be their distinct function, as opposed to the Department's own function in exercising the duties which can be undertaken under the order. I know that this is a problem to which the Minister has been alive. I place it upon the record deliberately because, though I agree with the hon. Member for Belfast, East that good agriculture is one of the best forms of conservation and enhancement of the amenity of the countryside, we must remember that there is always an attendant potential penalty which accompanies all these well-intended and desirable measures. That penalty is often not spread over the whole community but falls on individuals and specific groups to whom it is also our nature to have regard.

As well as giving sympathetic attention to these matters in his administration of the order, I hope that the Minister will also be able to make an illuminating reference to them when he replies.

2.10 am

Sir John Farr (Harborough): One of the most welcome features of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 was the firm requirement relating to SSSIs. This order contains a similar form of site of special scientific interest known as an area of special scientific interest.

I wish briefly to back up what has been said about article 24. The Royal Society for Nature Conservation, the national association of the nature conservation trusts, is concerned about the change in the wording to "may". It regards the change to be of such fundamental importance that it would like to see the order withdrawn and a new one introduced.

Unlike the House, it has not had the benefit of the Minister's explanation and his firm and generous undertaking that he will look at how this works. He also said that in any event he would be introducing new orders and legislation in relation to wildlife and countryside matters in Northern Ireland and that, if any concern still existed at that time, he would put the matter right.

However, it should be put on record that the Royal Society for Nature Conservation feels that, as the order is currently drafted, criteria other than scientific ones could easily creep into the decision about whether or not an area was scheduled. For example, it would be easy for a site with potential for industrial development not to be scheduled, thereby losing any benefit it might have received from an official label as to its importance.

These are the fears of the national association of the nature conservation trusts, a not unimportant body, which has been closely concerned with the hammering out of the structure of the order. While I know that it, like me, willingly accepts the undertaking that the Minister has already given, I hope he will recognise that this concern is widespread on both sides of the House.

2.14 am

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): I do not wish to labour the point about article 24, which has been referred to by every hon. Member who has spoken so far. However, this first-class order has a shadow hanging over it because of the change in the wording from "shall" to "may". Most people think that it should be "shall", as that more clearly reflects what was intended.

The Minister went a long way to assure us, but his words will be read over and over again, not only by the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, but by the Royal Society for Nature Conservation and many others who are concerned about any weakening of the order. I hope that the Minister will give us further assurances when he replies.

One of the failings of the Wildlife and Countryside Act is the lack of adequate resources provided to the Nature Conservancy Council and to a number of qualified people on the ground. That has now been met by an additional £7 million being made available to the NCC. That will allow it to take on at least another 100 staff.

The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds reckons that in the Countryside Commission, the NCC and the national parks about 2,000 people are deployed on conservation matters in Great Britain. However, it calculates that only 27 such people are deployed in Northern Ireland in the Department of the Environment, and they are spread about and have different obligations. The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) wondered where the money would come from to increase the numbers. More people will be needed if the measure is to be properly implemented.

Will it be possible to extend the work of the NCC to Northern Ireland? I hope that that will not be thrown against me as another Liberal suggestion. I do not see why the NCC should apply only to Great Britain. I do not want to reflect on the abilities of the members of the proposed committee on nature conservation, or on the Ulster Countryside Commission, but they will act merely in an advisory capacity and not operate on the ground carrying out orders.

Has the Balfour report been published, and will people other than hon. Members be able to make representations about it? Will there be adequate consultation? I assume that interested parties will be able to make representations to Ministers. I hope that discussions will be fruitful and that the error in article 24 will be remedied. I welcome the step forward. Northern Ireland is now ahead of the rest of the United Kingdom, and that is a jolly good thing.

2.17 am

Mr. A. Cecil Walker (Belfast, North): I have studied the order, and I commend the Government on their efforts in support of the principles of conservation and provisions for Northern Ireland.

Some aspects of the order concern me. As that concern might be due to my ignorance, I should be pleased if the Minister could clarify one or two matters.

I am interested in marine nature reserves, so I was happy to read in article 21 (2) (a) (ii) on page 16 that provision may be made "for prohibiting or restricting . . . the doing of anything therein which will interfere with the sea bed or damage or disturb any object in the reserve."

I agree with those sentiments, but I should like clarification of article 21 (5) on page 17. That states:

"Nothing in the byelaws so made shall make unlawful . . . anything done more than 30 metres below the sea bed."

I should have thought that anything done below the sea bed would interfere with any marine reserve.

Perhaps it refers to the safety of a vessel. It is not unlawful to discharge any substance from a vessel. Paragraph (4) (a) says that it is not intended to "prohibit or restrict the exercise of any right of passage by vessel other than a pleasure boat".

I do not know what difference there can be between a pleasure boat and a commercial boat. They are boats and they can cause problems in a marine reserve. They can erode banks and disturb the inmates. That seems to be recognised in article 30 (3) (b), which says that the Department "may prohibit or restrict, either generally or in a manner specified in the bylaws, the use of mechanically-propelled vessels on watercourses in, or whose shores lie within, any such land".

The order states that a watercourse

"includes tidal and coastal waters, rivers, canals, lakes and reservoirs."

I am pleased that arrangements can be made to provide grants to any body of persons involved in conservation, as that will encourage active participation in the protection of our habitat. It will be welcomed by all those interested in that part of our environment.

2.20 am

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): I had intended to follow the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) and berate the Minister about the change from "shall" to "may". They are always good words on which to base a few remarks. However, my right hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) has already given an explanation that I have not yet fully digested. I have no doubt that the Minister, who has greater back-up than I, will have sorted it out and will have his own views. Having said that, the information that we have been given is that nature conservancy in Great Britain has a statutory duty to declare an ASSI.

I do not yet understand whether there is a difference between the end result in Great Britain and Northern Ireland. I welcome assurances, but Ministers and Governments change. However, a statutory right would remain unless it was brought before the House and changed. For that reason, I am unhappy and want to hear rather more about it.

I wish to ask one or two questions about finance. Under article 7, the Department may make grants either by way of the Department of the Environment or otherwise to the National Trust for the acquiring of land. Under article 29, the Department of Finance and Personnel may make grants "to any body or persons (not being a body carried on for profit) having among its objects the conservation of wildlife or of the countryside."

That does not have to be the only objective of the body; it is only one of several. Organisations may have more than one interest and they may not be universally loved, even if the Government are prepared to give them money. One wonders whether any grants, loans and financial help will be used in a way that might be detrimental to the desires and wishes of others who might have an interest in that same land.

The Government are giving a financial advantage, even if it is only an offsetting financial advantage. Heaven only knows when money goes into an organisation what the end result will be. I am always unhappy about such measures. I would prefer the Department to have taken direct responsibility for those matters rather than subsidise someone else to do it. It would be simpler and more straightforward for the individual directly responsible to be on the Government Bench so that we could question him. However, instead, the matter is dealt with at arm's length and hon. Members can be fobbed off. The Department of the Environment is the proper body to take direct responsibility for those lands.

There is the whole question of covenants and management agreements. As time is running out, I shall not go into that matter too deeply. I wish to draw to the attention of the farming community in Northern Ireland that once such a covenant or management agreement is entered into, it is permanent. Therefore, there is a permanent loss to the landowner. It is doubtful whether the successors in title would in all cases be happy that an agreement had been made. I would not as a landowner wish to make any commitment which extended beyond my lifetime, as one has no way of knowing what the next generation will do or what the end result might be. The farming community will need to consider this matter deeply before entering into any commitment.

It will be possible under article 19, by byelaw, to prohibit "the shooting of birds or of birds of any description within such area surrounding or adjoining the nature reserve".

How will that work? What is meant by "area surrounding"? How wide will be the boundary of land which is not under the direct control of the body which controls the nature reserve? Will it be 100 yards, one mile, or what? Sportsmen will want to have that made clear.

There is the problem of seals in relation to marine reserves. The Under-Secretary will be aware of the problem with seals on the west coast of Scotland. While they may not pose a major problem off the coasts of Northern Ireland, they are of concern to salmon fishermen. These problems are well known to the Minister. I should not like the position to be reached when everybody loved the seals so much that they forgot about the fish and the fishing communities.

Mr. Chris Patten indicated assent.

Mr. Ross: I am glad to see the Under-Secretary nodding in agreement.

In Scotland, the needs of fishermen are being ignored, and the right of seals to multiply for ever is being greatly respected. I hope that the Minister will give an assurance that easily understood regulations will be laid to enable everyone to understand what is an adequate number of seals—or of any species of wildlife in a reserve—so that numbers may be kept to reasonable levels.

As other hon. Members have said, the implementation of these provisions will depend on money being available. As this is partly an exercise in centralisation, I hope that the money will be forthcoming.

What demands are placed on us in this connection by the EEC and the Berne convention? Only in the Minister's closing remarks on the preceding order did it become plain that the real reason for introducing the ban on snares and automatic shotguns was the demand of the EEC. That, in my eyes, was enough to condemn the proposal straight away.

2.24 am

Mr. Chris Patten: I am grateful for this opportunity to respond to the debate.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell), in an interesting speech, said that he thought that we were, by the order, improving on Great Britain legislation, and that was a fair point for him to make. He then said—this point was made by a number of hon. Members—that appreciation of the progress that we were making by the order had been somewhat undermined by the terms in which article 24 had been drafted.

There is not much point in my seeking to adduce once again the reasons for the choice of words in article 24. I must clearly take responsibility for what happens in my Department and for the terms in which its legislation is drafted. I have listened carefully to the views of hon. Members, especially to those of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), who made, I think, his inaugural address on behalf of the royal society for the protection of parliamentary draftsmen. He put the point rather better than I could have done.

I appreciate that suspicions have been aroused by the drafting of article 24. The hon. Members for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) and for Belfast, North (Mr. Walker) have voiced them with their customary civility. I assure the hon. Gentlemen that their suspicions are groundless. However, I should not want them to blight what has been an agreeable occasion, or what is important and valuable legislation.

In the circumstances, it is reasonable for me to go further than I went in my earlier remarks and to give the undertaking that when we bring forward legislation, as we shall be obliged to do in due course to implement the Balfour report, we shall amend the wording in the article so that it takes account of the arguments that have been advanced. I hope that that will be regarded as satisfactory by the House. The issue was taken up also by my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) and by the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross). I hope that my undertaking will reassure those who understandably, are anxious. In the meantime, I repeat that my Department regards it as an obligation to declare as ASSIs all areas which meet the criteria which we shall be drawing up.

Mr. William Ross: As the Minister knows, there appear frequently from the departments of the Northern Ireland Office various orders which contain mistakes. Subsequently we receive a small slip which tells us that there is a error and that a word should be substituted for the one printed in the order. Can that not be done in this instance?

Mr. Patten: No. As always, the hon. Gentleman has made a seductive proposition, but it is not one that will lure us into his boudoir. I wish that life was that simple and straightforward. I have noted what hon. Members have said during the debate, and my response is given on behalf of the Government. The hon. Member for Belfast, East said that I might be taken away to higher things. I assure him that, like my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, who preceded me at the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland, there is no more important Department than that for which I am responsible.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough referred to marine nature reserves. The provisions relating to them are the same as those in the Wildlife and Countryside Act. Surveys are being undertaken to determine the criteria for the reserves and to identify potential reserves. We are all too conscious of the problems which have been faced on this side of the water. Monitoring is taking place, and should similar problems arise in Northern Ireland we shall seek to remedy the position, especially in the light of future changes that are made in Great Britain legislation.

The hon. Member said that in order to implement this legislation fully we would need, as the Balfour report suggested, to provide resources of manpower and cash. I accept that point, which the report agrued strongly. It would be injudicious and dishonest of me to pretend that the sky is the limit in providing resources. Nevertheless, I appreciate the fact that we need to do more and that, even while my Department has other pressing priorities, we need to commit greater resources. I am bound to confess that I doubt that the increase in resources will match what people will press us to provide.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight referred to the Balfour report. I shall ensure that he is sent a copy. We shall welcome representations from everyone. I doubt that we could stop any representations. We look forward to the representations that we shall receive about that extremely thoughtful document, which was highly commended by the hon. Member for Belfast, East. I welcome the broad thrust of the document's proposals. Legislation will be required to implement them.

The right hon. Member for South Down referred especially to the relationship between the functions of the Department of the Environment and those that will be discharged by local authorities. He had in mind particularly the functions referred to in article 22, which follow the position that has obtained in great Britain since 1949. Clearly, we shall need to proceed, wherever possible, by agreement. The Department of the Environment will continue to establish nature reserves of national standing. Nature reserves of local status can be established by district councils. We shall encourage district councils to use the grants that we provide to enhance and control public access to areas of outstanding natural beauty.

The right hon. Member for South Down mentioned the loss of amenity by misuse by visitors to Trassey valley. The district council in that area may have a range of service grant — aided by the Department of the Environment. Where the district council makes an access agreement with a landowner, such as in the case to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, it takes over responsiblity and public liability for that land. I shall look again at that case. I should like to think that we could be helpful, working with the district council or with the Mournes advisory committee, because I share the right hon. Gentleman's regard for and love of that area, even though I do not yet share his knowledge of it.

The right hon. Member for South Down asked about total expenditure. It is difficult to be precise. The order contains five new powers under which financial aid may be given, first, to district councils to acquire land for nature reserve purposes; secondly, to landowners under nanagement agreements in respect of ASSIs; thirdly, to the owner of an estate in an agricultural unit who can show that he has suffered a reduction in the value of his estate which is directly attributable to the declaration of an ASSI; fourthly, to the owner of any estate in land comprised in an ASSI who can show that he has incurred loss or damage or abortive expenditure as a consequence of an extension of the initial three-month period of restriction or negotiation; and, fifthly, to voluntary conservation bodies and individuals under article 29. We are setting aside funds for those items in the financial year 1985-86. At this stage it is a little difficult to be precise about figures. We shall not be able to define the financial requirements accurately until the order has been in operation for a year or two.

I repeat what I said earlier to the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, that I recognise that we will have to commit more resources out of our fairly hard-pressed budget if the provisions in this legislation are to have the effect that we should all like.

The hon. Member for Belfast, North asked about local marine nature reserves and the possible interference with the passage of shipping, including pleasure boats. I hope that that will not occur. The right of innocent passage, as the hon. Gentleman will be aware, is an international obligation under the 1958 convention on the territorial sea and the contiguous zone. The byelaws that we shall produce cannot override international obligations to which we are a party. I hope that it will be possible to proceed in these matters by co-operation.

The hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) asked about article 7. The National Trust is mentioned because of its statutory base. As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, it is established under an Act of Parliament. He also asked about article 22. The principle of giving grants is to encourage more bodies and individuals to be actively involved in conservation. He mentioned marine nature reserves, and there will, of course, be full consultation to determine marine nature reserves. We have provided for public inquiries before they are specified. Therefore, I hope that the relevant points that he mentioned can be dealt with during those consultations and the process of inquiry.

I shall conclude with the last sentences of the report by Dr. Balfour, which has been mentioned so often this evening. In her last sentences she wrote that > "the opportunities for change provided by the Access to the Countryside (Northern Ireland) Order 1983 and the two Draft Orders must be grasped and the chance to develop new relationships in the countryside seized with purpose and understanding. Such initiatives can benefit those who live and work in the Northern Ireland countryside and those who visit and enjoy it, but most important of all will be the contribution to the quality of life in the Province. To do this requires a will at political and departmental level to change, and a commitment to provide the resources to do the job."

My Department looks forward to meeting that challenge and to providing the commitment which I know will be available from those who work in my Department.

It is my task to ensure that there are enough of them and that they have the resources to do the job which to date they have done so competently.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Nature Conservation and Amenity Lands (Northern Ireland) Order 1984, which was laid before this House on 22nd November, be approved.

Home Improvement Grants

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

2.43 am

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The subject for my Adjournment debate is simple. Selling home improvements has become a high-pressure business, with high pressure at the door, through advertising in magazines and all the other advertising techniques. People offer guarantees. On double glazing, the guarantee can be for five years; on damp proofing it can be for 10 to 15 years; and on house extensions it can be for 10 years.

Such guarantees are a big inducement. They are featured prominently in many advertisements. I have one for Wallguard damp protection products with a huge "Stop it" guarantee for 30 years which claims that Wallguard unconditionally guarantees the treatment carried out to eliminate rising damp for 30 years. That advertisement appeared in the Sunday Express colour magazine on 2 December, 1984, and that same week Wallguard went into liquidation. Thereby hangs my tale.

Not only are many of the guarantees vague; they suffer from limitations of cover. People are guaranteed in the sales talk that there will be no condensation if double glazing is installed, and when the guarantee arrives it does not cover condensation. People suffer from exclusions of liability for consequential losses. If the damp coursing does not work and the whole room has to be redecorated or replastered, often that is not covered by the guarantee. Some of the guarantees are unenforceable without the assistance of a good lawyer, and all of them are only as good as the company that offers them. They are meaningless with a bad company that does not live up to its obligations; they are all right in the case of a good company. But they are all useless if the company goes bust, because they give the holders no right and they give the holders no claim, and as creditors the holders have no status. The guarantees effectively die with the company. But the problems caused by inadequate workmanship or faulty goods linger on.

Therefore, the question is: how can we guarantee the guarantees? It is an important question to anybody who wants to improve his own house. This is a £3,000 million a year business. I suppose we all want to improve our houses. Indeed, one of the most striking features of the past 15 years has been the great surge of home improvement. At times it seemed that the hills were alive with the sound of hammers as home improvement went on. It makes life better, it makes life more comfortable, and it improves the housing stock of the country. It is, indeed, a national service. I should have thought, therefore, that a Government who proclaim their commitment to home ownership would want to safeguard that business and the guarantees that are an essential part of it.

The business is highly competitive and has brought in sharp operators—in some respects cowboys. Guarantees are needed against their inadequacies. Home improvements last for years; the householder is guaranteed that they will live up to the claims made for them. He needs guarantees to give him peace of mind. But what happens if the company goes bust?

There have been several examples in recent months. One of them was Monarch Home Extensions, Peterborough-based, which was offering 10-year guarantees on its work. Another was Coldshield Windows, a big name in the business, which was offering five-year guarantees on its double glazing. There was Mulberry Home Extensions. There was Wallguard Damp Treatment, which I have already mentioned and which was offering a 30-year guarantee. The last three, Coldshield, Mulberry and Wallguard, were taken over by the Hawley Group in September 1984. The intention then was said to be to combine Coldshield with Alpine, which the Hawley Group already controlled, but in fact all three companies were liquidated in December. A number of householders —it might be as high as 2,000—holding guarantees for work done by those companies were left with worthless guarantees. They had trusted the reputation of the company, they had taken the guarantee, and they were left with no redress or stake; they were not even told, in many cases, that the company which offered them the guarantee had gone into liquidation.

The Hawley Group was happy to take on those companies earlier in the year. It has a similar business, Alpine Double Glazing, so that it can absorb sales money and take on uncompleted business, but it does not feel any compulsion to take on the guarantees offered by the companies that it took over. The Hawley Group is a big group—its turnover in the first six months of 1984 was £119 million — but it has nothing to spare for the guarantees of people who had had work done by the companies that it took over last year. It has just taken over four United States companies concerned with cleaning and landscaping for a first payment of £4·4 million, but there is nothing to spare for the guarantees issued by Coldshield, among others.

The merger makes good business sense, but it does not make good business sense to take on the obligations of the companies that are taken over and then liquidated. For example, there were obligations to old couples with badly fitted double glazing and people with damp courses that were not working properly. That has happened not only with the companies that I have quoted but with a whole range of companies. I have a letter from Mr. Donald Livingston of Largs in Scotland, who says:

"Having 25 years experience in the Aluminium Window Industry and a former member of The Aluminium Window Association I am disgusted with the present state of affairs in the Replacement Window Industry."

Mr. Livingston writes:

"The main problem lies in the installation of replacement windows. Old windows are ripped out and new ones installed and with timber facings, beading etc., fitted internally, the customer cannot see if the job has been 'botched'. Poor external mastic painting eventually leads to water penetration."

Mr. Donald Livingston includes in his letter a cutting from the Sunday Post with a customer complaint to the newspaper. Mr. D. Jenkins writes:

"Last April, we decided to have double glazing by Alva Glen Windows, Ltd. After the fitting in July, we've had leaking frames, seals incomplete, dust and debris in the sealed glass, etc. They came three times to rectify the faults, which are still there. I've heard they're in financial trouble."

The newspaper replies, somewhat tersely:

"Afraid you're right, Mr. J. Firm in liquidation. Will send address which should be helpful."

I wonder whether it was. That is the sort of thing that is happening all too often and for which, if the firm goes out of business, the customer has no redress.

Therefore, the guarantee is not what it is supposed to be—something to give the customer peace of mind and confidence in the installation. It is not rare, because over a score of companies, many small, have gone bust in the past few months, some this week. The problems they face are the recession, and the facts that the trade is overcrowded and has probably peaked, and that VAT was imposed on home improvements in June. The situation will get worse now that interest rates have risen by 2·5 per cent. because that will be a bitter blow to a business that has become intensely, almost hysterically, competitive.

The extent of that competition is shown by the increasing hysteria of many of the advertisements, which say, "35 per cent. off", "One third off", "Save up to 40 per cent." Those cries reveal a business in a frenetic state of competition. A business that depends, as this one does, on credit, will be hard hit by a 2·5 per cent. increase in interest rates. Something needs to be done, and done soon if the industry is, as I have prophesied, facing severe problems.

I have some suggestions. My Adjournment motion refers to home improvement grants. I approached the matter in that way, frankly, because in an Adjournment debate one cannot propose legislation. I suggest that the firms carrying out home improvements that qualify for grants be required to offer enforceable bonded or insured guarantees that will live on if the firm goes out of business and that those guarantees should be satisfactory in terms of the Office of Fair Trading criteria set out in its documents. That is essential, as I know from bitter personal experience of trying to get redress against a firm the work of which was inadequate, which had been done in my own home, on a home improvement grant. The firm went into liquidation. The council obligingly offered that I could sue it to get redress but then told me that that would probably cost more than the cost of the work in the first place. That is the first avenue of approach.

The second approach is to ask the Newspaper Publishers Association to modify its code of conduct and ensure that the guarantees that feature so prominently in advertisements—for example, a guarantee of 30 years issued in the week that the company went into liquidation —are enforceable and will live on. It should ensure that the newspapers do not go in for the practice of accepting advertisements from firms known to be in difficulties, which offer long-term guarantees that they cannot fulfil.

Thirdly, we can legislate so that, if a firm takes over after a company has been liquidated, it also takes on the liability of that company's guarantees. In this way, if a firm which offers guarantees goes into liquidation, those guarantees can be enforceable subsequently and the people who hold the guarantees will have a claim against the company. We should legislate to ensure that the guarantees are valid, bonded or covered by insurance.

Fifthly, the trade associations have a role. A responsibility falls on the trade associations for the different sections of the home improvement industry. There should be an industry bonding scheme. In the instance of Coldshield, the Office of Fair Trading has already drawn up a code of conduct in the cowboy country of double glazing in conjunction with the Glass Glazing Federation, yet the only responsibility that the Glass and Glazing Federation had when Coldshield collapsed, leaving tens of thousands of customers with worthless guarantees, was to say that, when people had put down the money and not had the order fulfilled, the federation would get another firm to put it in, an effort which was not much use.

[Mr. Austin Mitchell]

The inadequacy of that effort contrasts with the Guaranteed Treatments Protection Trust which was set up recently by the British Wood Preserving Association and the British Chemical Dampcourse Association Ltd. to stand in place of any member contractor who ceases trading leaving unexpired long-term guarantees so that the guarantee through that organisation becomes a secured promise. We should commend and encourage that kind of industry effort as an important way of dealing with the problem.

The aim of responsible and respectable trade associations should be proper bonding in a trade association registered with the Office of Fair Trading so that it is known that the bonding is acceptable and those bonds will live on. This could bring some order and sense into what is still cowboy country and ensure that firms behave responsibly and are prepared to offer guarantees which can be enforced and which they can live up to. That is essential in an industry where conditions are becoming increasingly tougher.

In many respects, the tale of house improvements guarantees is a sorry one. I do not say that everybody with a guarantee should immediately reach for the panic button. Some progressive firms offer effective guarantees, and most guarantees are reliable as long as the firm survives and can be prodded by publicity, legal action or some other kind of pressure into honouring the guarantees. The problem is that not all firms are like that and that few guarantees are bonded or insured. Several firms have got into difficulties and other firms may well be threatened in the near future in the present tough conditions that industries are experiencing—a situation that has been made tougher by the Government's action on interest rates.

It is no use saying: let the buyer beware. I agree with the Office of Fair Trading that it is necessary to educate the consumer to know what rights he has under the guarantee. The consumer must be protected. That entails using the leverage of improvements grants to impose conditions, prodding the trade associations into effective action and enacting legislation to give rights to the guarantee holder. Providing a guarantee is a direct contract between the customer and an authorised insurer. Alternatively, it should be properly bonded in the industry.

There should be a concerted effort to ensure that guarantees mean something instead of being merely a means of conning the consumer into making long-term purchases, which all these items are. Guarantees should be a discipline on an industry which certainly needs one. It is in the interests of the reputable firms in the industry to control the cowboys and to make sure that all firms live up to standards and compete on the basis of satisfaction to the customers.

Home ownership is important and should be encouraged. Home improvement must also be stimulated. To do that the Government have a responsibility to act on the guarantees offered in the industry.

2.59 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Alex Fletcher): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) for raising and drawing attention to this subject. There cannot be any hon. Member who over the years has not heard complaints from constituents who have had a great deal of their savings or time and effort wasted by cowboy builders or so-called guarantees or commitments which were not followed through when things went wrong with the business. I am sympathetic, to say the least, and anxious to see what solutions can be found.

The industry is extremely diverse, ranging from the one-man business, and indeed the moonlighter, to very substantial firms, and it is not easily organised into a system of trade associations which could achieve the kind of self-regulation that one would like. I emphasise self-regulation and shall return to it in more detail later.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, the industry generally and the home improvements sector have been studied by the Director General of Fair Trading. In June 1983 the Director General produced a major report on the subject with a large number of recommendations, including cooling-off periods, written contracts, a general duty to trade fairly, encouragement of warranty schemes and standard contract terms. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the recommendations are being very seriously considered by my colleagues at the Department of the Environment. Indeed, I believe that the matter was debated in the House about a year ago.

In a home improvement transaction, as in any other, the primary responsibility must rest with the purchaser—the home owner—to satisfy himself that he is getting the best possible job done. The Office of Fair Trading has provided very useful guidance on this, including an invaluable checklist of seven golden rules for home improvements.

It is always worth choosing a reputable builder and taking full advantage of the schemes increasingly being offered by the construction industry to improve its services. One must, of course, look behind the schemes. I hope that the publicity provided by this debate and the hon. Gentleman's interest in these matters will be further warning to consumers not to take advertisements, such as the one to which he referred, at their face value. I do not know whether it would be practicable for newspaper publishers to try to impose some discipline among themselves to look into such schemes, but the hon. Gentleman's suggestion is certainly worth following up with the Director General, with whom I believe the hon. Gentleman is in correspondence.

The hon. Gentleman particularly mentioned damp-proofing. I believe that he mentioned the joint guarantee scheme offered by the British Chemical Dampcourse Association Ltd. and the British Wood Preserving Association, under which member firms offer an independent insurance scheme to clients on payment of a small premium, providing a 20-year back-up guarantee intended to cover situations in which individual contractors go out of business. That appears to be an ideal type of scheme, in that it is independently covered by the insurers and will take effect in cases of insolvency.

I was very pleased, just recently, to learn of the launch of the new guarantee scheme of the Building Employers Confederation by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment. As he said on that occasion, the irresponsible section of the industry has fed Esther Rantzen with a rich and steady diet—which, alas, means that much of the industry is tarred with the same brush.

My hon. Friend also pointed out then that repair, maintenance and improvement is becoming an increasingly important part of the construction industry work load. Ten years ago repair and maintenance made up only 28 per cent. of all construction work: last year, it had increased to about 40 per cent. The business is expanding.

It is normal in such circumstances for people to look to the Government to provide some form of statutory regulation or licensing for firms in the industry. I do not believe that that would be the right answer. I doubt the practicability of such a scheme. I cannot think of an industry that would be more difficult to organise in such a way than the building industry. That is why self-regulation seems to me to be the only way forward.

That view is shared by the Director General of Fair Trading, who has actively pursued a policy of developing codes of practice for many sectors of industry. He has, for example, helped in the formation of a code of practice by the Glass and Glazing Federation which covers, amongst other things, double glazing, to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

There are other schemes. The Building Employers Confederation guarantee scheme was a major step forward in changing the image of the industry and helping to restore confidence to those who have suffered in the past. There are also schemes operated by the Federation of Master Builders, the plumbers and the roofing contractors. The schemes offer varying degrees of guarantee.

Looking to a wider front, I know that the hon. Member is generally concerned about the situation of guarantees and what happens when companies go out of business; and I know he is concerned about other companies assuming responsibility for guarantees and for passing on information to guarantee-holders.

The Government's proposals for the reform of the insolvency legislation—a major Bill received its Second reading in another place on Tuesday—will provide an additional degree of protection for consumers, especially through the wrongful trading provisions, which are aimed at directors of businesses who, knowing that they have become insolvent, continue to undertake obligations that they cannot meet.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Would it not be possible to table amendments to the Bill giving rights to guarantee-holders? They have a financial stake in the company that goes out of business, so their rights should be recognised in any insolvency proceedings.

Mr. Fletcher: Yes; but the liability would be a contingent liability. It would not be a liability that an official receiver or liquidator could take into account. That would be the difficulty. Only if the guarantee-holder had to call in another contractor to do the work, or incurred some other expense, might he rank as a creditor.

I do not, therefore, think that the hon. Gentleman's suggestion is a practical one. We can, however, make directors act more responsibly, and minimise loss and damage, through provisions such as the wrongful trading provisions. Where they wilfully took on obligations that they knew that they could not honour, directors would effectively lose the protection of limited liability. The hon. Gentleman must agree that that is a step in the right direction.

The problems that have been identified, particularly in the Director General's home improvements report, can best be overcome by voluntary controls on the part of the industry and by greater care on the part of members of the public as these problems are increasingly brought to their attention and they become much more suspicious of guarantees.

As the hon. Gentleman will know, many people—including myself—have bought television sets and paid the extra £25 for a five-year guarantee, only to find that they have become responsible for insurance, having contracted with perhaps an authorised company that is not authorised in that line of insurance. I should add that that was before I took on my present responsibilities. That might be more luck than good thinking, but I had better put it on the record.

The hon. Gentleman will know from the letter that he has received from the Director General of Fair Trading that consumer guarantees are the subject of a discussion paper which was published in August last year. It makes preliminary recommendations that guarantees should be clear and comprehensive, have standard terminology, that, as will almost invariably be the case with construction guarantees, they are for more than one year and that they should take the form of a direct contract of insurance between the purchaser and an authorised insurer so that, in the event of the contractor's insolvency, the consumer will be protected. The consumer will be a party to the insurance contract. I am sure that is a desirable objective.

There are bound to be difficulties for some companies in obtaining insurance cover. That gives the consumer the opportunity to test the company with which he is proposing to do business. There is nothing wrong with that. The trade associations might have some supporting authority or insurance companies might make it clear that a scheme is approved. That could provide real protection. I should encourage the industry to consider such schemes as the Director General is developing.

It is argued that home improvement grants should be linked to long-term guarantees. However, only about 10 per cent. of home improvement and repair work involves home improvement grants. Of some £8 billion-worth of work carried out last year in repairs, maintenance and improvements, only £900 million was given in grant. Therefore, linking the grant with consumer protection would leave the vast bulk of home improvement work unaffected. I understand the hon. Gentleman's reasons for advancing that argument, but that approach would not tackle the scale of the problem.

During the past year, the Government have been carrying out a thorough review of private sector housing improvement policies, including the home improvement grant system. We hope to publish our proposals shortly in the form of a consultation document. The question of guarantee or warranty schemes, and their application to home improvement work, will be covered.

The aim is, in due course, to introduce legislation to simplify the present grant system and to ensure that the money which is available for grants is spent where it is most needed and does good. We have considered measures to ensure that work financed with the aid of a grant is carried out by reliable contractors to a good standard. The hon. Gentleman will tell me to get into that and define a reliable contractor. He is one who is properly and adequately insured——

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Surplus Grain

1. Mr. Barron asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much of the EEC surplus grain is held in the United Kingdom.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): Some 11·9 million tonnes of cereals were held in intervention in the European Community on 4 January 1985, the latest date for which figures are available. Of this, 2·9 million tonnes were in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Barron: Does the Minister agree that it costs more to keep grain in Britain and the EEC than to give it to the northern region of Africa, to countries such as Ethiopia and to many others in that region, many of which are in dire need of that grain at present, and that to give that grain away is not only economic but humanitarian? What do the Government intend to do about the present need in that area?

Mr. MacGregor: Unfortunately, I cannot agree that the economic cost works out quite as the hon. Gentleman suggests. It is more expensive. Nevertheless, I share his humanitarian objective. The United Kingdom Government are playing a major and leading part within the EC in the export of grain as emergency food aid. Substantial quantities of grain are supplied by the EC and the United Kingdom as food aid. The hon. Gentleman will know that the European Council meeting in Dublin agreed to provide 1·2 million tonnes of grain to the African countries before the next harvest, on top of substantial amounts that have already gone out this year.

Mr. Leigh: Does my hon. Friend agree that cereal farmers need more certainty and that either we should get the grain out of intervention by more restitution and export credits, particularly to the eastern bloc, or, failing that, that farmers should be told that we now have a low input and output economy for cereals and that over the next five years there will have to be a cut in real prices?

Mr. MacGregor: As my hon. Friend will know, we are exporting considerable quantities of grain. Indeed, exports of grain on the open market are cheaper than exports of grain in intervention. Therefore, there are limits to the extent to which one can increase export restitutions. But my hon. Friend is right to be concerned about the surplus and its cost. Everything that has happened this year supports the Government's objective in the forthcoming price review of severe restraint on prices, coupled with the full application of the guarantee threshold, which will have something of the effect that he suggests.

Mr. Geraint Howells: Has the Minister any plans to persuade his counterparts in Europe of the need to change the intervention system within the Community in the next few years?

Mr. MacGregor: The most important thing that we can do, in order to get down the potential cost of the surpluses that we now have that could go into intervention, is to have restraint on cereal prices. Most of the other suggestions, which are not on the table for negotiation in the Community, such as quotas, are impracticable and would be wrong. The right objective is to tackle the problem through restraint on support prices.

Mr. Ralph Howell: Does my hon. Friend agree that that is precisely what we were doing and what was being advocated before the milk crisis burst and quotas had to be imposed? Are we not going down exactly the same road as before?

Mr. MacGregor: If the policy on milk prices that I have been advocating had been adopted, we might have avoided quotas. We made a significant difference in the price review last year in a variety of ways, which effectively brought cereal prices down in real terms, and we must build on that.

Mr. John: Does the Minister agree that the figures that he has given represent a rise of a third in the grain in intervention in the past year? Does he further agree that if we are to consider a cut in the price of grain—what he calls price restraint—3·1 per cent. is unlikely to take any grain farmer out of the production of grain? Should he not press for a higher figure as a real cut to signal to farmers—in the words of his hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh)—that there is a different situation and they will have to cut the production of grain in Britain?

Mr. MacGregor: We should certainly recognise that the amounts in intervention have gone up. To a considerable extent that is a feature of a remarkable harvest last year, for which we should pay great tribute to our farmers in the Community. Nevertheless, the price in real terms has come down quite a bit in the past year. We are arguing for price restraint, which will continue that policy. We should like it to continue for more than one year. I think that that will have its effect.

Abattoirs

2. Mr. Greenway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will state the names and location of abattoirs in the United Kingdom which are European Economic Community approved for the slaughter of equines; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): There are five such abattoirs. I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Greenway: I look forward to receiving the letter. Is it not obvious that, with so few and such widely dispersed abattoirs approved for the slaughter of equines, horses and ponies are being driven long distances, often for days and, it is reported, frequently without water, exercise or feed on the way to slaughter? Is that not disgraceful? Will my hon. Friend urgently look into the transport of horses and ponies to slaughter and the ability of local authorities to monitor their welfare on the way, because under present legislation it is virtually impossible to do so as so many of them are involved?

Mrs. Fenner: I assure my hon. Friend that the welfare of animals is protected by comprehensive legislation. I have drawn to his attention before the fact that this is enforced by local authorities. Every local authority must, by law, appoint inspectors to enforce the transit legislation in its area. Those who see a potential welfare offence should report it immediately to the authority in that area. There may be scope for action by those authorities at loading or unloading points. I understand that the Farm Animal Welfare Council will be reviewing future activities and may wish to note my hon. Friend's comment about any future programme of investigation.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is it not fair to say that cuts in local government budgets imposed by the Government restrict the ability of local authorities to monitor in the way that the Minister has suggested? Is it not nonsense to come to the Dispatch Box and say that the public interest and the interests of animals are safeguarded when everyone knows that it is patently true that the Government are preventing local authorities from carrying out their duties?

Mrs. Fenner: No, that is not true. The hon. Gentleman cannot claim that any public expenditure cuts cover the whole range. Local authorities have the duty to carry out this enforcement, as they have a number of other duties.

Milk Producers

4. Mr. Colvin asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next plans to meet the president of the National Farmers Union to discuss the problems of milk producers.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): I have frequent meetings with the president of the National Farmers Union, at which a wide range of subjects are discussed, including the problems of milk producers.

Mr. Colvin: I am pleased to hear that my right hon. Friend has these meetings. Next time he meets the president, will he be prepared to discuss the maketing of quotas, by sale or by lease, so that next time he goes to Brussels for price fixing negotiations with our European partners we have firm proposals to put before them? As it seems, from estimates, that this country is likely to be the only one within its quota by the end of the year, are there not strong arguments for this country proceeding with its own scheme for the marketing of quotas, whatever our European partners may do?

Mr. Jopling: I should not be so bold as to say that this country will be the only one within quotas by the end of the year, but I agree that there are strong arguments for greater mobility of quotas. Precisely how this should be achieved is the subject of detailed discussions which my Department is having with the milk industry, to which my hon. Friend the Minister of State referred last week. I shall certainly discuss this fully with the president of the NFU when I next meet him.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Has the Minister made any real progress in arrangements for making quotas surplus in one region available to other regions?

Mr. Jopling: The right hon. Gentleman has no doubt spotted in the press that the Commission made proposals on Monday of this week which suggest that it is possible to make exchanges in this way between regions of a country. I ascertained from the commissioner that this was intended to embrace two regions of the country where one region is on formula A and the other is on formula B. The signs are hopeful, but I must stress that the arrangements are not yet finalised. We shall be returning to this in February.

Mr. Latham: Before the first anniversary of the quotas, does my right hon. Friend expect to have sorted out all the bureaucratic hassles?

Mr. Jopling: I would be a great optimist if I thought that we had sorted out all the bureaucratic hassles. As I warned the House before we embarked on the matter, it was inevitable that such a situation would arise. I pay tribute to the commissioner, so soon after taking up his post, for having suggested a number of alterations to the scheme, some of which will, I hope, be of great assistance to this country.

Mr. Torney: When the Minister next meets the president of the National Farmers Union, will he also remember and consider the problems that face both the farm worker and the dairy distributive worker because of the milk quota system? Will he take action on those problems?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman has referred to this problem frequently in the past few months. We can find relatively few examples of redundancies among farm workers, but, as the hon. Gentleman and I both know, there are many redundancies in the milk processing industry. However, the Milk Marketing Board, for instance, has a redundancy scheme that is significantly better than the basic state scheme.

Mr. Harris: Has my right hon. Friend had an opportunity to re-read the report of our debate last week on the outgoers scheme? If so, will he now agree to an increase in the sum of £15 million allocated to that scheme, so that more quotas can be redistributed to needy cases?

Mr. Jopling: The amount allocated to the scheme is £50 million, not £15 million. I am afraid that I have nothing to add to the guidance that I gave to the House last week when I said that the Government had no intention of increasing the amount of money available.

Mr. Home Robertson: When the Minister next meets the president of the NFU, will he apologise not only to the NFU but to all those employed in the dairy industry for his ham-fisted approach to the imposition of quotas, which has led to turmoil in the industry and—because the cut in production has been 43 per cent. greater than was agreed by the Minister in his sell-out last March — to the ludicrous result of a milk shortage?

Mr. Jopling: As a farmer, the hon. Gentleman should remember, before he produces such ingenious statistics, that there was a drought last summer. That was the principal reason why the reduction in production in this country was greater than in any other.

Cereals

5. Mr. Fallon asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were the totals of cereal exports to third countries in the 12 months to June 1984.

Mr. MacGregor: In the year ending June 1984 the United Kingdom exported 1 million tonnes of wheat and 1·2 million tonnes of barley to third countries. In addition, some of the grain exported to other Community member states will then have been exported outside the Community.

Mr. Fallon: Is my hon. Friend satisfied with the present level of export credit guarantees? Does he agree that there is a need to take all possible steps to get the grain out of intervention—out of the huge stores—and into the hands of those who want to purchase it at reasonable prices?

Mr. MacGregor: Of course we wish to export as much as we can. We have had great success with our exports this year. There has been a doubling of wheat exports, and a near-doubling in barley exports, not just to third countries, but overall. Of course, there is still a considerable way to go. Most of the wheat comes not from intervention but direct from the open market, because open market prices are lower than intervention prices.

My hon. Friend will have welcomed the Government's announcement on 3 December of improved arrangements specifically for export credits for cereals. However, we have to take account of the wider economic considerations applying to the Export Credits Guarantee Department. I would have expected my hon. Friend strongly to support me on this. He must remember that a large proportion of our exports goes to countries which pay in cash and do not want credit.

Mr. Bellingham: Is my hon. Friend aware that many grain merchants cannot get export credits for the lucrative grain markets of Algeria, Tunisia and Morocco in north Africa, where we are losing out badly to the French?

Mr. MacGregor: Bearing in mind the constraints imposed by, for instance, the credit-worthiness of the countries concerned, we have improved the export credit arrangements for such markets.

Mr. John: Will the Minister recognise that it is better for grain to be used usefully, at whatever price, than to rot in stores? How much of the 12 million tonnes currently in intervention will be used, and how much of it will simply rot?

Mr. MacGregor: I entirely agree that the grain should be used. We have substantial surpluses this year and we are fighting in world export markets, where there is also a surplus. The hon. Gentleman should recognise that there are considerable quantities of grain which we must still export or dispose of in other ways but which are not in intervention. All of that points to the correctness of our policies directed at trying to get overall support prices down. I am sure that we have the hon. Gentleman's support in that, as it would enable more consumers to use the product.

6. Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current level of imports of cereal substitutes into the United Kingdom from third countries.

Mr. MacGregor: United Kingdom imports from third countries of the products generally referred to as cereal substitutes totalled just under 700,000 tonnes for the period January to September 1984.

Mr. Howell: Can my hon. Friend list the principal cereal substitutes which are imported and give some idea of the price at which they enter the United Kingdom and the European Community, as paid by the compounder? Will he consider bringing them into a levy system so that they come within the cereal regime?

Mr. MacGregor: I have the list in front of me. The principal ones are perhaps manioc and maize gluten feed, followed by brewing and distilling dregs and citrus fruit waste. It would probably be better if my hon. Friend tabled a detailed question on that matter and on prices so that I can ensure that full information is given. As to further methods of controlling imports of substitutes, we must consider our livestock producers who would find feedstuffs expensive without the impact of cheaper imports on feed compounders. Technically, we sometimes need those imports for feed compounds. We must also have regard to the dangers of incurring further trade wars in Third world markets.

Mr. Deakins: Will the Minister do his best to ensure that we do not do anything like putting a levy on cereal substitutes imported into the EEC, as most of them come from Third world countries which have already been hard hit by other agricultural export practices of the EEC? That is one way in which we can do our best to help them.

Mr. MacGregor: We have resisted, and will continue to resist, pressure for such controls. However, the hon. Gentleman will know that we have had to agree to engage in discussions with the United States, whence many substitutes come, on maize gluten feed. We believe that it is right to resist the overall approach of heavily controlling imports.

Mr. Andy Stewart: In view of my hon. Friend's answer, is there not a case for the ingredients to be listed on the compounds which are sold to farmers?

Mr. MacGregor: Answering off the top of my head, I suspect that it would be extremely difficult to do that, as feed compounders vary the mixtures substantially. I am not sure that such lists would be useful information for many people who buy the feed compounds. It is important to stress that, as part of the policy aimed at getting a better balance between cereals and livestock, we should not over-restrict the capacity of the livestock sector to get its feed compounds cheaply.

Wheat

8. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate what tonnage of wheat is likely to be carried over in United Kingdom intervention stores from the current year into the 1985-86 crop year.

Mr. MacGregor: There were 2·3 million tonnes of wheat in intervention in the United Kingdom on 16

January 1985 and a further 200,000 tonnes had been offered for intervention on that date. The quantity to be carried over into next season will depend on developments in the domestic and export markets, which it is not possible to forecast.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is the Minister aware that reliable sources have recently forecast that there could be a carry-over of 8 million tonnes of wheat into the next crop year in the European Community, including about 3 million tonnes in the United Kingdom? What is the point of spending up to £60 million on keeping that portion of 1984's bumper harvest in store, apparently indefinitely? Is there not an overwhelming case for shifting most of that surplus wheat to famine areas as soon as possible?

Mr. MacGregor: As I have said, it is difficult to be certain at this stage about the forecasts. However, I have not disguised the fact that we are likely to have surpluses. Within the Community we have already committed ourselves to sending 1·2 million tonnes in this marketing year to Ethiopia and the other drought-stricken countries. That is a major contribution, and a sign that the Government are doing all that they can to make use of the cereals surplus in that direction.

Sir Peter Mills: Would not my hon. Friend be wiser to express that tonnage in store in terms of weeks' supplies, so that we knew exactly what we had in this country? In the past there have been serious difficulties for the consumer when we have run out. Of course overseas aid is right and proper, and this country—in particular British farmers—has been extremely generous in giving aid in the form of cereals to those in need.

Mr. MacGregor: I agree with everything that my hon. Friend has said. Indeed, the NFU's "Send a million tonnes of wheat to Africa" campaign is to be warmly welcomed.

With regard to my hon. Friend's first point, it is certainly true that surpluses can erode quite rapidly in very bad years. Nevertheless, we face a substantial surplus this year. The important point about food aid or any cereal exports is that it is cheaper to export direct from the open market than through intervention. That is a very important point in connection with our policy on intervention.

Mr. Weetch: Does the Minister realise that the annual review of agriculture, published quite recently, showed that wheat farmers—many of whom are to be found in East Anglia—had a substantial rise in income, which was well above 20 per cent., while they produced uncontrolled surpluses? Does he realise that those two things together do not make any economic sense? What steps is the hon. Gentleman taking to restore a balance in the grain market? Does he recognise that such uncontrolled expansion in East Anglia is leading to serious environmental problems?

Mr. MacGregor: I believe that we are getting on top of the environmental problems. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will also pay tribute to the efforts of farmers, because most of the increases have resulted from productivity and technological improvements. It has been a great success story for the United Kingdom that, during the past 10 years, it has moved from being a major importer of cereals to being a major exporter. It is only right to pay tribute to that and to comment on its importance for the British economy. In real terms, the recently announced farm incomes remain about 8 per cent. below the 1982 level, while cereal prices are below what they were when we entered the Community. However, all that the hon. Gentleman says supports the view of the British Government that we should have major restraints on cereal prices, supported by the full application of the guaranteed thresholds. That is how we want to tackle it.

Mr. Maclean: Will my hon. Friend note that in 1985 we need not apologise for the fact that this country has food surpluses? As we consider it economically sensible to have six months' supply of oil and 12 months' supply of coal against the present emergency, surely it is not to be deplored that we have three months' supply of meat or two months' supply of wheat in storage. Will he emphasise to the Britain housewife and to all the people in this country that food surpluses are essential and better than shortages, and that we could not feed the rest of the world if we did not create surpluses?

Mr. MacGregor: I have already paid tribute to our cereal farmers. I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that it is a notable achievement, and much to be welcomed, that our self-sufficiency in the products that we grow has increased from 59 per cent. about 10 years ago to more than 80 per cent. today. I can just imagine what questions I would face if this country had a major deficiency in cereals, if prices soared and if the effect on the consumer was the opposite of what it is because of our success.

Milk Quotas

9. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has plans to allow interchange between direct sellers and wholesalers under the milk quota scheme.

Mr. Jopling: Complete interchangeability is not permitted by the existing Community legislation. I have been pressing strongly for this at meetings in Brussels for some time, and this week the Commission put forward proposals which go some way towards meeting our needs. I shall now seek certain improvements on the proposals. In the meantime, I have introduced arrangements whereby a producer who has more wholesale quota than he needs but not enough direct sales quota, or vice versa, can apply to the Milk Marketing Board to exchange quota with a producer in the opposite position.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply and for his evident concern about the matter. Is he aware that many direct sellers are facing superlevy payments, not because they are producing too much milk, but because they are selling too much milk to the public? Does he agree that regulations designed to prevent cheating in Italy and elsewhere are having a damaging and perverse effect on the British market?

Mr. Jopling: I am aware of those problems, which is why I have been raising this issue in the Agriculture Council since July, and why I was especially glad when the Commission appeared to be making some moves earlier this week to assist us in this manner.

Mr. Wigley: Given the right of a producer who owns two holdings simultaneously to transfer a quota from one to another, what safeguards are there to stop producers, wholesalers or large companies from buying quotas, to the detriment of whole areas that may be in a disadvantageous position?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman's question is rather wide of the original question, which related to interchange of direct and wholesale quotas. However, I shall try to answer his question. If the hon. Gentleman reads the regulations, he will see that the quota is attached to the land and that the principal way in which it can pass from one person to another is if the ownership or tenancy of the land changes.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Does my right hon. Friend accept that because a direct seller can sell only what he produces, and produces only what he can sell, there is no merit in restricting him, and that the lifting of a restriction would not make a substantial increase in the surpluses? Will he, therefore, treat the removal of these quota restrictions as a major priority?

Mr. Jopling: I forgot to say that that has been my major priority since the summer. If I may correct my hon. Friend, the restriction makes no alteration to the total amount produced. An interchange would take place in a mixed business between one type and another type of quota, within an overall amount, which stays constant. I am extremely pleased that, at last, with the new Commission we have a little movement on that important matter.

Mr. Home Robertson: There is universal support for what the Minister seeks to do. Will he explain precisely how and when the proposals to which he referred in his written reply to the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) will be implemented?

Mr. Jopling: The procedure which the Commission has proposed to deal with the matter is cumbersome, would only operate within a single 12-month period, and would have to be repeated each subsequent year. The details need to be examined carefully before we assume that it will be workable. The special committee on agriculture will consider this during the next few weeks. I hope that the matter will come back to the Council at its February meeting, and that we can settle it as soon as possible.

Agricultural Use Land

10. Mr. Chapman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his definition of productive agricultural use land; and if such a definition includes upland heaths and undrained fenlands.

Mrs. Fenner: Land is considered to be in productive agricultural use when it is being farmed. Large areas of upland heaths and lowland fens are used for livestock grazing.

Mr. Chapman: Land use statistics are gathered by the Department of the Environment and show, broadly speaking, that during the last 35 years we have lost a quarter of our upland heaths and that more than half of our fenlands have been drained. Does my hon. Friend agree that liaison between her Department and the Department of the Environment is essential if we are to strike a sensible balance between the needs of agriculture and conservation of the countryside? While I welcome the setting up of the environment co-ordination unit in her Department for just such a purpose, but will she assure the House that the co-ordination and liaising will be at ministerial as well as official level?

Mrs. Fenner: My hon. Friend will be aware that the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 took account of anxiety about natural habitat and landscape change. There is close co-ordination between the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Department of the Environment. Regarding habitat and landscape, the Nature Conservancy Council and the Department of the Environment are funding projects on habitat and landscape change, and MAFF hopes to undertake a survey of trees and hedges on farms later this year. I know of my hon. Friend's particular interest in that part of country conservation.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that in the highlands of Scotland the land is used extensively for sheep farming, which is supported by the positive steps on conservation being taken by the Scottish National Farmers Union?

Mrs. Fenner: Yes. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland will be exercising the greatest care in considering the compatability of agriculture and conservation, as we do in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Meat Consumption

11. Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with the chairman of the Meat Promotion Executive relating to trends in meat consumption in the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacGregor: None direct, although there is continuing close contact at ministerial and official level with the Meat and Livestock Commission, which has overall responsibility for meat promotion matters.

Sir Peter Mills: Does my hon. Friend agree that there has been a serious drop in meat consumption lately, and that the promotion of meat products and meat should be conducted strongly in the future? Does he also agree that it is a mistake to believe that convenience foods are cheaper than meat, such as shin beef, best end of lamb and other cheaper cuts which are of benefit to the consumer?

Mr. MacGregor: The overall consumption of meat is at about the same level as it was 10 years ago, but that hides the fact that there has been an increase in the consumption of white meat, especially poultry and pork, and frozen convenience meats. There has been a decline in the consumption of most carcase meats. My hon. Friend will know that considerable efforts go into the promotionn and marketing of meat, and I support those efforts. As to convenience foods, we must recognise that we are talking about consumer choice. Many consumers, especially the young, for a variety of reasons, buy convenience foods. That factor must be taken into account in the promotion of meat.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does the Minister accept that the programme being organised by Food from Britain has an important part to play in increasing the consumption of meat? Will he ensure that the £15 million grant for that organisation is continued if the sponsoring organisations continue to be reluctant to take over the funding?

Mr. MacGregor: I wholly support the efforts of Food from Britain, which are an important factor in promotion. The hon. Gentleman will know that that organisation is backed by substantial Government funds. Its programme will run for some time, and it would be premature to take decisions now on the longer term. I hope that he also recognises that considerable funds, often from industry, are given for promotion through the Meat and Livestock Commission and the Meat Promotion Executive.

Sir Hector Monro: In relation to meat production, will my hon. Friend consider the annual review and agree that, although the statistics are obviously right, the narrative gives a false impression of the well-being of the livestock industry, which is not as healthy as the review seems to show?

Mr. MacGregor: Although some sectors of the intensive livestock industry did a little better last year than they did earlier, there has been a drop in income in other parts of the industry. I fully agree with my hon. Friend on that. I had hoped that the way in which we gave the figures had made that clear. There has been an increase, in farming terms generally, on 1983 levels, which means a reduction in real terms on 1982 levels. Within that, some sectors have done much worse than others.

Mr. Mark Hughes: In those discussions, will the Minister consider the possibility of a change in the carcase specification for premium payments which takes into account low fat meat for dietary purposes? Will he especially consider giving farmers a premium for Welsh lamb with a low fat content, rather than the reverse at present, where the more fat there is on a lamb, the more money the farmer gets per pound?

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman will know that one recommendation by COMA to the Government has been along those lines. No decision has been taken, but the views of the industry and other organisations on the recommendation have been sought and are currently being considered. I expect to make an announcement shortly.

Milk Quotas

12. Mr. Ashdown asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will consider the possibility of re-opening the file on milk quota applicants who have accepted decisions handed down by his Department and from local panels and have subsequently discovered that different criteria have been applied for later decisions which could have enabled a successful appeal.

Mr. Jopling: The system allowing for appeals against departmental and local panel decisions was devised to minimise variations and to be as fair as possible. It is also important to let producers know their secondary quotas as quickly as possible. Now that the local panels have virtually completed their work and the time alloted for appeals to the tribunal is past, I do not think it would be right to ask them to go over the ground again.

Mr. Ashdown: Will the Minister reconsider that decision? He has said that he wishes to see justice done. Does he think that it is just that many farmers have accepted their quotas, without reference to appeal, on the basis of information given to them by his officials which has subsequently proved to be wrong? Is he aware, for instance, that one of his officials wrote to my local farmers on 4 November saying that cow variation numbers could not be taken as the basis of appeal, yet every subsequent appeal on that precise basis has been successful? Does he believe that that is fair or just?

Mr. Jopling: If the hon. Gentleman has a particular point that he would like us to consider, we shall do that. He should recall that the tribunal issued guidance to local panels on the criteria that were to be used in reaching decisions. It was recognised that, given the numbers involved, some variation in approach to different cases was inevitable. That is why the system of local panels with the right of appeal to the tribunal was devised.

Mr. Hayes: If my right hon. Friend wishes to see justice done, will he remember that there are a large number of producers who feel aggrieved that the quota runs with the land, rather than with the producer, particularly when the producer has built up the business personally without the help of the landowner?

Mr. Jopling: I am aware of that problem. It is a matter that is not appropriate to this question, but my hon. Friend will recall that we discussed it at considerable length in the House when I first announced the outgoers scheme last summer.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Is the Minister aware that there is unrest? In a reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) he referred to the fact that there was a proposal by the Commission for change. Could he be more forthcoming and tell the House wherein lies the problem so that we have to wait until February for a decision that could go a long way to ease the problem?

Mr. Jopling: I do not think that I can add anything. Again, this is a question that does not follow the main question. This was a proposal that was put before the Council on Monday. It was discussed on Tuesday. It was generally recognised that there were many complications which should be studied by the special committee on agriculture. I hope that it will get on with its work as quickly as possible and that it will be possible — I cannot guarantee it — to have a conclusive and final discussion about the matter at the February Council.

13. Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimates have been made on how European Economic Community milk production will compare with the aggregate quota for the current year; and what is the comparable position in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jopling: On current trends, deliveries to dairies would be close to the wholesale quota at the end of the present marketing year, both in the United Kingdom and in the Community as a whole. However, I would obviously not wish to make precise forecasts at this stage.

Mr. Strang: Are we not in danger of getting the worst of all worlds? On the one hand, hundreds of jobs in the United Kingdom may be destroyed as a result of the cutbacks here, while, on the other, because the scheme is not working sufficiently effectively throughout the Community, we shall continue to make a disproportionate budget contribution towards the huge EC surplus.

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman may not have seen, but should study, what has already been done in other countries in the Community in getting production down to the quota for those countries. For instance, up to the end of December Germany had cut by 6 per cent. on last year, the Netherlands by 5 per cent., Denmark by 6 per cent. and Belgium by 5 per cent. Of course, the United Kingdom has cut by 8 per cent., largely because of the drought that we had last summer.

Farm Machinery

14. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will next meet the president of the United Kingdom Agricultural Engineers Association to discuss farm machinery sales prospects.

Mrs. Fenner: My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food met the president of the United Kingdom Agricultural Engineers Association to discuss farm machinery sales prospects on 30 October 1984. A further meeting has not been arranged.

Mr. Shepherd: Is my hon. Friend aware that considerable concern has been expressed within that sector of the agriculture industry because the changes in capital allowances, which will shortly come into effect, will have a distorting effect on machinery sales, which is likely to lead to a boom and then a bust? Will she bear in mind in her further discussions with the Treasury as well as with the Agricultural Engineers Association that this will not help the smaller farmers in the west and south-west who have suffered a squeeze?

Mrs. Fenner: I would accept that the necessary contraction in the dairy industry has caused farmers to postpone new plant investment. I believe that some may even have over-reacted. In recent years there has been a general contraction in the industry, due to rationalisation and import penetration. I do not agree with my hon. Friend's views about next year's opportunities in agricultural engineering. They are a little pessimistic.

Conservation

16. Mr. Soames asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress his Department and the Agricultural Development Advisory Service have made towards further measures of conservation in agriculture.

Mrs. Fenner: My Department's aim will continue to be that of developing agricultural policies and encouraging farming practices which take due account of the desirability of conserving the countryside. As far as ADAS specifically is concerned, its contribution includes giving advice on conservation matters to individual farmers, promoting conservation awareness amongst farmers through exhibits and displays at agricultural shows and similar events, widespread participation in the farming and wildlife advisory groups and advising farmers and the statutory conservation agencies on the management of environmentally sensitive land.

Mr. Soames: I thank my hon. Friend for that commendably brief answer. Does she accept that many of my constituents are gravely concerned about conservation? Will she assure the House that everything possible will be done to ensure that farmers are given every facility to incorporate conservation measures in their future plans?

Mrs. Fenner: I earnestly assure my hon. Friend that all his points are uppermost in the mind of the Ministry. I am sure that they have been confirmed in practical terms by the setting up of the environmental co-ordination unit.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister what are her official engagements for Thursday 17 January.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Winnick: When will the Government act over the suffering and misery of so many elderly people who simply do not have enough money to keep their homes adequately heated during the harsh winter? What sort of Government are they who last November reduced by £1 the heating allowance to the poorest pensioners, who are those between 70 and 85? Does the Prime Minister understand how many of those people have put their health seriously at risk by having insufficient money to keep their homes heated? Can we take it that the Government are concerned only with giving help to the rich and the prosperous?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the changes in heating allowance enabled it to be given to more pensioners, and that was welcome. I note that the hon. Gentleman is quick to ask questions about heating allowance, but he is equally quick to support a strike deliberately aimed at cutting off heating to old people.

Mr. Rhodes James: I ask my right hon. Friend a question with reference to the proposed commemoration of the 40th anniversary of the ending of the second world war. I remind her that the second world did not end in May 1945 and that tens of thousands of young people from this country and the Commonwealth, including members of my family, served and suffered in the campaign in the far east. If we commemorate the ending of the war, will it be said again that the 14th Army, which was the forgotten army, is to be forgotten once again?

The Prime Minister: We are very much aware of the victory in August 1945 in the war in the far east and of the important and brave part played by so many people in that war. We shall, of course, remember both occasions in the commemorations.

Mr. Kinnock: May I say, first, that I was glad to hear that last answer.

In view of the extremely cold weather — [Interruption.] Conservative Members think that cold is funny. In view of the very cold weather and the promise of worse to come, can the Prime Minister tell us whether she believes that pensioners in all parts of the country should have the same entitlement to severe weather payments? Does she not agree that there is something fundamentally wrong with the system, introduced by the Government in 1981, which forbids giving help to people who are freezing cold this winter simply on the ground that they live in areas which are very cold every winter? In view of the inconsistencies and injustices of the present system, will the Prime Minister give us an undertaking that she will quickly change that system?

The Prime Minister: I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman that undertaking. He will be aware that in general heating allowances have gone up far more rapidly than the rate of inflation—something like 40 per cent. more than the increased cost of fuel—so that now some £400 million is spent on heating allowance of which £200 million goes to pensioners, so that is far better than anything previously. In addition, there is provision for single payments on the terms laid down in the order, which sets out a series of objective tests and leaves it to the chief adjudication officer. May I put it to the right hon. Gentleman that if he is really concerned he will tell the striking miners to go back to work so that we can have the future of heating assured, because people are out on strike to prevent heating from getting to old people and to industry.

Mr. Kinnock: Why does not the Prime Minister, just for once, answer the question on the subject raised?

On the subject of severe weather payments, does she not think that it is sensible to understand that bitter cold is bitter cold wherever it is felt, north, south, east or west? When her own Minister for Social Security can refer to the current arrangements as a "weird and wonderful construction", does she not think that there must be a better system of ensuring that those who have to endure very low temperatures on very low incomes should be helped, wherever they are? Will she please answer that question?

The Prime Minister: The single payments order, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, does give different temperatures. I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services is looking into the matter, but for the time being the objective tests laid down there will continue. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will now urge the coal miners to go back to work, for it is surely ridiculous to express sympathy but to support a strike deliberately aimed at making it cold for people in houses in bitter weather.

Mrs. Currie: Has my right hon. Friend noticed the allegations that The Observer has been paying large sums of money to encourage Whitehall leaks? Does she agree that leaks of this kind are frequently motivated, not by high-flown, but by misguided ideas of public information; nor, indeed, by baser party political motives, but by the oldest motive of all, greed on the part of both the newspaper and its informants?

The Prime Minister: Whatever the reason for leaks and whichever Government are in power, no Government can carry on effectively unless they can rely on the trust and confidence of those who work in the Civil Service, and in the overwhelming number of cases they can rely upon that trust and confidence.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: In reflecting upon the commemoration, which has wide public support, of victory in Europe, will the Prime Minister direct her mind to the best way in which, in the framework of that commemoration, there can be a place for the representation of the Russian people, whose sufferings, whose fortitude and whose valour made our own survival and our victory possible?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I shall of course bear that factor in mind. What we are planning is a commemoration in this country, but of course there will be many representatives in the country whom we shall expect, either as high commissioners or as ambassadors, to attend that commemoration.

Q2. Mr. Dixon asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dixon: Is the right hon. Lady aware that the last shipyard in my constituency closes next month, that the last steel plant in my constituency closes at the end of the year, that the last pit in my constituency closed two years ago, and that one in three men in my constituency are out of work? When she ponders on the VE celebrations, will she bear in mind the fact that her Government's policies between 1979 and 1985 have stopped more industries than Hitler's bombers? What new year's message of hope has she for the 7,852 people in the Jarrow constituency who are out of work?

The Prime Minister: I am aware of what the hon. Gentleman says about the shipyards in his constituency. We naturally appreciate his anxiety about the future of the yards. The Government stand ready to help in the usual way to secure any viable order prospects put forward by British Shipbuilders, but we cannot create orders where they do not exist.

Q3. Mr. Freeman asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Freeman: Is my right hon. Friend aware that two major unions representing the electricians and the engineers have decided to defy the TUC and apply for public cash assistance for secret ballots? Will the Prime Minister encourage other unions to follow that sensible and pragmatic decision?

The Prime Minister: I noticed that decision. It is welcome. The provision is made for people to have postal ballots to enable them more easily to express their democratic views on decisions by officials of their union.

Dr. Owen: If the Prime Minister wishes to give a constitutional safeguard to the people of the Falkland Islands, who are United Kingdom citizens, why does she not use the constitutionally proper form to do so by introducing a Bill in the House, as was done with the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973? Does the Prime Minister not recognise that this is a major issue of foreign policy which the House has not discussed, and that that runs counter to the recommendations of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee?

The Prime Minister: I understand that the right hon. Gentleman is talking about the discussions that we are now having with the Falkland Islands Council about its future constitution. The right hon. Gentleman looks angered that we have had them. He would have thought it strange had we made, or attempted to make, any decisions without fully consulting the people who are most deeply interested in their own future. Of course we have been consulting with them. When we have reached a conclusion, details of it will be placed in the Library for hon. Members. When the new constitution and texts are ready, they will be introduced by Orders in Council.—[HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Orders will be made under the British Settlements Act, which provides for such orders then to be laid before Parliament so that they are in accordance with the constitution of the House.

Q4. Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Robinson: Does the Prime Minister recall my intervention in the Chancellor's speech on Tuesday, when I took the liberty to put to him the serious point that the deutschmark was not under threat and that interest rates in Germany had not been raised in panic action similar to that into which her Government have been forced? His reply was that the deutschmark had a lower level of inflation than the pound. Will she come clean with the House and admit that the principal difference is that we are now seen as a one-product economy due to the fact that we have had the devastation of our manufacturing base and a deficit on manufactures in the past year of over £5 billion? Will she come clean with the House and, more importantly, tell us what she is going to do about it?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that oil constitutes about only 5 per cent. of the output of our economy, so no one should judge it a one-product economy. In regard to the deutschmark, I remind him that the Germans have been pursuing policies successfully to keep down inflation for many years and that it is now 2·5 per cent. They have also been pursuing policies to reduce public spending, and have cut their public spending in ways which I do not think would be acceptable to this House. They held up increasing pension provisions and managed to keep down their public sector pay for a long time, so much so that they are now able to have tax cuts. As the hon. Gentleman is talking about industry, he should remember that the Germans did not have the degree of restrictive practices and overmanning that we had for years.

Mr. Key: Will my right hon. Friend find time today to take note of the first report of the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission for England and its important proposals for the development of Stonehenge as a major tourist site, and will she welcome that report?

The Prime Minister: I welcome most reports in that guise. I cannot promise to look at that report today, but I promise to look at it at some time, though not this week.

Mr. Barron: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Does it arise directly out of this question?

Mr. Barron: It arises out of Prime Minister's Question Time, Mr. Speaker, in that questions to the right hon. Lady began a few seconds before 3.17 as the result of a long answer that had previously been given by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. May we have 15 minutes of questions to the Prime Minister, and may I ask the right hon. Lady a question about the miners' dispute?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The point to which the hon. Gentleman refers did not take up a full minute; I was watching the clock as carefully as the hon. Gentleman. That is why I called the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) to ask a question after 3.30 pm.

Business of the House

3.32 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House whether he will state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 21 JANUARY—Second Reading of the Hong Kong Bill.

Motion on the District Electoral Areas (Northern Ireland) Order.

TUESDAY 22 JANUARY — Debate on the Supplementary Estimate for the budget of the European Communities.

Second Reading of the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill.

WEDNESDAY 23 JANUARY — Opposition Day (6th Allotted Day). Until about 7 o'clock there will be a debate on post office closures, on an Opposition motion.

Afterwards, motions on the Housing Support Grant (Scotland) Order, the Housing Support Grant (Variation) Order, and on the Housing Revenue Account Rate Fund Contribution Limits (Scotland) Order.

Proceedings on the Consolidated Fund (No. 2) Bill.

Motion on financial assistance to Opposition parties.

THURSDAY 24 JANUARY — Motions on the Rate Support Grant (Scotland) Order and on the Rating of Industry (Scotland) Order.

FRIDAY 25 JANUARY—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 28 JANUARY — Remaining stages of the Hong Kong Bill.

Mr. Kinnock: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for acceding to our request that the remaining stages of the Hong Kong Bill be taken on the Floor of the House.

When is it expected that the Government's expenditure White paper will be published? Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that there is an early debate on that document?

We have been asking the Government for some time for a debate in their time on the threatened post office closure programme. As we have received no constructive reply, and as the matter is of great concern to rural and urban communities throughout the country, I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will note that we have decided to use our Opposition day to debate the matter next week.

Is the Leader of the House making arrangements to provide time in the House for the consideration of any legislation relating to surrogate parenthood? This is a matter of widespread interest on which a sign of the Government's attitude would be useful.

Mr. Biffen: On the last point, I acknowledge at once the very widespread interest aroused by the question of surrogate parenthood. The matter is still under very active consideration by the Government and the House will be informed of our decisions at the earliest possible moment.

In a sense of paternity, which I hope will not be misunderstood, I should say how much I appreciate the fact that we shall be able to have a debate on the post office issue in the terms that I have described with the co-operation of the Leader of the Opposition.

The expenditure White Paper will be published on 22 January and I very much hope that we can proceed to debate it in the normal manner.

Finally, I note the right hon. Gentleman's comments about the decision that the Hong Kong Bill should be debated on the Floor of the House. I am sure that a Bill of such significance deserves that treatment.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Can my right hon. Friend say when we are likely to have a full day's debate on foreign affairs?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly bear the request in mind, but no provision has been made for that next week. I would not wish to mislead my hon. Friend that it would be that early, but clearly it will be appropriate at some point.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): In view of the Prime Minister's reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) and as an Order in Council is not automatically debatable on the Floor of the House, will the Leader of the House give an assurance that there will be a full debate on any future changes in the constitution of the Falkland Islands? In particular, can he give an undertaking that there will be no loss of sovereignty of this House on the matter of our future relations with the democratic Government of Argentina?

Mr. Biffen: I thought that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister answered most comprehensively the points raised by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), but I will, of course, bear in mind the points that have just been made.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the position regarding the proposed constitutional changes for the Falkland Islands is highly unsatisfactory and causes anxiety among Conservative Members as well? Does he agree that it is quite wrong for changes such as the decision, apparently, to separate the administration of the Falklands from the South Sandwich Islands and South Georgia to be announced in the Falkland Islands without any reference to Parliament and then to be presented as a fait accompli in an Order in Council? Does he appreciate that that just will not do and will he arrange an early debate to discuss these measures?

Mr. Biffen: I am fully sensitive to the interest expressed by my hon. Friend. That is why I gave an answer of the character that I gave to the Leader of the Liberal party. Of course, these factors will be taken into account.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that tens of thousands of miners campaigning in defence of their communities have been denied social benefits for which they have paid during their working lives and are now quite unable to find the money to feed their families or keep them warm? Is he further aware that at no stage from the beginning of the dispute have the Government ever given their own time to account for themselves and that the decision to ban negotiations in the hope that cold and hunger will gain the Government a shallow political victory is vicious and utterly repugnant to the majority of people in this country?

Mr. Biffen: In my view, cold and hunger are the weapons seized upon not by the Government but rather by those people who have been promoting and sympathising with the strike. No time has been provided in the business that I have announced, but clearly it is open to the right hon. Gentleman and others who wish to prosecute these matters before Parliament to take such opportunities as are available.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the whole country will be grateful to our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister for her decision with regard to the commemoration of the end of the last war? Following the intervention of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), will the Government recall that if foreign countries are to be invited they should include not only Soviet Russia but Poland and other allies? Secondly, if there is to be a service either at Westminster abbey or at St. Paul's cathedral, will the Government do their best, in the most tactful way, to ensure that the Church does not let the nation down?

Mr. Biffen: There is only one safe and prudent reply that I can make: I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the points so thoughtfully made.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Has the right hon. Gentleman had early-day motion 266 drawn to his attention—"Those without shelter"?

[That this House is deeply concerned at the plight of those people without shelter or a roof over their heads at night at this time of intense cold and severe winter conditions; and calls on the Government to take emergency steps, in consultation with local authorities, to ensure that warm shelter and beds are provided for those in need by the taking over of buildings together with other emergency action such as the use of underground railway stations, &c.]

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that thousands of people, in addition to our old-age pensioners, who are suffering because of the reduction in the heating allowance, have no shelter whatsoever? Are the Government prepared to allow tha appropriate Minister to come to the House, either tomorrow or on Monday, to state that the Government accept the motion and that they will take emergency steps to deal with the terrible problem of those who are without shelter? Secondly, responsibility for the continuation of the mining industry dispute rests with the Government. They should be prepared to try to settle the dispute at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Biffen: On the first point made by the hon. Member, I shall draw his observations to the attention of my right hon. Friend for his decision on whether it would be appropriate for a statement to be made. On the second point of the hon. Member, I believe that the settlement concluded with NACODS provides a good framework for further discussions. One would welcome the clear and explicit commitment of the faction of the National Union of Mineworkers that is led by Mr. Scargill that they think likewise.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Is my right hon. Friend aware that with railway investment by the Government at an all-time high and with no outstanding claims for investment by British Rail awaiting decision by the Government, many of those, particularly in the railway industry, who have the best interests of the railway industry at heart are astounded by the action that is being taken by a handful of people without a ballot? The words used a moment ago by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) could be repeated to describe the action of these people. Is my right hon. Friend further aware that it was 10 years ago that I first mentioned the name of the man, Fullick, at Waterloo whose actions are totally deplored by ASLEF and NUM members throughout the rest of Southern region? Will my right hon. Friend therefore ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will be prepared to make an early statement if there are further repercussions next week from this strike?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly pass on that request to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. I agree with my hon. Friend that those who seek to make the British public pawns in their industrial dispute will at the end of the day reduce rather than enhance their prospects.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Can the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that it is not his intention to table business motions to curtail the time which would otherwise be available for debating the Supplementary Estimate or the Consolidated Fund Bill?

Mr. Biffen: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for raising that point. It might be for the convenience of the House to have a structured debate of three hours on this topic. I shall give to the House an opportunity so to decide.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): In the context of the view of all parties in the House that our membership of the European Community does not mean that the European Parliament should interfere in our domestic affairs, has my right hon. Friend seen the decision of the European Parliament to conduct an inquiry into the policing of the current mining dispute? Will my right hon. Friend find an opportunity for Ministers to make clear in the House the view of Her Majesty's Government and, I believe, of all parties that this is no business of the European Parliament and that if there is to be an inquiry it will be conducted here?

Mr. Biffen: I believe that there is a very simple message for the European assembly at Strasbourg: "Keep off the grass".

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventy, South-East): Is the Leader of the House aware that in the present severe weather it is estimated that 700 pensioners, both today and every day, will die from hypothermia while during the last 10 months his Government have spent £5,000 million of the wealth of this country upon the prosecution of a mining strike, money which could have saved the lives of those pensioners? Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Prime Minister to come to the Dispatch Box in Government time to answer the charge that the deaths of those pensioners should be set against the prosecution by the Government of the strike?

Mr. Biffen: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman feels so distressed that the Government have not orchestrated a supine surrender to the demands of Mr. Scargill. That is precisely the reason for his discontent and the reason why I cannot take too seriously the claims that he is now making upon the time of the House next week.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Rather than wasting the time of the House next Tuesday with the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill, which has little public support or support in the House, will my right hon. Friend instead arrange for us to discuss early-day motion 235 which deals with the deplorable attack on the leaders of the Jewish community by Mr. Ken Livingstone, which he has not yet withdrawn and for which he has not apologised?

[That this House takes note of the reported remarks of the Leader of the Greater London Council in an interview published in 'Davar' weekend magazine on 30th November 1984, in which he is quoted as saying 'The Board of Deputies of British Jews has in recent years been taken over by Jews who hold extreme right wing views . . . Besides, the big problem of the Board of Deputies has always been their soft and slow response to all forms of racism in this country . . . After Begin's emergence on to the political stage, suddenly the Jews became reactionaries, turned right nearly to be fascists. I realise that this is actually something that is occurring in many countries, not just Britain'; is horrified at this reported accusation by a prominent political figure of near fascism against the leaders of the Jewish community in Britain, whose distinguished President is a Labour Member of this House; and trusts that the Labour Party leaders will either ask Mr. Livingstone to apologise to the Jewish community or to explain if he believes himself to have been incorrectly reported.]

Mr. Biffen: I recognise the undoubted attraction for the House of debating the early-day motion to which my hon. Friend refers, but the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill, which has been set down for debate on Tuesday, is an important piece of Government legislation which, I have to tell him, will be proceeded with.

Mr. Terry Fields (Liverpool, Broadgreen): Will the Leader of the House acknowledge the damage and dangers for which the Government are responsible as a result of their intransigence over the mining dispute and their interference in legitimate negotiations between the National Coal Board and the NUM? Will he also acknowledge that to a hell of a lot of people in Britain the Government are acting in a criminally insane manner with their despotic attitude towards miners and their families? When will the Government face up to their responsibility and discuss in their time the dispute and their interference in the negotiations?

Mr. Biffen: If there are guilty men in this matter, pre-eminently the guilty man is Mr. Arthur Scargill, who has damaged his industry, divided his union and wrought industrial havoc. Time will not be provided next week for a debate on the matter. If Labour Members are so determined and anxious to represent their parliamentary support for Mr. Arthur Scargill, let them find the occasion.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): In view of the pace of change in the City of London and the shifts in ownership of leading members of the Stock Exchange, and in view of the absence from the Queen's Speech of any proposals to legislate on the basis of the Gower report, is it likely that time will be available for discussion of those important issues in the near future?

Mr. Biffen: I agree that those are important issues, but I regret that such are the pressures on Government time at the moment that it is not possible to feature them in the business for next week, or, I suspect, any time shortly thereafter. But I wish my hon. Friend every success in using his initiative in trying to bring the matter before the House.

Mr. Allen Adams (Paisley, North): Is the Minister aware that last week Babcock Power Ltd. at Renfrew announced 500 redundancies at its factory? Will he give time for a debate in the House in the foreseeable future on the future of the fuel and power industry, not only in Scotland but in Britain as a whole? I am sure that he will appreciate that those highly specialised jobs, once lost, are difficult to regain. Will he make representations to or remonstrate with some of his right hon. and hon. Friends in the Government to bring forward replacement power stations and parts of power stations? Unless that is done within the next two or three years we shall lose a valuable and important industry which we shall have great difficulty in replacing once lost. Will he consider arranging a debate on the fuel and power industry within the next two or three weeks?

Mr. Biffen: I recognise the serious problems that are raised for west Scotland and the hon. Gentleman's constituency by the redundancies to which he refers. I shall draw the attention of my relevant right hon. Friends to the importance that he attaches to increased investment in the power industries.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Will my right hon. Friend accept that it would be an error of judgment and entirely inappropriate for hon. Members to be Whipped on the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill?

Mr. Biffen: Happily, those are arrangements which fall without my responsibility.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): Will the Leader of the House reconsider his previous answers and allow a debate in Government time on the dispute in the coal industry? The Government are fond of preaching democracy. Why do they not practice it and allow a debate in Government time on the subject?

Mr. Biffen: That matter is kept under constant review and no provision has been made for such a debate next week. I do not wish to mislead any Labour Member that it was a near-runner that did not quite make next week. If they are so anxious that the case for the faction of the mineworkers led by Mr. Scargill be further portrayed on the Floor of the House, they will have their opportunities.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): In view of the fact that the House has recently debated wildlife in Northern Ireland and scented erasers, will my right hon. Friend accept that the country finds it difficult to understand why time should not be allowed to debate the demise of the pound note? Will my right hon. Friend give time to debate the country's coinage, as this affects the life of every person in the country?

Mr. Biffen: I shall bear my hon. Friend's proposition in mind, but I should have thought that this was the sort of subject that my hon. Friend might be prepared to chance his luck with on an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Does the Leader of the House realise that the Department of the Environment failed to honour its commitment to respond to a consultative document on the disposal of radioactive waste? It failed to keep to its timetable of a reply in October and distracted attention from that failure by promising a statement by Christmas. Does the Leader of the House realise that it has failed to keep to that deadline as well? I get the impression that it will delay this as long as possible. Does the right hon. Gentleman realise how anxious my constituents are, and will he seek to allay that anxiety by pressing the Secretary of State for the Environment to make a statement soon?

Mr. Biffen: I realise the significance of this topic nationally and the great importance of it to the hon. Gentleman's costituency. I shall be in touch with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to see how speedily we can have that statement.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am always reluctant to curtail business questions, because they are a prime Back Bench opportunity. However, there is a very important debate to follow in which no fewer than 40 right hon. and hon. Members wish to take part. I shall allow questions to continue until 4 o'clock, and then we must finish.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Does my right hon. Friend recall that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport promised me as long ago as last Monday that he would consider asking the London Regional Transport authority to open underground stations for homeless people in London, and making similar arrangements in the rest of the country where there are not underground stations, for protection during this bitterly cold weather? So far, nothing has happened. Is my right hon. Friend aware that today a firm has given 2,000 blankets towards the protection of those people and that many individuals are sending in gifts? The Salvation Army is prepared to provide free of charge staff to supervise people at one station. Could this matter be looked at urgently today?

Mr. Biffen: I realise that this is a serious matter, and I shall do what I can to assist my hon. Friend.

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): In view of the massive law-breaking by private cleaning firms contracted to NHS hospitals — a fact that was exposed on BBC television last night—can the Leader of the House give an opportunity for the issue of privatisation in the NHS to be debated? Will he take immediate steps to ensure that this illegal practice of employing young people under school leaving age at murderously low rates of pay is ended forthwith, as this is a major scandal?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot promise the debating facility requested by the hon. Member, but I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services to the serious points that she makes.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Can my right hon. Friend confirm that the debate next Tuesday on the EEC Supplementary Estimate is the one that will allow us to plug the gap between the EEC'S budget and required expenditure for last year? Will he also confirm what has already been stated, that the major request by the Government to the House to increase the level of resources of the EEC will not be brought before the House until the completion of the enlargement of the Community negotiations?

Mr. Biffen: The second point can be elaborated on in next week's debate. My hon. Friend's first point concerns the £190 million which was the separate Estimate that now lies on the Order Paper in the name of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Will the Leader of the House reconsider his decision not to call an emergency debate on the mining dispute? I speak as Chairman of and on behalf of the Merseyside group of Labour Members, and I think that I speak for most, if not all, of my colleagues in demanding such a debate. Merseyside has lost nearly 100,000 jobs since 1979. All five Liverpool Labour hon. Members support the miners in their battle to save communities and jobs.

Mr. Biffen: That may be so. However, there is an alternative view of the dispute, which is that sound judgment and sense lie with the miners who are working rather than with those who are on strike.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Has my right hon. Friend seen early-day motion 260, in my name, about the vile practice of commercial surrogate motherhood agencies?

[That this House deplores the introduction into this country of surrogate motherhood; hereby condemns such activities as unnatural and immoral; and calls upon the Secretary of State for Social Services to introduce immediate legislation to outlaw this unfortunate commercial practice in line with the Warnock Report recommendation.]

Is my right hon. Friend aware that at least four other surrogate babies are liable to be born within the next six months? Will he therefore, as a matter of urgency, arrange for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services to tell us when we may expect the legislation? As the Leader of the Opposition has also said, there is widespread concern throughout the country, cutting right across party lines.

Mr. Biffen: I take note of what my hon. Friend says, but I cannot add to the answer that I gave to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The Leader of the House will recall that some weeks ago he undertook to consider the possibility of giving time for a discussion of the impact of the COCOM agreement before it came into effect. Has he reached any conclusions on the matter?

Mr. Biffen: No; but I will get in touch with the hon. Gentleman as soon as I can.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): While the House will realise that a business motion to suspend Standing Order No. 113 for the Consolidated Fund Bill debate on Wednesday may not be appropriate, does not the Leader of the House agree that a business motion in relation to the Supplementary Estimate, referred to in a previous answer, sets an unfortunate precedent? Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House when that business motion will be debated?

Mr. Biffen: What is proposed is a reasonable device to enable the House to have a decent debate on the subject. It should appear on the Order Paper on Friday.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): As the Government are guilty of the wrongful arrest and imprisonment of Mr. David Hamilton and other NUM activists, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that there is an early debate about civil liberties in this country?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that in any debate that we may have on the mining dispute the points raised by the hon. Gentleman will be covered. The question whether there has been a case of wrongful imprisonment will doubtless be a matter of judgment, but I take note of what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Hugh Brown (Glasgow, Provan): Will the right hon. Gentleman sympathetically consider any request to debate the Manpower Services Commission's proposals to close skillcentres? Will he ensure that the Secretary of State for Employment makes no decision on the matter until we have debated the subject, including the Select Committee's report?

Mr. Biffen: I will pass on the hon. Gentleman's point to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

Mr. Ernie Roberts (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): In view of the effect upon the pound and the economy of the mining strike caused by the Government, will the Government explain to the House why they are preventing proper negotiations from taking place between the National Coal Board and the miners? From time to time it is clearly stated in the press that the Prime Minister and the Government are responsible for holding up negotiations in the dispute.

Mr. Biffen: It is totally absurd to suggest that the Government are holding up any negotiations that might take place in the industry. If Mr. Scargill's faction within the NUM were to accept the basic principles of the NACODS agreement, further progress could be made.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Notwithstanding the helpful meeting earlier today with the Minister for Social Security about the question of extra payments for fuel bills, has the right hon. Gentleman realised that the problems are extremely serious? Can we have a debate next week?

Secondly, last night, allegations were made in a BBC television programme that a certain cleaning company was employing 14-year-olds. May we be assured that full investigations will be carried out and that, if the allegations are proved, there will be prosecutions? May we also be assured that the Government will not be deflected from either investigation or prosecution simply because one Conservative Back Bencher has an involvement in the company?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman's last few words did not raise the level of this exchange. I am quite sure that those who are responsible for taking prosecutions in these matters will have regard to the appropriate facts. As to the wider issue, I do not think that I can go beyond what I said to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short).

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Is not the fundamental problem that confronts all of us at the moment the mining strike? Is it not a fact that the Government's intransigence and their refusal to discuss the issue is lengthening the struggle? It has now reached the point at which a group of honourable people are struggling mightily for their right to have a reasonable job, but the Government will not discuss the matter. Should we not have a major debate on the strike?

Mr. Biffen: What really grieves the hon. Gentleman is the fact that working miners are every day and every week enhancing their position relative to the striking miners. I have already said that there is no question of the Government standing in the way of the resumption of negotiations. As to a debate, that is a matter to be considered from time to time.

Mr. Benn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask you to protect those of us who represent the miners' wives and families who are now suffering great hardship? When they go back to work, some working miners are put on cleaning police cars, as happened at Brodsworth colliery. The strike has now gone on for nearly one year. There has not been one debate in Government time in which Ministers have justified their position and there has not been a full day debate since 31 July. Many of us have been to you, Mr. Speaker, to try to get private notice questions and applications under Standing Order No. 10, but you have been tied by the Standing Orders. I ask you to consider that it is quite unacceptable to right hon. and hon. Members, who represent people who are now suffering great hardship, that the House should debate Hong Kong and corporal punishment next week and ignore the plight of those whom we represent and upon whose work the prosperity of the people of Britain has rested for many years.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The whole House accepts that I am not responsible for the organisation of business. The House will have heard what the Leader of the House has said—that there is an Opposition day virtually every week and that there are opportunities to discuss these issues. It is not a matter for me.

Mr. Heffer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask for your protection of all Back Benchers? Like you, Mr. Speaker, I have been here for many years and I have heard many demands from Back Benchers for a debate. On many occasions, the Government have at least given some indication that they will seriously consider Back Benchers' proposals, and a debate has been forthcoming. Today we have heard numerous right hon. and hon. Members asking for a debate next week, but we have had absolutely no sign from the Government that they are even contemplating such a debate. It is historically the case that the Chair protects the rights of Back Benchers. The request for a debate comes not solely from hon. Members who represent mining areas, but many other areas. We are all worried about the dispute. We want a settlement and we want to know the Government's stance. We want an honourable settlement. Will you, Mr. Speaker, put pressure on the Government seriously to consider the idea of a debate next week on the miners' strike?

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already said that, in today's debate on regional policy, about 40 hon. Members wish to take part, so all of this takes time from them. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) is right: I do try to protect the interests of Back Benchers. However, he knows that I am not responsible for the timetable and for what is discussed here. All I can do is to give Back Benchers an opportunity to ask questions, and that, I think the hon. Gentleman must accept, I have done today.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Although I have taken account of what you have just said, Mr. Speaker, there is another area in which you have some responsibility. You will have heard the Leader of the House say today that, as near as dammit, we should use Supply time to have a debate. You will appreciate that has already been done. You will also have heard on Tuesday that Labour Members are not alone in talking about the massive costs of the strike, as an ex-Prime Minister—the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath)—said that, around the world, most people are telling him that the escalating cost of the miners' strike is having an effect on the pound. Now I put it to you, Mr. Speaker—this is the point—that if it is right for the Leader of the House to say that we should use a Supply day because only Labour Members are interested, I suggest to the Leader of the House, through you, that he should use Government time, because some of us want to hear in more precise detail what the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup had to say the other day.

On a further point of order, I have been to the Table Office. You are responsible for the Table Office, Mr. Speaker. We are having some difficulty because not only are the Government refusing to provide time for a debate —a matter over which you have very little control—

Mr. Speaker: I have none.

Mr. Skinner: No control, you say. That is a debatable point. In the Table Office, however, you have tremendous control. We are finding that it is blocking questions. For example, hon. Members have found that they cannot discover the estimated size of coal stocks after October, whereas previously we could. I want your help in that matter to enable us to table such questions.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Skinner: I have not quite finished.

Mr. Speaker: Order. By raising points of order of this type, the hon. Gentleman is merely taking time out of an important debate. Others are likely to suffer as a result. Perhaps other hon. Members will note that, because I do not think that I can help them—[Interruption.] I am in the hands of the House. If the House wishes to take up time, that is a matter for the House. I cannot answer the hon. Gentleman's point of order. He says that questions are being blocked. If there is any question on which there is a query, that query is brought to my attention. None has been brought to my attention yet.

Mr. Skinner: That is why I am raising the matter now. I have been to the Table Office and——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman put his question to me succinctly? I shall then see what I can do.

Mr. Skinner: The questions are as follows. I want to know how much money has been spent on producing 1 tonne of coal during the strike—equivalent to £200 a tonne as opposed to £38 a tonne before the strike. I want the Government to tell me—they are refusing in the Table Office—whether they accept the point made by the stockbrokers that it is costing £86 million a week to finance this strike. That question is being refused. There are many other questions which affect the pound. I believe that the Table Office is blocking such questions because it is in cahoots with the Government. You, Mr. Speaker, being in charge of the House, have a responsibility to see to it that questions which are relevant to hon. Members, to miners and to all those people who are having to pay through the nose for the strike while watching the pound sink to the bottom of the Thames can be asked. Such people have a right to know the answers to those questions which the Government are not prepared to allow me to ask.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It might be quicker if I took all the points of order at once.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would you consider extending business questions today so that the Leader of the House might fully judge the weight of feeling on this side of the House about the important of discussing the need for negotiations to end the dispute? The Leader of the House is not a stupid man by any means, but he seems rather slow to take the point that many right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House believe that the dispute must end and that it can only end as a result of a negotiated settlement. The Government have a responsibility to make their view of such a negotiated settlement clear. They also have a responsibility to make it clear whether they will take positive steps to achieve it. That should be in Government time, because you——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is being very unfair to the House. If there are any other hon. Members who are seeking to do the same thing, I should point out that they are being unfair to their colleagues if they take up time in what almost appears to be an operation and if they put questions to the Leader of the House through me. I cannot answer those questions. They are not a matter for me.

Mr. Terry Fields: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You always place great emphasis on the need to uphold the credibility of the House. But when people outside accuse the Government, and ultimately yourself and us, of crimes against humanity, we have a duty and responsibility—without in any way interfering in the negotiations—to discuss the strike. If the Government are frightened of doing so, perhaps you would intervene on our behalf to open up the issue so that we can have a fair discussion.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): We are in the midst of the most serious industrial dispute that the nation has witnessed for many years and the coldest weather that the country has experienced for more than 20 years. We are in the midst of an industrial dispute in which enormous questions have arisen about the way in which the law, including the Bail Act, has been operated, the behaviour and deployment of the police and the way in which many other matters arising from the dispute have been handled. For example, next week——

Mr. Speaker: Order. What is the point of order for me?

Mr. Madden: My point of order is that next week, for example, the Yorkshire power workers are considering whether to refuse oil supplies——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is asking a hypothetical question.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): I speak for the whole House when I ask whether it is not an abuse of the House for Opposition Back Benchers to cover up for their Front Bench's failure to hold a debate on this subject. The shadow Leader of the House is sitting on the Opposition Front Bench saying nothing. He should be the one—[Interruption.]

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe that this is an abuse of the House. I have made it plain that many hon. Members wish to take part in the subsequent debate, and I must say that in fairness to the whole House—I have a duty to be even handed—I am bound to have regard to the number of Opposition Members who are taking up time, and to give compensatory time in the subsequent debate to those who sit on the Government side. I shall so do.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Mr. Speaker, may I ask you a question that relates directly to an area for which you have specific responsibility? I refer to the fact that if an application were made under Standing Order No. 10, you could grant us time. In so far as the country has been hit during the past few days by some very cold weather, which to some extent——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot be held to be responsible for the cold weather.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: When an application is made under Standing Order No. 10, the hon. Member has to rise to his feet and point out why the debate should take place. He has to stress three principles, one of which concerns the urgency of the matter. Given the statement made the other day by a former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), to the effect that sterling was falling because of the Government's failure to intervene, that we are facing cold weather and that the drop in coal stocks may have some effect, there should be a debate on the strike. As the matter is urgent and arises from changing circumstances, you have the right to grant such a request. I am not asking you to go to the Leader of the House or to put any pressure on the Government, but rather to make a statement and decision yourself, as Speaker, and thus to protect our rights by allowing us that time for a debate.

Mr. Speaker: If I may say so, the hon. Gentleman could not have asked a more foolish question. He knows perfectly well the rules governing applications made under Standing Order No. 10. I have received no such applications today.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Can you, Mr. Speaker, give us some advice about business questions? Business questions have now effectively gone on for 15 minutes more than you intended. I do not want to take time from the later debate, but I and many other hon. Members are bothered because we have never had any Government time in which to debate the miners' strike. Many thousands of miners and their families are on strike in my constituency. Although the Opposition have given us several days, I have been denied the opportunity by the Government to stand up on behalf of my constituents in order to discuss what is happening to them. We should lengthen business questions today so that hon. Members can ensure that the Leader of the House finds Government time for a debate on this subject, in which we can represent those whom we were elected to represent.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has sometimes not been backward in criticising the number of hon. Members who have been called in a debate. If such questions continue, he will have every reason to criticise again today. I am afraid that he will only cause his own side to suffer.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): In the constitutional textbook that I was reading last night, it said that that was a major principle of the constitution that the House of Commons should discuss issues worrying the people. Today you, Mr. Speaker, and the Leader of the House appear to be saying that that is not so. Why?

Mr. Speaker: I said that I would take all the points of order together, but the hon. Gentleman has asked such a —I was going to say inadequate—question that I must deal with it at once. I say to the hon. Gentleman, and to those seeking to prolong what I think is an operation, that I am not responsible, as they know perfectly well, for the organisation of business. I am responsible for protecting Back Benchers' rights and interests, and that I have always sought to do, as I hope the House appreciates. But I repeat that such an operation merely takes time out of a very important debate to follow. More than 40 hon. Members have so far intimated their wish to speak in the debate on regional policy. Many of the issues being raised now could easily be raised in that debate. That being so, I propose to take one more point of order on this subject.

Mr. Flannery: Although I accept that there is a remote possibility that you, Mr. Speaker, are not responsible for the cold weather, will you not accept that voices are being raised about something that is even more important than the subsequent debate? We are asking you to do what you can to ensure that a full debate is held on the terrible question of the intractable problem of the miners' strike. Will you use your influence to try to ensure that there is a full-scale debate on that subject?

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Of course, I have regard to the strong feelings held, but I am not responsible for the organisation of debates and I cannot do much about it. However, in calling hon. Members at Question Time and in debates I can give hon. Members an opportunity—I shall have regard to this later—to put their points of view. That is the way in which we do things in our democratic system. We do not seek to disrupt our procedures with points of order that appear to me to be an organised operation.

Mr. Heffer: I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing an important and specific matter that should have consideration, namely,

"the coal industry and the miners' dispute."

The matter is important because the entire country needs a statement from the Government giving the reasons why they are allowing the dispute to continue and trying to drive the miners back to work by starvation. The matter is urgent because of the extremely severe weather conditions and the effects of the dispute and the weather on the nation.

Thirdly, the matter is specific because the dispute relates to industrial action that the Government are deliberately allowing to continue.

The nation deserves an answer. It needs to hear the Government's case and the miners' case put by hon. Members in the House. The people should have an urgent debate to lay the basis for an early settlement of the dispute.

Mr. Speaker: I have allowed the hon. Gentleman to move an application under Standing Order No. 10 in the hope that it will enable us to proceed to the next business. The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that the rules governing Standing Order No. 10 lay down that a new development must have occurred and that notice should be given to me before 12 noon. The cold weather did not start just after 12 noon.

The hon. Gentleman knows that the only decision that I take on these matters is whether the Standing Order No. 10 application should take precedence over the business set down for the day. I listened carefully to what he said, but I regret that I do not consider the matter appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not taking further points of order.

BILL PRESENTED

Prohibition of Female Circumcision

Mrs. Marion Roe, supported by Mrs. Ann Clwyd, Mr. David Crouch, Mr. Clement Freud, Ms. Jo Richardson and Mrs. Ann Winterton, presented a Bill to prohibit female circumcision: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 25 January and to be printed. [Bill 58.]

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not taking further points of order on the mining dispute. We must now proceed to the debate.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am on my feet.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is extremely unruly behaviour. The hon. Members who are standing know that this is not the way in which we conduct our affairs in a democratic assembly. It is against all our traditions that hon. Members should seek to challenge the authority of the Speaker, whom they elected to keep order. I now ask the hon. Members who are standing to resume their seats. I repeat that I ask hon. Members who are standing to resume their seats.

Grave disorder having arisen in the House, Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order No. 27 (Power of Mr. Speaker to adjourn House or suspend sitting), suspended the sitting for 20 minutes.

Sitting suspended at 4.23 pm

4.43 pm

Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair.

Mr. Benn: With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to give notice that a substantial body of Members of the House are determined to secure a debate on the miners' dispute in Government time next week.

Regional Policy

Mr. Speaker: Before we proceed with this important debate on regional policy I should inform the House, in relation to it, that, because of the number of hon. Members who wish to speak, I intend to apply the time limit on speeches of 10 minutes agreed to by the House on 31 October last. On this occasion I shall apply the limit to hon. Members called between 6 o'clock and ten minutes to 8 o'clock and not between 7 o'clock and ten minutes to 9 o'clock as on previous occasions. The resolution of the House on 31 October authorised both these methods of limitation. It would be useful for the House to gain experience of how each method works.

4.44 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Tebbit): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of the Government's statement on 28th November announcing changes in regional industrial incentives; welcomes the closer alignment of the new Assisted Areas map to areas' relative needs for increased employment opportunities; agrees that it is right at a time of high unemployment to relate assistance more directly to jobs; and notes with approval that the increased cost-effectiveness of regional assistance will enable the burden upon taxpayers to be substantially reduced.

Today's debate provides an opportunity for the House to give consideration and, I hope, approval to the changes in the thrust of regional policy—the change of emphasis away from automatic subsidy of capital expenditure towards incentives for employment—and the changes to ensure that our spending is undertaken in the areas that are most seriously afflicted by the combination of unemployment, industrial decline and structural change.

The new policy also does away with the unjustifiable discrimination against service industry, which now provides a growing proportion of jobs. None of these changes comes as a surprise to the House. They were foreshadowed in the White Paper "Regional Industrial Development" which was published in December 1983, debated to some extent during the passage of the Co-operative Development Agency and Industrial Development Act and set out in greater detail in the statement made by my hon. Friend the Minister of State on 28 November last year, together with the supporting documentation that was made available at that time. I shall, however, refer later to one aspect of the implementation of the policy which will be new to the House.

The House will recollect that the 1983 White Paper boldly faced up to the question of the justification of regional industrial incentives, regional policy for short, and concluded that there is no longer a clear-cut economic case for such a policy. I realise that that outrages the more conservative — with a small "c", I hasten to add — Socialists on the Opposition Benches, but I do not think they should become over-excited about it since we can, I believe, stand on the common ground of the justification of this policy primarily on social grounds. By that I mean that the Government accept the need to do what we can —and Government are not omnipotent in this matter— to reduce the imbalance between the prosperous and the most hard hit areas of Britain. There is, of course, a price tag, a cost, to such a policy and it would be foolish indeed to count only the benefit and not the cost, or vice versa.

Again, whatever views we might take about the scale of benefit or the cost that might be afforded, I hope we might, again, agree to stand on the common ground that the cost-benefit ratio should be as favourable as possible. There will be people who have to pay for this policy— the generality of taxpayers and, let it not be forgotten, also those whose businesses or jobs suffer subsidised competition; there will be people, too, who gain from the policy. I am sure we would agree that so far as possible the recipients should be in those areas that are most hard hit and that these should be established on sound criteria.

I hope, though it is only a hope, that one day we might agree that not every part of the kingdom can be a beneficiary area. In the White Paper we argued:

"The incentives must be made more cost effective . . . with greater emphasis on job creation and selectivity and less discrimination against service industry".

That major change won widespread support. Nor should that come as a surprise since examples abound of substantial grant payments that have been made as incentives to companies which would have located the investment in an assisted area in any event. In some cases those companies were themselves hardly pressed for cash and the investment produced few jobs, but the test, surely, for support for any project should be: what does it do for jobs, how many jobs and at what cost?

In some other cases, high rates of grant encouraged projects of marginal viability to concentrate in the assisted areas with the enhanced risk of multiple collapses during difficult times. Thus, past policies left the assisted areas particularly vulnerable during hard times. Perhaps, there is more than a little truth in the suggestion that major companies — not least multinationals — shopped around for the highest grant rates for their branch operations and that the assisted areas then suffered from the tendency for such companies to cut back on the more remote branches of their operations during recessions. At the same time, geographically mobile service industries which might have been attracted were denied incentives available to manufacturing industry to encourage their location in assisted areas.

I believe that these problems can be mitigated by the new policies. First, in most cases, the automatic grant will be related to jobs. The grant per job limit will avoid what one might call the Sullom Voe syndrome of high subsidy and disproportionately few long-term jobs. Even worse were the high automatic subsidies paid to investments which created no new jobs, or even reduced jobs, or merely shuffled jobs from one assisted area to another. Some have argued that automatic assistance should continue for job protection. I believe that that is best dealt with on a case-by-case basis.

In the past the abuses extended over a wide range. For example, a printing company could gain automatic RDG when it bought new plates to print a different book from the book it had been printing during the previous week. That was hardly related to job creation or even to job protection. Under our new policy, therefore, selective aid will continue to be available for the particularly desirable modernisation projects. Selective aid will also enable us to continue to compete effectively for internationally mobile projects.

The second major change is the fact that we have revised the geographical coverage of the assisted areas and moved from a three-tier system to a two-tier system. I am sure that there will be discussion today and later tonight on whether we have included a sufficiently large percentage of our working population in the assisted areas.

I believe that we have included as many as can be afforded. It would have been difficult to persuade the European Commission that a larger percentage would not have taken the policy from one of assistance to less-favoured areas to one of illegal general subsidy.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): I am sure my right hon. Friend appreciates that the fact that the Lancaster travel-to-work area with its high unemployment of 15·3 per cent. ceased to be an assisted area was a great disappointment to the area. We hope very much that my right hon. Friend will mitigate the damage that would otherwise by caused to us and will make the area a derelict land clearance area. If that is done, we can reasonably continue with the progress we have been making during our time as an assisted area.

Mr. Tebbit: I can understand my hon. Friend's disappointment at the fact that Lancaster fell on the wrong side of the line we drew. I understand that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment—the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Macfarlane) —has written to my hon. Friend and some other hon. Members. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman) will receive that letter either this evening or tomorrow telling her that Lancaster has been granted status as a derelict land clearance area.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): What does that have to do with logic?

Mr. Tebbit: The hon. Gentleman clearly does not understand logic or he would understand the purpose of those clearance areas and the subsidies granted to them. I regret the fact that the hon. Gentleman opposes the grant of such subsidies to Lancaster. No doubt the Labour candidate for the area at the next election will be asked about his party's attitude.

Mr. Prescott: And that is what it is about.

Mr. Tebbit: If the hon. Gentleman makes a speech tonight I hope that he will make a point about the percentage of Tory-held seats and the percentage of Labour-held seats which are beneficiaries of regional aid. That would dispose of any suggestions of bias — [Interruption.] Having had this debate delayed once by unruly behaviour, I hope that will not be delayed again by unruly behaviour by the Opposition Front Bench.

The rapid restructuring of the economy had made a nonsense of the old map. Who could argue that the core of the west midlands, with unemployment rates of up to 21 per cent., should be excluded from benefits received by, say, Darlington with 15·2 per cent. unemployment, Durham with 14 per cent. unemployment or Oldham with 13.8 per cent. unemployment? Of course, current unemployment rates cannot be the sole criterion for inclusion in the assisted areas, but the west midlands stood out as an unfair exclusion.

Sir Reginald Eyre (Birmingham, Hall Green): How many applications for grants have been received in the west midlands area, including Birmingham, since the proposals incorporated in the scheme were first announced?

Mr. Tebbit: I cannot give my hon. Friend a precise answer, but I know that the level of interest expressed has been high. The last time I inquired there had been well over 2,500 inquiries and well over 100 applications were being processed. I believe that my Department has arranged more than 40 seminars for interested parties in the Birmingham-west midlands area to examine the opportunities opened up by the new status of the area. I hope that that will be helpful to the city.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Will the right hon. Gentleman try to satisfy the House about the scheme's flexibility? The right hon. Gentleman just answered a question about land clearance from the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman). An application for land clearance was made in my constituency, in some parts of which there is 30 per cent. unemployment. We received a reply stating that, looking at the city as a whole, there was no justification for granting land clearance status. Could the scheme be more flexible and more selective and take such aspects into account?

Mr. Tebbit: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will want to take up that matter with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, who is responsible for that scheme. I am not responsible for it — [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman must take account of the fact that I am often aware of what goes on, even in other Departments, but I cannot take responsibility for the schemes they draw up.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): Does my right hon. Friend agree with the answer that has been given in the newspapers, that there is a case for task forces, especially for cities with needs that do not fall within the prescribed assisted areas criteria, to pull together the various activities of Departments such as the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department of the Environment? I assume that my right hon. Friend's Department will have a major role to play in such task forces.

Mr. Tebbit: My hon. Friend puts a good point. I am not sure that we would necessarily create task forces as such. We seek to achieve much greater co-ordination between the regional offices and the Departments that operate in these areas, where several schemes of urban aid and regional industrial assistance overlap.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Tebbit: This might be the last intervention I shall accept, or my speech will be rather long.

Mr. Favell: My right hon. Friend pointed out earlier that many well-run Conservative authorities have been excluded from the map. Is there not a problem with this policy in regarding development status as a reward to the prodigal son? Let us take the case of Manchester and Stockport. There is not a blade of grass between the two. Manchester city employs twice as many people per head of population as Stockport. Manchester thereby drives employment out of Stockport. Stockport is faced with the difficulty of Manchester city being aided to a large extent and Stockport not receiving that aid.

Mr. Tebbit: I can understand how my hon. Friend feels because I know that the local authority at Stockport has been assiduous in running a tight ship and giving good value to its ratepayers, which is more than can be said for a good many of the others nearby. But inevitably there are problems across boundaries of discrimination one way and another, and inevitably there are occasions when those who have looked after their financial affairs find themselves called upon to give help to those who have wilfully not done so. That is an inevitable consequence of some of these schemes.

In redrawing the map we have taken into account total unemployment, long-term unemployment, growth in labour supply, industrial and occupational structure, activity rates, peripherality and inner city problems. Even then we felt it necessary to take into account the relationships between neighbouring areas and, indeed, one might wax eloquent about what have become known as doughnut effects, where one small area is left unaided with a whole circle of aided areas round it. No doubt some hon. Member will touch on that later this evening.

Of course, we gave careful consideration to the many representations made to us. We have increased coverage to 35 per cent. of the working population and that will give us maximum access to the European regional development fund. Without that funding we could not have given such wide coverage. Thus we have been able to increase the areas eligible for regional selective assistance, too.

Within that wide coverage we have drawn a tighter group of inner tier areas, covering some 15 per cent. of the working population, on which to focus resources where they are most needed. In this inner tier we are concentrating assistance: not only ERDF and regional selective assistance, but the automatic RDG assistance. I realise of course that the former SDAs, whose 22 per cent. grants will go down to 15 per cent., will complain, but we are not setting out to give handouts to companies and in many cases it was simply not necessary to go to that level of subsidy to secure the jobs. I for one see no reason why we should add to the profitability of companies that were already adequately profitable and could have been induced to go on 15 per cent. or perhaps even less.

One consequence of these changes, as I have said, is that some areas will be downgraded or excluded from assistance. That will be a source of dissatisfaction. To minimise the pain, therefore, there will be transitional arrangements more generous than any offered before. These were described in detail by my hon. Friend the Minister of State last November.

That brings me to one matter that was not foreshadowed in earlier statements; nor is it so much a regional policy issue as a public expenditure issue that had to be faced by my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and myself. We agreed upon an approach—

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): "We agreed"?

Mr. Tebbit: Yes, we agreed upon an approach, which normally would have been announced at the time of the publication of the public expenditure White Paper. But my right hon. Friends and I thought it would be wrong for the House to debate these matters in ignorance of decisions that had been taken and that would shortly be public knowledge.

As I have explained, the transitional provisions protecting the decisions made on the basis of the old map and the old scheme will overlap the new policy and the new area coverage. In effect, two schemes will be running side by side with considerable overlap.

In 1983 we estimated that spending on regional industrial incentives in the year 1985-86 would be just under £500 million. It is now clear that, with the new policy and the transitional arrangements, that expenditure would have increased to well over £600 million and that bulge of expenditure simply could not be afforded.

We are therefore introducing today a four-month moratorium on the payment of the old style RDGs.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West) rose——

Mr. Tebbit: If the hon. Gentleman will relax for a moment, I am sure that he would want to hear what the moratorium is and how it will operate. It means that there will be a four-month gap between the approval of an application and the payment and this will apply to the old RDGs until further notice. It will not apply to properly completed applications for grant which were either received or postmarked before midnight tonight; nor will it apply to the new RDG scheme. The moratorium will ensure that next year we spend no more on regional industrial incentives than we forecast in 1983.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon) rose——

Mr. Tebbit: It does not mean that there will be any substantive reduction in spend next year compared to the 1983 forecasts, nor will any grants be "lost"—they will only be delayed. So, while there may be some savings from the new policy as soon as 1986-1987, we still do not expect there to be any significant saving in regional policy spending until 1987-88, when we would have spent some £700 million if we had made no policy changes.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): Does the Secretary of State appreciate that extensive undertakings were given during the passage of the legislation about the transitional provisions, and assurances were given to those affected by regional development policy that great care would be taken? The result of the Secretary of State's announcement, although he claims that it makes no real difference to the national accounts — one wonders, therefore, why it is made—will mean that companies that have undertaken to purchase equipment and entered into contracts for it will be left with four months in which to find the money, and they will probably have to borrow it at the new rates of interest that the Government have introduced.

Mr. Tebbit: In the event that that is so, I do not think that there would be any great difficulty in the company being able to borrow the money against the security. The amount that we are discussing is something like 4 per cent. on the 15 per cent. grant so it is not a major element of the cost involved. I have to remind the House that overall the expenditure in the coming year is expected to be the same expenditure as would have been undertaken on the basis of our 1983 estimates. I think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has slightly missed the point, and I am not trying to be funny at his expense. I want to make it absolutely clear that——

Mr. Ashley: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman can see that the Secretary of State is not giving way. I think that he may give way later, but not now.

Mr. Tebbit: I want to make it absolutely clear so that we can understand each other that there will be two policies, in effect running side by side during the transitional period. Therefore, in order to maintain expenditure at the level which had been forecast in the 1983 White Paper we have used a moratorium on the RDGs on the old system. The new system will go ahead untouched. That is the way in which we avoid the bulge of public expenditure. I can understand right hon. and hon. Gentlemen not liking it—I can understand companies not liking it—but on the other hand it may be rather more popular with taxpayers as a whole.

Mr. Wigley: On this point, will not the right hon. Gentleman appreciate that the cash flow problems for companies are as great as, if not greater than, the cash flow problems for Government? In these circumstances, can he give an assurance not only that a letter of intent will be issued to the companies to help them in getting the liquidity that they might need, but that the Government will consider reimbursing any interest costs in the interim period, given the current high rate of interest?

Mr. Tebbit: Let me take the hon. Gentleman's points one by one. First, there are many companies whose cash flow problems are considerably less than those of Governments—we would all like to be in the position of, for example, GEC, with a cash flow. Many companies do not have cash flow problems. The position of industry as a whole—its profitability and its liquidity—has vastly improved in the last year or so, and I believe that in general this would not be an unduly onerous burden.

Secondly, where a company's application is approved, a letter will be issued to it which will say, "Yes, you qualify for the grant. It will be paid, and it will be paid in four months from now," as opposed to today. I imagine that such a letter could be used in an application to a bank.

Thirdly, it would not be right for the taxpayer to carry the cost of the interest involved.

Mr. Ashley: Is the Secretary of State aware that his colleague announced a reduction in regional aid? The Secretary of State is now announcing a freeze on that reduction. Given the increase in unemployment and the fact that regional aid ensures equity, he is announcing an unfair policy that will hit those areas suffering high unmployment.

Mr. Tebbit: The right hon. Gentleman hardly expected me to come to the House today to announce an increase in expenditure on regional aid. For next year, expenditure will be maintained at the level that we forecast in 1983, but, because of the changes in policy, that expenditure will be more effective than it would have been under the old policy.

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): The fact that the new regional development grants will be unaffected by this moratorium and that the overall volume is unaffected for the coming year is much appreciated. May I thank my right hon. Friend on behalf of my constituents in Greater Manchester for the fact that Trafford Park has been included in the regional assistance status area?

Mr. Tebbit: I am glad that that has happened. I should perhaps trespass upon the relatively quiet response that I have so far had and say that in 1987-88 there will be significant savings of about £300 million a year on what would have been spent under the old policy. I emphasise that that is justified because the money that will be spent will be spent much more effectively. The Chancellor will be happy, but not yet.

Mr. Beith rose——

Mr. Tebbit: Others of differing political views may want to be miserable, but I would advise them not to be miserable yet. I would counsel them against misery in any case.

Mr. Beith: Does the Secretary of State recognise that he is delivering a double blow to areas such as Amble in Northumberland, which he has excluded from regional development aid? Firms in those areas are seizing the last chance to obtain some help from the scheme. Those firms are now being told that plans that they have had to bring forward to come within the scheme will not be paid for another four months.

Mr. Tebbit: I understand that, but there has been a reasonable time during which people could apply for grants. We could not have told them in advance that there was going to be a moratorium or its purpose would have been frustrated. That is one of the consequences of changing the shape of the map and the policy.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): While of course the moratorium may, as the Secretary of State has readily recognised, cause some problems to some firms, does he accept that the vast majority of British industry is much more interested in supporting him in keeping the general level of public expenditure under control because its greatest interest is in ensuring that inflation does not take off again? He has a great deal of support for trying to control public expenditure.

Mr. Tebbit: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It is appropriate that the case for the generality of the population—the taxpayers—should also be heard in a debate when, not unnaturally, we hear a great deal about the case for those who are in assisted areas or who would wish to be.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): They are taxpayers.

Mr. Tebbit: Yes, they are taxpayers, but they are beneficiaries, whereas the others are not.

Mr. Douglas rose——

Mr. Tebbit: Mr. Speaker, this is a short debate. I should have been able to give way to the hon. Gentleman had we not suffered from the vilely rude behaviour of some of his colleagues.

Regional policy should not be judged good if it costs a lot and bad if it costs rather less. It should be judged on what it achieves. Bluntly, past policies were not completely successful in the regions that they sought to help. In addition, they damaged some other areas, and the west midlands felt that strongly. They were expensive, thus causing a more general negative effect in the economy.

It has been estimated that the cost per net additional job created in the assisted areas in the 1970s was about £35,000 at 1982 prices. Many of those jobs would otherwise have come into being elsewhere in the country.

It will be some time before we know the cost per job of the new policy because such estimates must take into account the total effect not just on the firms that receive assistance but on their suppliers and competitors. Of course, new long-term stable jobs do not come into being overnight. I am confident that the new policy will be much more cost-effective than the old. However cost-effective the policy, it will still be a burden on the taxpayer. The new policy is expected to cost nearly £400 million a year in 1987-88. [Interruption.] The cost of the policy is imposed on industry. It is the wealth-producing industry of this country that provides the money to do it.

This is a considerable lightening of the burden on the country as a whole—a reduction of nearly £300 million from what would have been spent under former policies, and I make no apology for that.

The policies that I have outlined give the hardest hit areas the most help. They concentrate on job creation and not on how much taxpayers' money can be given away, sometimes to prosperous companies to subsidise them to do what they would have done anyway. The policy is to minimise job shuffling within assisted areas.

Mr. Douglas: The Secretary of State has said that three times.

Mr. Tebbit: I am sorry that I have had to say it three times, but it is possibly still not understood by the hon. Gentleman, and I might have to say it again.

The policies recognise more fully the role of the service industries as a provider of jobs. We look to better value for money and more jobs per pound of expenditure, because we recognise that regional policy has adverse effects on those who pay but do not receive, and their jobs matter too.

The Government do not turn their back on the problems of the regions, but we believe that as the traditional policy which has been followed for almost 40 years has not achieved what it should, new, more effective and less expensive policies are overdue. To suggest, as the Opposition amendment does, that the policy of spending some £480 million in 1985-86, £610 million in 1986-87 and £390 million in 1987-88 is destructive of regional policy is just plain silly. To deplore, as the amendment does, the changes — by calling them restrictions — to make that spending more cost-effective, is to support spending for the sake of spending and to oppose cost-effective policies.

As ever, the longer that the Opposition are out of office the fewer there are of them who remember what responsibility even felt like. The more distant their prospect of returning to office, the more ridiculous and irresponsible they become with this type of amendment. If there are credible alternatives to our policies they are not to be found in any of the Oppositions' policies. I commend the Government's policies to the House.

Mr. Speaker: I must announce to the House that I have selected the amendment which stands in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

5.20 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"but deplores the destruction of regional development policy at a time of record high unemployment and steep industrial decline in the regions and nations of the United Kingdom, condemns the massive cut of £300 million each year in regional industrial assistance, the abolition of special development areas, and the new reductions and restrictions on regional aids and urges a programme of national economic recovery to rebuild the industrial base in which positive regional development is given a crucial role."

Before embarking on the debate on the policy changes, I must express the deep concern of hon. Members on this side — and, I suspect, in other parts of the House, although they have not yet revealed it — about the sudden announcement by the Secretary of State today of the moratorium on regional development payments.

As the right hon. Gentleman well knows, the effect will be to damage many projects which are dependent on regional assistance for their viability. Even if the grants are paid at the first opportunity — I do not know whether that, in all cases, can be guaranteed—there will be an obvious effect on the cash flow of the companies concerned.

After all, many of those companies will have entered into binding contracts with suppliers on the basis that they thought they had a genuine undertaking and guarantee from the Government that the money to which they were entitled would be paid on the date on which it was due. They may in some cases be able to borrow to cover the difficulty of receiving their money four months late, but those which do that will have to pay interest, and they will have to pay at a higher interest rate as a result of the Government's recent financial policies.

The Secretary of State has treated this matter far too lightly. He says airily that many companies will be able to face this problem. But many companies will not, and to those that will not the Government merely shrug their shoulders and say, "That is too bad."

It emerges, however — from the way in which the right hon. Gentleman explains the national accounts — that not much is involved. The explanation we are given is that there really is no change; the same money will be spent. If so, why on earth are we having a damaging moratorimum. The Secretary of State cannot have it both ways. If there is no real change in this magical creative accounting—in which I am not surprised the right hon. Gentleman is an expert—there should be no need for this moratorium.

Mr. Tebbit rose——

Mr. Smith: I am happy to give the right hon. Gentleman another shot at it, if he would like one.

Mr. Tebbit: I could not have made myself clear, although I hoped that I had. The combination of bringing in the new policy would have increased spending next year. By bringing in the moratorium, we have brought spending back on to the line that had been forecast in 1983. That means that we have a more effective policy for the same money.

Mr. Smith: The money must be paid anyway. It is clear however, that it will be paid next year instead of this year. It is being shifted from one set of accounts to another. That fact prompts me to take the point further. One would have thought that this resulted from some unexpected development that threw the Government off course. But that has not been the case. It results precisely from the way in which the Government have gone about it.

The Government were warned throughout the passage of the preceding legislation that there would be a need for proper transitional arrangements. When they announced reductions in regional development grants —there had been a shrewd suspicion by many people that they would — there was a bunching of applications. When the Government then, in the last Budget, changed the capital allowances, there was a further incentive for people to get on with their projects as soon as possible. Therefore, there was a bunching of applications, and that apparently threw the Government accounts out of line for this year.

Instead of bringing forward a Supplementary Estimate to deal with that entirely predictable problem, the Government are trying to move the money into the next year's accounts. That seems funny accounting to those who are trying to understand it, and certainly the public will be puzzled by it.

However, that is not so much the problem. People who have undertaken contracts and made purchases will be left in the lurch as a result of this change by the Government, and it is on their behalf that we complain today.

Mr. Douglas: My right hon. and learned Friend will recall that one of the bull points made by the Minister of State when introducing the transitional arrangements was that they would be extremely beneficial in helping to alleviate the problems of firms which wanted to go ahead under the existing scheme. Now, by this moratorium, the Government are welshing on that promise.

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. Perhaps, like me, the Secretary of State is at a slight disadvantage in not having taken part in the proceedings on the Bill.

Mr. Tebbit: Not at all.

Mr. Smith: I was being charitable to the right hon. Gentleman. If he chooses to reject my charity, another side of my attitude towards him may develop during my remarks.

My hon. Friend raises the important point that Ministers concerned with the matter at the time gave one assurance after another that there would be generous transitional arrangements and promised that the scheme would last for a year in respect of applications in transit. One understood why that was done. Indeed, I understand that a provision to that effect appears in the commencement order. Now we have a sudden change which will mean a four-month delay. For a company which may be struggling for its very existence, regional development assistance is essential to its investment decisions. All its calculations are being thrown off balance.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman not think that industry will feel that the careful consultation and consideration which has been given to these changes—[Interruption.] —and the two to three-year transitional arrangements compare favourably with the sudden ending, at a stroke, of regional employment premium by the Government of which he was a member?

Mr. Smith: If the hon. Gentleman thinks that today's sudden announcement is an example of careful consideration and consultation with companies, he has an odd view of consultation. I am not surprised that companies find that they are often not adequately represented by Conservative Members who, if a Labour Government were in office, would be telling tales of woe about companies being in terrible trouble, saying that my hon. Friends and I do not understand the realities of business, do not know how companies are run, and the rest of it.

We have in office a party which claims to speak for manufacturing industry and management, yet not one Conservative Member rose while the Secretary of State was speaking to complain on behalf of the managements of those companies and the difficulties into which they are being put by the Government. Tory Members should be ashamed of themselves for being such party political sheep that they put their prejudices—[Interruption.] We have a volunteer.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman suggesting that companies would have entered into firm, binding contracts before having their applications for grant acceded to by the Department? If so, that would be curious commercial sense. If not, I understood my right hon. Friend to say that applications which had already been agreed would not be affected by the moratorium.

Mr. Smith: The Secretary of State had better have a word with the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman), who clearly did not understand the argument. It is applications already granted in respect of which payment will be delayed. Almost by definition, therefore, the contracts on which they depend were entered into previously.

Mr. Tebbit: So that the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not give the wrong impression—I know that he would not want to do so—let me deal with that question which arises on the moratorium. I am anxious to be careful in the words I use because I want to get it absolutely right. The moratorium will not apply to properly completed applications for grant received or postmarked before midnight tonight. Let us be clear about that.

I believe that the other reason why there was not quite so much outrage from the Government Benches as there was from the Opposition Benches was that my hon. Friends may have done their arithmetic more quickly than the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his hon. Friends and will have considered that on a £100,000 project with a rate of 15 per cent. grant, those concerned with the project would be looking for £15,000, and the 4 per cent. —assuming they were paying that sort of interest rate— that it would cost over four months would not be a catastrophic amount. If they were caught for that amount of money, perhaps they were unwise to go in for the project in the first place.

Mr. Smith: We hear harrowing tales of woe whenever there is an increase in local authority rates. We are told that sometimes a company's whole viability is at risk. In fact, local authority rates have a much smaller impact. The right hon. Gentleman had better be careful lest the response that he has just made is quoted against him. In effect, he said, "There is not much to worry about in the vast majority of cases." If it is that unimportant, why go to the fuss of making the announcement that the right hon. Gentleman has made today?

The Government are caught, on the one hand, by saying that there is no change of any consequence and we should not be particularly concerned about what is being done; but, when we look at it from the point of view of companies, we find every reason for them to be deeply concerned. That shows that the Secretary of State's announcement is so serious that we must protest profoundly and vigorously not only at the change that has been made, but at the sudden manner in which it has been made, which is all too typical of the lurching way in which Government policy develops from day to day.

The Secretary of State sought to persuade the House that what was involved in regional policy changes was not really major departure of principle, but merely a wise redistribution of resources and an exercise in value for money, trying to hone regional development policy techniques to be a more perfect way of delivering the goods. That simply will not wash when, at a stroke, £300 million has been taken out of a budget of £700 million not just this year but for every year that the policy runs. In three years or so, that will mean £1 billion being taken away that would otherwise have been available for the regions. That is a crippling attack on regional policy as a whole. It is not the first attack. There were cuts in 1979 and in 1982. Between 1974 and 1979 regional development expenditure was £6·4 billion. From 1979 to 1984 it was reduced to £4·1 billion. In other words, there has already been a reduction of £2·3 billion, or 35 per cent., compared with the amount spent by the Labour Government.

The further slashing cut of £300 million makes it clear that the Government's purpose is not to deploy resources more efficiently, but to reduce the financial commitment to regional indistrial assistance. Indeed, that was openly stated by the Minister of State in a speech in Birmingham shortly after the policy statements were made. The press release sent out by the Department tells us that regional policy savings should be "welcomed" according to the Minister of State in "a stout defence of the Government's regional policy".

Press officers at the Department are becoming somewhat deferential in relation to ministerial pronouncements. In that "stout defence" of Government policy the Minister went on to make a most surprising statement. He argued that the cuts were quite a good thing in public expenditure terms, but he then had some difficulty reconciling that view with any belief in regional development policy. He went on to say:

"What I am sure about is that lower public expenditure will help to create jobs. It is not Government spending money but Government not spending that creates jobs."

One wonders about the sanity of Ministers capable of uttering statements like that. The Minister of State is a perfectly intelligent person—[Interruption.] Perhaps I am being too generous. He is a reasonably intelligent person. His difficulty is that, like so many other folk in this country, he wants to keep his job. I dare say that he also hopes to improve his position. That is why he has to say these things. If it is not Government spending but Government not spending that creates jobs, there should have been a great leap forward in employment under a Government so dedicated to cutting public expenditure. Moreover, unemployment means higher public expenditure. If the result of Government policy is to put more people on the dole, and thus to increase public expenditure, one wonders at the logic of their statements. From the Minister's statement, that cutting £300 million from a £700 million budget will create more jobs, it follows logically that the total abolition of any regional development policy should be the greatest job creation exercise ever.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Lamont): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman not think that £300 million in extra taxes also destroys jobs?

Mr. Smith: Perhaps some day the Minister will explain to me why £300 million not being spent creates jobs, but £400 million being spent destroys jobs. I find that difficult to understand when the £400 million is being used to create and finance projects which in turn create jobs and wealth. I am beginning to think that hon. Members who begin their political life as reasonably intelligent people should have the benefit of a Government health warning in their dispatch boxes to the effect, "Thatcherism damages the brain", as that is clearly what has happened to Ministers at the Department of Trade and Industry. If the Minister of State is right in his assumptions, we should be destroying regional development policy entirely.

Towards the end of the same speech in Birmingham, when his audience of business men must already have been fairly mystified, the hon. Gentleman realised that he had to justify the £400 million that was still to be spent, so he said that some areas had considerable problems and still needed assistance. He did not make it clear why the £400 million was good for those areas when taking away £300 million was good for other areas. At that point, one begins to lose sight of the logic that drives the Government on.

Mr. Tebbit: I was waiting to see whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman would either clean his spectacles or stumble across the truth along the way, but clearly I shall have to help. He seems to have forgotten that the prime justification for the regional spending policy is a social justification—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] That is what the White Paper says. [Interruption.] If hon. Members will just relax, I shall explain. Within the total of jobs in the economy, what that spending achieves is, not least, that jobs will be created in one place rather than another. The right hon. and learned Gentleman then confused that with the point that my hon. Friend the Minister of State was making in relation to the aggregate of jobs in the economy.

Mr. Smith: The Secretary of State is now having to come to grips with things and to listen to arguments that are probably not often articulated in the Cabinet. Debates of this kind can be an educative experience for Ministers, and I hope that they will learn something today.

The Secretary of State now says that regional development policy is merely a matter of shifting jobs from one area to another—the very reason for which he condemned Labour Government policy. He is now saying, "I have changed that wicked policy, but in fact that is all that one can ever do with regional development policy." That follows from his statement that regional development policy is merely social policy. He clearly does not appreciate the economic case for regional development policy—to stimulate growth in the regions and to create new industrial enterprises that would not otherwise have been created. Far from merely moving jobs from one part of the country to another, it is a matter, as much as anything, of generating new jobs.

That is the basic fallacy of the Government's approach, and it arises due to a number of forces. The first is the need to slash public expenditure, and there have been all too many victims of that. Because of the mounting bill for unemployment on the Government's back, they are forced to cut other programmes — and regional development policy has been one of the victims.

I am especially sorry for the special development areas —the areas of highest need. As Ministers well know, the highest grants went to those areas because they had the biggest problems. If we are redefining the tools of regional development policy, what sense does it make to take away the specialist operations of the special development areas? That gives the lie to the claim that there is a re-honing of the techniques involved.

Let me deal with the argument that this was justified because of the very large projects upon which a great deal of regional money was spent. We have heard endlessly about the Sullom Voe oil terminal. The money spent upon that was spent many years ago. I suppose that the Government have in mind the Moss Morran project, the grants for which were, I believe, sanctioned by the present Administration. There is a very simple answer. The Government claim credit for the support that they gave to the Moss Morran project when it suits them, but they try to run away from it when it does not suit them in the House of Commons. The Government know, as does the House, that if that is the problem, there is a very simple way of dealing with it—one declassifies some of those projects from the range of regional development assistance or makes them subject to ministerial discretion of some kind.

The Secretary of State knows that certain types of industry are unable to benefit from regional development assistance and that decisions have to be made as to which industries qualify for such assistance. One can easily move an industry from one column to another. However, that is no justification for raiding regional development funds for public expenditure reasons that the Secretary of State has advanced today.

These changes, and also the Budget changes, will be very much to the disadvantage of certain industries which are struggling to survive. Those Conservative Members who take their constituency responsibilities seriously know that many companies, some of them old-established companies, are struggling to survive. They are struggling to survive on low profits and against the heavy tide of imports. Their only hope for survival is to invest heavily in new products and processes. I should have thought that any intelligent Government would wish in particular to give as much assistance as possible to companies which are situated in high unemployment areas. I fear that the consequences of these so-called job-directed changes and of the changes made in the Budget to capital allowances will hit precisely those industries and companies. They will suffer greatly from the present and continuing decline.

As the Secretary of State revealed in his intervention, the truth is that the Government do not believe there is an economic case for regional industrial policy. The White Paper is in line with the Chancellor of the Exchequer's famous and fatuous remark, that unemployment is a social, not an economic, problem. That is at the same intellectual level as the Chancellor's other famous observation, that the trend of future employment is not so much low-tech as no tech. What an ambition for the Chancellor to have for the people of this country. The Government have deluded themselves into believing that regional development policy is a social matter which verges on charity: that they must be quite nice to those who live in disadvantaged areas and give them a handout from time to time in order to keep the social fabric in good repair. That is a departure from the policy followed by previous Conservative as well as Labour Governments.

Thatcherism does grave damage by inculcating the inability to grasp the point that unemployment is a waste of resources, both physical and human. Failure to deploy those resources in our regions will condemn us to economic and national decline. If we persist in this waste, we shall fail to create the wealth which can truly guarantee the social fabric of this country. I regret that that decline is well advanced in many regions of the country, but it has spread more widely than the areas which are traditionally defined as being in need of assistance.

The Secretary of State has today had the sauce to try to claim some credit for bringing the west midlands into the range of reginal industrial assistance. He has got hold of the wrong end of the stick. The Government should be condemned for causing such destruction to the once great industrial powerhouse of the west midlands. Since 1979 the Government have brought the west midlands to its knees — to the condition that fulfils the criteria for regional industrial assistance. However, when the Government seek to assist such regions, they give to difficult areas within areas like the west midlands—for instance, the centre of Birmingham — far too little assistance.

Miss Betty Boothroyd (West Bromwich, West): Four hundred thousand jobs have been lost.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend speaks eloquently of the problem in that area. As the Secretary of State knows, it is not an area with which previous Governments had to deal as a matter of policy.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West) rose——

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman can leave, if he wishes, but I am not going to give way to him.

What will be the effect of all these changes in policy? Inevitably, they will accelerate both job losses and industrial decline in the hard-pressed areas. Scotland will lose £100 million, Wales will lose £60 million and England nearly £150 million in each year of the operation of this policy. It is not as though these areas have not been suffering. Since 1979, Wales has lost 83,000 jobs, the north 100,000, the north-west 250,000, Yorkshire and Humberside 162,000 and Scotland 150,000. On top of that there has now been the chopping almost in half of regional development industrial assistance. In every area where there has been a reduction in assistance as a result of this policy, from the south-west of England to the north of Scotland, there will be added the almost direct stimulation of unemployment. For those reasons we condemn the changes that have been introduced.

May I remind the House of what the Conservative party has said. I can do no better than to quote the words of the present Prime Minister during the 1979 general election campaign. Speaking in Bolton on 1 May 1979, she said:

"Of course, we will continue with regional aid. We have always given special help to the regions".

That was a regional development policy of much greater extent and capability than the one we are discussing today.

In case there is any doubt about the intentions of the Conservative party, on 16 April 1979, in Coventry the Prime Minister said:

"Labour's latest smear suggests that the next Conservative Government would cut off all state help for industry and the regions—and thus destroy jobs. This is a wicked lie . . . We are committed to the maintenance of a strong and effective regional policy."

Hon. Members who seek to try to escape from the consequences of that quotation by referring to all the help that has been given must bear in mind that the Prime Minister said:

"We are committed to the maintenance of a strong and effective regional policy."

The Prime Minister did not say, "We shall have to take the interests of the taxpayer into account." Anybody who describes these changes as making regional policy stronger and more effective does not understand what the policy is about.

At the heart of this matter there is a fundamental problem, namely that the Government cannot see the economic case for it. If we continue to neglect the economic case, the creation of wealth in this country will depend only upon the more prosperous areas in the south. The rest of Britain will be relegated to competing with low-wage countries for routine assembly type production. That can never be a proper policy for the whole of this country which Parliament has to represent. Parliament represents those areas which are well off as well as those areas which are not so well off.

The great opportunity to redesign our regional development policy in the context of the recession has been missed by the Government. They have perverted it into a cost-cutting exercise. No attempt has been made to integrate regional industrial assistance with other forms of social help and assistance and with the range of policies that the Government ought to be pursuing. They have made cuts there, too. In recent years local authorities have taken much more interest in the economic development of their areas. Many have been pressed to do so because this is the most important problem that faces their citizens.

There have been many imaginative developments. The enterprise boards are often able to create more jobs at a greatly reduced cost than the present Government or previous Governments have been able to create through their regional development policies. They are certainly very much cheaper than jobs created in enterprise zones. The Government are frightened to tell us how much they cost. I am not the only Member who has put down questions asking about the cost of jobs in enterprise zones. We have all received the same answer: the Government do not know. They prefer to use it as a technique of policy, but they do not know what such jobs cost, or they are frightened to say what they cost. Such a job is estimated to cost £50,000. We hear very little about the value of money in the context of the enterprise zone argument.

We have seen local authorities, many of them Labour-controlled, seeking to fill the vacuum created by the Government's withdrawal from action on and concern for economic development in their areas. There has been no new thinking and there is no new approach in this regional development policy. It is the same old story from the Government. The Government do not build for themselves; they destroy the work of others—not just the work of Labour Governments, but of Tory Governments in the past.

What is frightening is that the Government appear to be impervious to the damage that they are causing. As the economic storm clouds gather over Britain and become more serious every day, the Government plunge blindly on destroying as they go. When they are finally called to account, the missed opportunities and wanton destruction of regional development policy will, I hope, be high on the indictment.

5.50 pm

Mr. David Mudd (Falmouth and Camborne): I hope that the right hon. and learned Member for Monkland, East (Mr. Smith) will accept that as I am not following him into the Division Lobby tonight I shall not follow the argument that leads him there, although he may find a certain identity of views on one or two aspects of the philosophy of failed regional policy. To reassure my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friends, I shall not be following them into the Lobby either in support of this regional aid package.

However, I welcome two particular aspects of the policy relating to Cornwall. First, I welcome the tidying up of development areas in the extreme west of the county, even though that means a downgrading, and equally, I welcome the recognition for the first time of mining activities as qualifying for regional policy and grant aid.

Having said that, I must make the blunt point that regional aid in its original form, its modified form, its updated form, its improved form and now its new-look form has completely failed to serve the economic needs of the west country, particularly the far west of Cornwall, even at a time when parts of my constituency enjoyed special development area status.

If the present regional policy has succeeded, why do I have 2,500 men out of work in Falmouth—27·2 per cent. unemployment—1,500 registered as unemployed in Redruth, and 2,000 people registered as unemployed in Camborne, despite that being a small area that should be the industrial heartland and growth area of west Cornwall?

Falmouth, Camborne and Redruth, having failed to gain any benefit from special development area status, now find — surprise, surprise — that they have been relegated to development area status. We are entitled to ask what is the merit, value and point of that. What good will that do the unemployed in my constituency?

I must admit that I am not merely saying that it is Government regional policy, as embodied in the statement of 28 November, that is at fault. There is a shopping basket of failed Government regional policy that has impeded the regeneration of economic activity in west Cornwall.

The Department of the Environment would not allow Carrick district council to use £2·5 million of the £7 million that it had made in selling council properties to extend a new building programme that would help the elderly, the handicapped, single-parent families and young married people. That was Carrick's own money, brought about by its own judicious activities. As a result, the unemployed remain unemployed. Those who require housing have to wait still longer and a local authority is denied the ability to levy rent and rates on its own bricks and mortar. I criticise that policy and the effect it has on parts of my constituency.

It is the policy of the Department of Trade and Industry resolutely to refuse even to consider for one moment the possibility of the introduction of legislation on mineral rights. That would ease the way to the exploration and exploitation in the Cornish minerals industry in what happens to be the one growth industry in Cornwall in terms of an increased work force.

The Treasury has now come up with a wonderful scheme effectively to reduce VAT collection in west Cornwall. Nobody likes VAT. Nobody likes having to pay it. But Cornish business men and small shopkeepers will now have to wait a long time for advice or will have to make costly phone calls which in no way assists the survival of the economy of west Cornwall.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Will my hon. Friend confirm that both he and I and other hon. Members from Cornwall have written to the Minister and the Treasury on that point and that, despite our letters, we have been given no costings of the savings that the Minister claims will be made by this reorganisation?

Mr. Mudd: I gladly agree with my hon. Friend but that is a point that he will no doubt wish to pursue with Treasury Ministers rather than with the Department of Trade and Industry within the context of this debate.

The Government's policy wastes resources and effort by attracting the footloose into the far west of Cornwall — firms which may close quickly with no notice whatever in response to the faintest quiver of economic change, which may well founder as a result of new and changed technology and any changed pattern of economic activity. Those are the firms that I describe as the footlose or the bounty hunters. They have made the decision to come to Cornwall from afar. From the moment that they arrive they do not identify with the local communities and needs. Their particular interest in coming to Cornwall is purely an attempt to take advantage of such regional aid as their accountants assure them will be necessary and beneficial to them.

I have no doubt that the real way forward is to switch support to indigenous undertakings in Cornwall, including tourism; to remove the inhibitions that prevent local government from using its resources in the interests of its communities, and to look carefully and closely at one aspect of Government policy that I admit has succeeded in Cornwall—the community programme.

The community programme has genuinely introduced hope where it did not exist. It has helped to develop new skills, and above all it has created a new pride in community effort and activity. Steps should now be taken by the Government within the context of regional policy seriously to consider extending the scheme to something on the lines of a regional, county or district task force undertaking long-term projects such as the construction of houses, hospitals, roads, schools and other environmental works.

Although the community programme has succeeded, before long it will be seen as having been nothing more than a great deal of effort and generated activity. In the process of time the weeds will return to the churchyard that have now been cleared. The walls that have been restored will fall down again and our ponds and village streams will once more have the clutter of supermarket trolleys, pram bodies and mattresses. It will have been a good scheme which harnessed a great potential, but to no avail whatever.

As the Government consider what they should be doing for the regions, they should consider some way of harnessing the community programme to create long-term employment by creating community works of value to the infrastructure. In that way, even at this late stage, the Government's regional policy could, while helping the unemployed, give positive and lasting value to the industries, firms, businesses and people of our hard-pressed and neglected regions.

5.58 pm

Mr. Norman Miscampbell (Blackpool, North): I speak on behalf of an area which has lost its assisted area status and where there is now in Blackpool 20·2 per cent. unemployment. Taking an average over the last year from January to January, that is 17·8 per cent.

I understand the Government's difficulties, but neither I nor my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) can support the Government in the Lobby tonight, for the following reasons. I used the figures for the local authority area, but the Government have based their decision on the travel-to-work area.

The controversy between us is central to Blackpool's problem. On the criterion used by the Government—the travel-to-work area — we are linked with Lytham St. Anne's and between Blackpool and Lytham St. Anne's there is very little relationship. The latter is a wealthy retirement area. Most of those who work are in businesses in the north-west of Lancashire or travel to Manchester. The unemployment rate is about 9 per cent. These facts mean that the criterion, when rigidly applied, drags Blackpool down below the level at which it will qualify for assisted status.

I am not arguing for a black spot policy. I understand that one cannot have a piecemeal approach, but Blackpool itself would pass every criterion and every test to be a travel-to-work area on its own. We have 60,000 people working in the town and 70 per cent. of them work in the area of Blackpool local authority. On that basis, Blackpool constitutes one of the largest areas in the north-west of England, far larger than many travel-to-work areas that have been granted assisted area status. My right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South and I are saying that Government policy should be more flexible than it has been.

The problem does not end there. Over the past year, there has been a steady decline in our town. The figures for the future are ominous. Taking the town of Blackpool alone—the local authority area—over the past year there has been an increase of 1·8 per cent. in unemployment. The travel-to-work area has shown an increase of 1·3 per cent. Unfortunately, that rate is well ahead of the Lancashire rate, which is running at 0·7 per cent., while in the United Kingdom as a whole it is 0·6 per cent.

Among the criteria that are used, do the Government take into account the fact of rapid deterioration and the fact that the figures show an ominous future ahead of us unless changes come? It is not as if Blackpool has been slow in facing up to competition. The tourist industry is now our main industry because our small manufacturing industries have suffered over the past 20 years. The tourist trade has been faced with fierce competition from the Costa Brava and other resorts in Europe. We have done our best, and we have done well. If British industry as a whole had done as well as Blackpool's tourist industry, we would be telling a different story tonight. We have changed in part from small boarding houses to self-catering flats. There have been massive changes and improvements in our hotel accommodation. We have embarked on leisure complexes of great size, some of them the biggest in Europe. We have done all that we can and, in doing so, we were among the prime areas attracting EEC money.

[Mr. Norman Miscampbell]

One of the biggest complexes is being built in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South. Hon. Members will not be surprised to hear that, it being Blackpool, the area is called the Sandcastle. That rather odd name disguises a complex with £16 million of leisure facilities which will bear comparison with anything in Europe and many other places in the world. It has already attracted £1·6 million of EEC money, and we are grateful for that. However, that is only part of what we could and should be getting and what we shall lose.

For these reasons, and because of the lack of flexibility, we feel that we cannot support the Government. One thing has been said by everyone concerned, and that is that there should be a constant review of the problems that areas such as ours face. There certainly needs to be a review. I hope that it will be assiduous and careful, and in the end will help Blackpool.

6.5 pm

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): Even before today's announcement of the moratorium, we in Scotland had plenty to complain about regarding the Government's record on regional policy over recent months. On 28 November the Minister made an announcement about the new assisted areas and the new rate of grant of 15 per cent., compared with the 22 per cent. enjoyed in special development areas and 20 per cent. in ordinary development areas. When the new rules were introduced under the Co-operative Development Agency and Industrial Development Act 1984, there was an explosion of anger in Scotland at the loss of assistance to Scottish industry amounting to about £100 million a year out of the £300 million that the Government wanted to save. The announcement of a moratorium is simply twisting the dagger in Scotland's wound.

I have made speeches before about the new system of development assistance, and the move away from automatic grants to greater reliance on selective grants and dealing with matters on a project basis rather than on a straight capital expenditure basis. Tonight I do not have time to repeat the criticisms that I have made on a number of occasions, both in the House and in the Scottish Grand Committee. The new policy is fundamentally misconceived. The purpose of the policy is to save money, but it will also cause more bureaucracy and argument between Government officials and the individuals applying for project assistance. Once the new scheme is properly in operation, and industrialists who enjoy the benefits of the existing scheme see the implications of the new scheme —particularly the exclusion from the new scheme of modernisation and replacement projects—there will be another explosion in Scotland among many companies and individuals who are traditional supporters of the Conservative party and Government.

We have made these points on many occasions, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), in his excellent speech, has developed the case for regional policy as a whole. We base our case not simply on social grounds, but on economic grounds, and my right hon. and learned Friend disclosed some of the fallacies behind the recently announced changes in policy.

I come specifically to what was announced today. When the Co-operative Development Agency and Industrial Development Act was going through the House, it was reported that the savings would be between £150 million and £200 million a year. Some of us said then that there would be considerable additional saving when a new map was published and the new rates of grant were announced, as they were on 28 November. At that time, I remember the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland with responsibility for education and industry specifically telling me that we should not make any assumptions that there would be any further saving, and that perhaps there would be only a redistribution of money. We were misled into believing that the savings of £150 million to £200 million would be the total, and we did not have to worry about anything that happened subsequently.

Mr. Norman Lamont rose——

Mr. Millan: No, I shall not give way, because the hon. Gentleman was not present when I had that answer from the Under-Secretary of State.

When the announcement was made in November, we found that the cuts would be not £150 million to £200 million, but about £300 million, with the cuts in Scotland at about £100 million. We were given no warning that there might be further cuts, like those that were announced this afternoon through the moratorium.

What do the cuts amount to? The Secretary of State gave many figures, but he was careful not to give a precise figure for the cuts. I understood him to say, however, that in 1985-86, after the cuts, expenditure would be £480 million, whereas before the cuts it would amount to more than £600 million. How much more? We do not know. However, we know that a cut of more than £120 million is to fall on industry in the development areas in 1985-86. I hope that the Minister will either confirm or deny my assumption when he replies to the debate.

Secondly, when is the moratorium to end? Has a decision been taken? The Secretary of State gave estimated figures not only for 1985-86 but for 1986-87 and 1987-88. He must be assuming either that the moratorium will continue indefinitely or that at some time it will be lifted. We are entitled to know what the Government's intentions are.

Industry has been misled not only by what Ministers have said in the House but by the commencement order itself. The commencement order for the Co-operative Development Agency and Industrial Development Act 1984 was published on the same day as the Government announcement and was to come into operation on 29 November. The transitional provisions in article 4 of the coommencement order led industry to believe that as long as the asset was provided within the period of one year from the appointed day — 29 November 1984 — everything would be all right and the grants would be paid. There was no question then of a moratorium or of any cut in the amount of money to be made available to industry under these provisions.

Because there is a transitional period, because the new system is much less favourable than the old, and because the Budget changes encourage capital expenditure for a limited period, expenditure will naturally and inevitably be higher than it would otherwise have been. Indeed, Ministers constantly boast about it. Earlier this week, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that private investment is increasing by leaps and bounds. Yet, at the same time as he is taking credit for that, he introduces a moratorium to cut assistance to such capital investment in the existing development and special development areas—the areas of the country that need it most desperately.

We have been misled on numerous occasions. We were misled when the Co-operative Development Agency and Industrial Development Bill was going through Parliament and we were deliberately misled at the time of the announcement on 28 November. Today, we have not so far been given the whole story.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was honest on one point. He said that the Secretary of State for Scotland agreed with the contents of the announcement. I hope that that comment will prevent the Secretary of State for Scotland from briefing the press all over Scotland to the effect that he did not really approve of the changes and was, indeed, opposed to them.

Why is the Secretary of State for Scotland not here to take his share of the responsibility? The answer is that he is in Aberdeen. This evening he is to attend a banquet and to address the Aberdeen chamber of commerce. The title of his speech is to be "Scotland Tomorrow". I can tell him what Scotland tomorrow will feel about today's announcement. It will feel that the Government are once again giving every sign that they are abandoning the regions, and abandoning Scotland.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): Not so long ago the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) had considerable influence on the management of the Scottish economy. During that period, the Scottish economy did not grow as it has done while my right hon. Friend has been responsible for it.

Recently, the New Statesman told us that Labour had lost the economic argument. On the form shown in the debate so far, Labour will not win the regional policy argument either. What was made clear by the speeches of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) and the right hon. Member for Govan is that they have nothing new to offer to regional policy thinking. It is the old, failed approach, except that it is now five years older and five years out of date. They are offering again—perhaps with a slightly more Left-wing slant—the old policies that under the Labour Government doubled unemployment, doubled prices, doubled taxes and in five years doubled the national debt. That was the achievement of the Labour policies, and they have not changed despite the fact that Labour Members have had five years in which to consider how to do better.

The only substantial argument that we have heard from the official Opposition is that the Government propose to reduce total expenditure on regional employment policy by £300 million, starting in three years' time. Should we not put that reduction in the context of the fact that the abolition of the national insurance surcharge—Labour's tax on jobs—has put £3,000 million back into industry and commerce? Industry has already benefited from regaining that sum, in three instalments—that may be one significant reason why industrial investment in this country is at an all-time high—and it will continue to benefit every year.

However, even that assistance to industry and commerce is not as important as the effect of controlling inflation, which has helped industry in terms of competitiveness and cost and has equipped it better to face competition in the world. No amount of expenditure on regional policy will help even those who benefit from it as much as the control of inflation has helped industry in general.

In their prejudice, the Opposition have ignored the real improvements in regional policy devised by the Government. We are reducing the extent of the most wasteful kind of regional policy expenditure—the kind exemplified at Sullom Voe — expenditure where the investment would have taken place regardless of regional policy and where substantial benefits would have resulted. There is fairly widespread agreement that the Government were right to take that step.

The Government should also be given credit for the fact that they are relating the help much more directly to jobs. The great issue of our time is coping with the problems of unemployment. Surely, therefore, it is right for the Government to emphasise and encourage the creation or defence of real jobs.

The third element of the policy, wholly ignored by the Opposition, is the Government's recognition of the role that service industries can play in job creation. Over many years and under successive Governments the great failure of regional policy has been the insistence on encouraging manufacturing industry in problem areas. That policy has done a positive disservice to the areas that it was intended to help, partly because, worldwide, manufacturing industry is in decline. It was not kind to send to the development areas a sector that was declining in importance.

Mr. Millan: It is not declining worldwide.

Mr. Henderson: Can the right hon. Gentleman tell me of any OECD country——

Mr. Millan: Japan, for one.

Mr. Henderson: The right hon. Gentleman will find that services in Japan are expanding significantly more than manufacturing. Services have an important role to play in job creation. The Government's policy will also help to provide flexibility in competing for mobile international investment, whether in manufacturing or service industries.

I hope that the Government will enhance their policy by having greater regard to the quality of the proposed investment and the activities being undertaken, whether they involve the transfer of technology or of management knowledge, skills, and technical knowhow. Such things would greatly benefit us, and some types of investment are not of such high quality.

Arguments on the map are inevitable. I am aware that some areas face special difficulties.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): My hon. Friend must agree that he cannot simply say that arguments about the map are inevitable. The area encompassing Blairgowrie, Pitlochry and Aberfeldy has been declared a travel-to-work area but no logical person imagines that people will commute on roads in that area during the winter. Indeed, I have invited Ministers to come with me and get stuck in the snow.

Mr. Henderson: I understand my hon. Friend's point, but he has questioned the definition of a travel-to-work area. I hope that none of us disagrees that the travel-to-work area is an appropriate building block from which to construct the map. We all know of areas where travel-to-work areas could be defined better, and I hope that the Government will continue to consider those problems.

Scotland's relative position in the United Kingdom economy has improved markedly in the past few years. I hope that the day will come when Scotland has no development areas, as that will be the day when we have achieved the object of regional policy, which is to iron out discrepancies. I understand that Scotland was eighth in the list of areas in the United Kingdom showing gross domestic product per head of population in 1971. We are now third. Average male earnings are now higher only in south-east England. These are substantial changes, and it would be surprising if they were not reflected to some extent in the map.

In the United Kingdom as a whole there has been continuous growth for three years. Unemployment has risen but, mercifully, the pace has been slower. In the past year there has been significant growth in the number of people employed. I believe that, were it not for the miners' strike, the 20-year trend of rising unemployment would have been reversed last year. I hope that the tide will be turned this year. I hope that the growth will help in every area, especially Scotland which has had enormous success in the new industries of the future. I also hope that help will be given to people in areas which, for social reasons, have been singled out for better targeted regional policy.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The hon. Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson) might hear about the speech that he has just made when he fights the next general election.

Two great problems face Britain today. The first is that we are increasingly becoming a divided nation — between rich and poor, north and south and employed and unemployed—and the second is that our industrial base has been allowed to wither away. We shall not have the stability and prosperity of the past until we find the means by which to reverse that trend.

One of the greatest instruments, if not the greatest instrument, that the Government have to address both of those problems, and at the same time, is regional policy. Regional policy is at the centre of the current political debate. It is a talisman by which we might judge the Government's seriousness about tackling Britain's fundamental problems.

Many right hon. and hon. Members have spoken in intimate detail of the Government's new policy, and I gather that many more will do so today. I shall address myself to some of the broader issues. The first concerns what regional policy will do to the British economy. We must measure the scale of the problem before deciding whether the means that the Government have chosen are appropriate and adequate. Britain has economic problems, but not because of the price of oil. Oil is the symptom rather than the underlying weakness. Britain's industrial base has been allowed to wither away since 1979. Non-oil trade was £2·75 billion in surplus in 1979 whereas in 1984-85 it is likely to be £11 billion in deficit, despite the fall in sterling. The world has suffered from the recent instability in currency rates, but once again Britain has suffered more. We have become a one-commodity economy—a kind of banana monarchy, the banana in our case being the price of oil. That underlying weakness in our industrial base, which the rest of the world recognises, makes us vulnerable to every new small wave that hits the monetary system. Manufacturing in the third quarter of 1984 was down 11·6 per cent. on the third quarter of 1979.

We can get by for a few more years on the temporary opiate of oil revenues, but the underlying weakness of our economy causes the greatest problems. What means have the Government chosen to overcome that? Not regional policy, as we heard from the Secretary of State. They have chosen the force of the market—what the Chancellor of the Exchequer describes as the creation of an enterprise economy. We do not see too much evidence of that bearing fruit. The International Monetary Fund's sixth annual report on international competitiveness puts Britain in 14th place out of 28 in a list that includes Mexico, Brazil, Portugal and Ireland. On the Government's criteria we are performing less well than the Netherlands, Norway, Austria, Saudi Arabia and Luxembourg. That is some enterprise economy.

In the area of enterprise that the Government consider most important — information technology — we have slipped from having a surplus in trade to a £150 million deficit. Moreover, it is predicted that we shall have a £1 billion deficit in 1990. It is a supposedly expanding area of our economy, yet, according to the National Economic Development Council's recent report, information technology, far from providing more jobs, will provide 2,500 fewer jobs this year.

Against that catalogue of decay and decline, we must review the Government's regional policy. It is clear that the Government are not matching their actions to the scale of the problem. They aim to reduce expenditure by £300 million. The cut is better expressed as nearly one half. Bearing in mind the scale of the problem, what Government would reduce aid to rundown areas — the very seat of our national decay? What Government would decide that there should not be more money to solve the problem but less? The answer must be only a Government who are blind, irresponsible or trapped within their ideology. Many of us believe that the Government show signs of all three, but I suspect that the chief reason is their ideology. They do not believe in regional policy. That is why they have cut spending by nearly one half. They have the spurious idea that the free market can be let rip— the very policy that has brought about the industrial decline from which we now suffer.

I believe in free market forces. They are there, and need to be manipulated and controlled for the benefit of society. But we cannot leave them totally uncontrolled. If we do so, they become the very instrument that widens the divisions in Britain. The south of England's free markets have become the north of England's lost hopes. That is why we must consider whether the Government's regional policy does anything to lessen those divisions. I believe that it will do little, because it will not meet the underlying necessity of getting the economy moving in the centres of decay, or of solving the problems of unemployment.

I am delighted that the west midlands is included, but the resources that the Government have put in are totally inadequate to the task. It has been calculated that one in every nine jobs there has been lost. That amounts to 250,000 jobs. The west midlands has declined more than any other region in Europe. West Yorkshire, included in the worst 25 per cent. of European regions, has now been gratuitously excluded from any access to EEC funds.

I have outlined the key points, but of course there are other points of detail. As my hon. Friends the Members for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) have said so eloquently on previous occasions when talking about Amble and Cornwall, the Government's policy is hopelessly inflexible. My hon. Friend the Member for Truro said that a sixth-former with a calculator and three or four hours in a library could produce a better scheme, and how right he was.

The shift from automatic to selective aid will produce a more bureaucratic system and will increase the power of civil servants over what happens. The £10,000 job limit that has been instituted for automatic aid is far too low. Indeed, in 1977 the Department of Trade and Industry itself set a limit of £7,000 for selective financial assistance. Thus, £10,000 is far too low.

We are also concerned about the missed opportunities. A regional policy could do so much. It could form the framework for local initiatives and community enterprise. It could specifically promote the new technologies to replace the old industries, along the lines proposed, I think, by the hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale). It could encourage self-help and the self-employed, and improve labour mobility. It could build new hope where there is now despair. It could form a central pillar of a new strategy to regenerate Britain's industrial base.

I fear that the Government's policy will do none of that, for this Government have no commitment to the idea of regional aid. The real purpose of their policy is cost-cutting rather than industrial regeneration. These proposals will do very little to reverse the underlying decay of Britain's industrial base, and will do nothing at all to bridge the terrible divisions in Britain, which now threaten to tear apart our nation. That is why we shall vote against the proposals.

6.32 pm

Mr. Paul Marland (Gloucestershire, West): I find the remarks of the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) extraordinary. He seems to think that money grows on trees. It is a stale old argument to say that it is too little, too late. The hon. Gentleman seems to want to aid everybody north of Watford and west of Newbury. If one helps everybody a little, one ends up helping no one. It is quite right that the Government should have had a close look at a rearrangement of regional aid, because many taxpayers in this country rightly look to us to obtain the best value for money. We need to help those in need properly instead of helping everybody a little.

Mr. Ashdown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Marland: I shall not give way, as I have only 10 minutes in which to speak. The hon. Gentleman had his 10 minutes, and I shall have mine.

My speech will be somewhat different from some of the contributions that have been made, because the citizens of Gloucestershire, West are well pleased with the announcement. They have received intermediate area assistance, and that puts them on an equal footing with south Wales. A lot of local effort has been put into achieving official recognition of our problems. Indeed, it has been a good year for the Forest of Dean, as that has also been designated an area of rural development by the Development Commission. I am confident that those two new sources of income will go a considerable way towards cutting our unemployment rate, which now stands at more than 17 per cent. That assistance has come in the nick of time. Several firms in the district had plans to move their enterprises away to adjoining assisted areas if that assistance had not been forthcoming. Now that we have that intermediate area assistance, those firms will stay put and expand in the Forest of Dean, thus creating more jobs for those in the area. I am confident that new firms will also be attracted to the area with the extra aid now available.

As other hon. Members have said, we are also now eligible for Euro funds, which will be of great assistance. Prior to the announcement from the Department of Trade and Industry, massive local efforts had been made by both local firms and the Forest of Dean district council to stem the tide of rising unemployment, but it was an uphill battle and unemployment now stands at more than 17·5 per cent. Now, by recognising our problems, the Department of Trade and Industry has given the local job and wealth creators great encouragement.

Since I was first elected in 1979, unemployment has been my biggest and most difficult ongoing problem. I have personally explored many schemes and ideas to get more job opportunities into the district. Some of that I did on my own, but more often others have been involved. The range of ideas has been enormous and ingenious. There have been individuals with ideas for making furniture and ornaments from scrapwood given by a local sawmill, and there has been the mighty Rank Xerox spending £500,000 on developing the Mitcheldean enterprise workshops, recently opened by the Duke of Kent. Actually, he could not get there because of the fog, but that was the original plan. In addition, the local authority was worried about financing and developing the Forest Vale industrial estate or running a spine road through its new development at Coleford.

Much courage and determination have been demonstrated in the Forest of Dean, and it is fitting that extra outside help should now have arrived. Many have been involved in winning that help. Gloucestershire county council has been actively involved in giving advice and support, especially in the preparation of formal submissions to the Department. However, by far the most constructive and consistent support that I have received has come from the Forest of Dean district council. My job as spokesman for the district has been made much more effective, thanks to its help and support.

I should like publicly to pay tribute to the senior councillors and council staff who have done so much to achieve this national recognition of our local difficulties. That recognition is made all the more significant by the fact that we are not, by any stretch of the imagination, all of the same political persuasion. But under the steady hand of the council chairman, Arthur Cooper, we have genuinely bridged the party gap to work in the best interests of the district. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont), and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier), are only too well aware of the endless delegations that I have brought to see them to discuss the matter, and of my own persistent nagging in the Lobbies and elsewhere. I think that I have tried their patience to the very limit, and I thank them for being so tolerant.

I am especially grateful—indeed, we all are in the Forest of Dean—to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the consistent and careful attention that he has given to us. On many occasions, in his role as Under-Secretary of State, he has visited the Forest of Dean, and on every occasion he has shown great consideration and understanding of our difficulties. On behalf of all my constituents and myself, I should like to thank him most warmly.

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): Perhaps the thanks of those in the Ross-on-Wye travel-to-work area could be coupled with those of my hon. Friend. The coupling of the Forest of Dean and Ross-on-Wye travel-to-work areas is significant and important.

Mr. Marland: I know that our mutual hon. Friend took the opportunity to visit both places. I thank my hon. Friend for adding his thanks to mine.

I now take the opportunity to bring to the attention of the House a further problem that is causing anxiety in Gloucestershire, West and in other constituencies. It relates to the poor and underdeveloped infrastructure of the Forest of Dean. There is no doubt that that needs to be developed to sustain and cherish our new development status.

The council sought permission from the Department of the Environment for an additional allocation of funds for specific areas of expenditure in that regard, but was refused. As a matter of broad principle, I understand that refusal, but I am sure that the Forest of Dean is not the only district to become a special case regarding new development.

As the Department of Trade and Industry has decided to invest in the area and its development, would it be in order for it to steer the Department of the Environment towards having another look at infrastructure developments in development areas? For example, the Forest of Dean district council is sitting on about £2 million of frozen capital assets. Could they be unlocked for specific projects relating to infrastructure development? No further borrowing would be required and it would be an excellent way to use the money locally. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would answer that point when he replies.

Today is a good day for the Forest of Dean. The national recognition of our problems is a great encouragement to the district, which has already done much locally to help itself. With these extra funds, much more can be done. I should like to assure you, Mr. Speaker, and all hon. Members that every penny will be spent wisely.

Mr. Gareth Wardell (Gower): In the first quarter of last year the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs, of which I am privileged to be Chairman, examined the impact of regional industrial policy on Wales as a response to the Government's White Paper on regional industrial development. The conclusions and recommendations were based on the wider spectrum of opinion in Wales. It was clearly established that, while there was room for substantial savings by more cost-effective regional aid, a continuing commitment to regional policy would mean that the savings should be used to make more generous provision. The Committee recommended, for example, that assisted area status should be given to the whole of the Principality.

The Welsh Trades Union Congress, the Welsh Confederation of British Industry, local authorities and Government agencies are all dismayed at these measures. The consensus is that they have nothing to do with regional policy. Public expenditure cuts are the real motive behind them.

There is a desperate need for an effective regional policy for Wales. We need to attract foreign and British investment that will bring jobs and economic regeneration. Whereas nationally before 28 November 1984 special development area and development area status aid used to cover 22 per cent. of the working population, it will now cover only 15 per cent. in SDAs in Wales. Development area status aid used to cover 90 per cent. of the working population but has been cut to 35 per cent. That is a savage reduction and makes nonsense of the Minister's recent answer:

"Wales has been treated fairly." — [Official Report, 28 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 941.]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): I do not understand the hon. Gentleman's comment because approximately 90 per cent. of the working population of Wales are still within the areas covered by the regional assistance package.

Mr. Wardell: I understand the point of the Secretary of State, but there has been a massive shift from those areas that qualified for a high rate of assistance towards intermediate area status, which does not qualify for regional development grant.

Bridgend has lost its special development area status and has been deflated to intermediate area status. Other new intermediate areas that have lost their development area status include Swansea, Llanelli, south-west Dyfed, Cardiff, Newport and western Gwynedd. Most of those are the large areas of population in the Principality.

Former SDAs relegated to an inner tier category will have their capital grant cut from 22 per cent. to 15 per cent. That tier will carry an additional burden. Any firm employing fewer than 200 people — the majority of Welsh firms—will be limited to a job grant of £3,000 for each new job created. It is interesting to note that, in evidence to the Welsh Select Committee, the Welsh Development Agency set the appropriate and reasonable figure at £15,000 — a factor of five greater than the Government's figure. The figure is miserly in the extreme, especially when one remembers that it costs £6,000 a year to keep a person on the dole.

Even in those areas which will qualify for maximum regional assistance, aid is no longer automatic. A discretionary element has now been introduced, even into the formerly automatic regional development grant. Not only is it an increase in the centralisation of decision-making, which will complicate the forward financial planning of existing and prospective firms, but it leaves a tier open for further reductions in assistance.

Already there are delays in processing applications for aid, although the moratorium today may ease that. Yet the Government have not announced any plans to increase staffing levels in the Welsh Office and to invest to cope with administering the new layer of red tape.

The policy represents a 20 per cent. cut in the Welsh economy—a figure that will save £60 million this year. The pill is all the more unpalatable because the Government have no plans to redistribute that amount.

At present, land reclamation schemes totalling £100 million have been submitted by Welsh local authorities to the WDA. Many of the schemes are geared to potential industrial use, yet WDA funds for the schemes have been cut to £39 million over the next five years. Will the Government use some of that saved Welsh regional aid money to restore the cuts? It is recognised that a massive training programme to update workers' skills is needed. Will the Government divert part of the £300 million saved nationally into this sector? No. Instead they are planning to close successful skillcentres, such as the one in Llanelli, which serve my constituency of Gower.

Furthermore, despite the stated intention of the Secretary of State for Employment to extend the community programme scheme, he has just changed the qualifying criteria for the MSC scheme which is geared to the long-term unemployed. In all but name, it is a cut that will mean that fewer people are able to take advantage of the scheme, and that the number of people who will be eligible to use their work skills as instructors for retraining others will be drastically reduced. The Government could redistribute some of the saved money into this sector to extend job creation for the long-term unemployed.

If the Government win the battle with the miners, almost all Welsh pits will close.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Rubbish.

Mr. Wardell: NCB Enterprise Ltd. will be given another £5 million, which will mean a total budget of £10 million for job creation initiatives in what will become economically derelict communities. How much of the £300 million saved will be reinvested in the mining villages of Wales? The Government cannot sell this programme as a new regional policy. It flies in the face of the economic and social hardship being experienced by the Welsh people as a direct result of the Government's obsession with spending cuts——

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Rubbish.

Mr. Wardell: —and ignores the many measures that are needed to bring relief and to rebuild the Welsh economy.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): While my hon. Friend has been speaking, the Secretary of State for Wales has been shouting, "Rubbish". Could my hon. Friend clarify his statement about the closure of collieries in Wales?

Mr. Speaker: I should tell the hon. Gentleman that he has only one minute in which to do it.

Mr. Wardell: If my hon. Friend does not mind, I would rather continue my speech.

There is no effort in those measures to redistribute to other job creation and economic regeneration opportunities the £60 million a year that will be saved from regional aid. The Opposition believe that the change will be disastrous for Wales. It represents the death of regional policy, and I wonder whether all that the Government are saying is that this policy should rest in peace.

Sir John Osborn (Sheffield, Hallam): This debate must be taken in the context of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement on Monday, the debate on unemployment on Tuesday, and yesterday's debate on the rate support grant. It cannot be taken in isolation. My hon. Friend the Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson) mentioned the OECD. I should tell him that at the end of the month the Assembly of the Council of Europe will debate the economic position in Europe. That is an annual debate based on the OECD report. I am the rapporteur to that debate, and I have already sent a provisional draft of my report to my hon. Friend the Minister of State.

My contribution to the debate will be about Sheffield, which the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) visited recently. All countries suffer from regional disparities and "jobless" growth and often the differences within countries or regions are as great as those between them. In south Yorkshire, for example, as against the north of Yorkshire, unemployment is almost 17 per cent., and in Sheffield it is slightly more than 15 per cent. About 44,000 people from a population of half a million are out of work. Those appalling figures must burn on any Member of Parliament who represents such an area.

After a period of high unemployment, regional discrepancies become even more marked and society even more divided between those with a job and those without, and, increasingly, between north and south. That is why people who live in different areas perceive the present economic position so differently. We have heard that theme often in the Chamber this week.

The Government's new regional policy, announced in November and explained today, is one that I welcome greatly, because I believe that it will lead towards more cost-effective, selective and job-related policies. However, with my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland), I am prejudiced, because I welcome the fact that Sheffield has been granted intermediate area status, which will enable the city to qualify for assistance from the Government and from the European regional development fund, with which I was much concerned when I was a Member of the European Parliament. My anxiety is that the new status should be used properly.

Important though regional policy is, it is wrong to expect too much of it. Some of the criticism that the policy has encountered arises perhaps from false expectations. Today we debated the moratorium, but I have noted that regional policy capital investment decisions made by the Conservative Government more than 20 years ago on such projects as Llanwern and Ravenscraig, and some of the car factories in Scotland, could be described today as not the best way of using limited capital resources.

High costs of wages and—this is especially true of Sheffield—electricity can precipitate decline. That is certainly true of the Sheffield steel industry. The whole industry has lost 60 per cent. of its work force since 1979. The consequences of unemployment and poverty are tragic. The bishop of Sheffield, in a well-thought-out address to his diocesan synod in November, the full text of which he sent to me, was concerned about the north-south divide. He achieved publicity for inviting the Queen to the Doncaster races. The gap is bigger than it was 25 years ago, and that is a fact from which no Government can run away.

Self-help is also important. I have been associated with the Sheffield industrial mission and Mr. Peter Lee, who is chairman of a surviving steel firm, happens to have made one of several contributions of interest. In his paper, he said that there was no reason for long-term pessimism that the nation has an unsatisfied demand for goods and services and that there is a supply of people willing to work —a point that I reflected in my OECD report.

In previous debates, I have given my analysis of the decline in the Sheffield steel industry and of why, because of cheap energy and the availability of raw materials, the industry has moved elsewhere in the world. However, a fundamental start in Sheffield would be to have hope for the area. Far too often, all that we hear from Sheffield is gloom and doom. That is not the case. It will be a surprise to many to learn that the chamber of trade, with which I have been in touch this week, has reported a boom in the retail trade, with sales before Christmas 15 per cent. to 30 per cent. up on last year, and record January sales. That means that there is purchasing power in Sheffield. It must be recognised that living standards have increased—the statistics show that they have. The EC and the OECD state that, on average, people in Europe are better off than they were five or 10 years ago. The citizens of Sheffield have purchasing power, despite the fact that they live in a depressed region, and the Government are rightly keen that this be channelled to the right areas of development.

The trouble is that Sheffield city council has followed a path of high current expenditure at the expense of capital expenditure. The policy has been disastrous to local industry. Rates have soared, and the chamber of commerce has urged me to do something about it. That is why I supported the Rates Act 1984. Rates have also driven residents out of the city, and migration from the cities is probably the biggest cause of regional disparity in Britain today. A wrong attitude of the council towards intermediate area status could throw away an opportunity, as was highlighted in an article in the Financial Times this week.

There will soon be a debate on Heathrow, Stansted and Gatwick airport policy. I have received representations from the North of England Regional Consortium. Fifteen years ago, I would have resisted a large expansion at Stansted, because I favoured Maplin. In 1976, the Labour Government introduced the Maplin Development Authority (Dissolution) Act, and it was a Labour Government who turned their back on the channel tunnel —two examples of capital projects that could have kept people off the dole queues for the past seven or eight years. It is good regional policy to expand air traffic from and to the north. I hope that the Minister of State and the Secretary of State will consult my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and encourage him to increase flights to and from the north, which could well do more to help the area than would a regional policy such as the one outlined.

Today some Opposition Members asked for a debate on the coal strike. One tragedy is that Arthur Scargill, with the overt or covert support of Opposition Members—the demonstration in the Chamber today may have been an example, as was the appearance of the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) on the Welsh picket lines and even the support of Sheffield city council for the NUM —has chosen a strike for political ends. Steel workers have learned to their dismay that a strike today can only accelerate an appearance on the dole queue tomorrow. I hope that this will not be the case with the railwaymen.

The Labour party today, as exemplified by Opposition Members, has demanded from the Secretary of State a more active regional policy. They should consider the extent to which they are perhaps not so much destructive as lacking constructive opposition in their conduct and attitudes, particularly in an area like Sheffield. They are forcing the northern region to take two steps backwards for every step forward by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. John Forrester (Stoke-on-Trent, North): When the Government announced that they would review the regional aid programme, they got a lot of support. Many people acknowledged that there were weaknesses in the previous system. In some cases too much money had been given to capital-intensive industries, with little effect on employment. There was some job shuffling between areas to take advantage of grants, although it is difficult to see how this could be eliminated.

Now we have had the review, which took a long time in coming. The Government seem to have pleased very few people, unless one lives in the Forest of Dean, when obviously it is a great advantage. It may be acknowledged that there was some success with previous regional policy if employment in some areas improved sufficiently for them to be taken out of these proposals. If that is so, it is most regrettable and beyond comprehension that regional aid should be reduced from £700 million to £400 million per annum. The Minister must accept that there is growing disappointment at the fact that the Government have lost a great opportunity to take positive steps forward.

I hope that the percentage of the working population to be covered by regional aid, 35 per cent., is not immutable and that the Government will be open to persuasion that other areas have a good case for inclusion. For a number of years, it was increasingly clear that something dramatic was happening in the west midlands. I am pleased that the Government have recognised that, although there will obviously be arguments about the size of the area and the amount of aid. Early-day motion 265, in the name of some Conservative Members who live in the area, extols the virtue of Government proposals and refers to how successful they have been in this short time in getting industry interested. The Government should take note of that, accept its wisdom and logic and bring forward proposals for a wider and more generous approach to regional aid.

The Minister of State and the Secretary of State have said that when the maps were being re-drawn, present and future employment prospects were taken into account. Forecasting the future can be a hazardous occupation, as any betting man will confirm. I cannot recall that during the 1979 general election today's level of unemployment was forecast by anyone in any party. The forecast can be only a rough guide. There will be local hiccups, some of which will be beneficial, while others will be disastrous.

To make a constituency point, in Stoke-on-Trent last week we suffered one of those disasters. The Michelin tyre company has announced 2,400 redundancies, with no time for alternatives; most of the people must be out of work by the end of April. In December 1984 unemployment in the Stoke travel-to-work area was 12·4 per cent. These redundancies will put the figure up to 13·6 per cent. and the knock-on effect will take it to at least 14·4 per cent.

Stoke has had one of the fastest-growing unemployment rates in the country. Between 1979 and 1984 it rose by 173 per cent. against the national average of 140 per cent. In the city 45 to 47 per cent. have been unemployed for more than a year. The national average is 39 per cent. In some wards unemployment is nearly 20 per cent. Stoke-on-Trent is a typical old industrial area with too narrow an industrial base, depending on pottery, coal, steel and tyres. Over the past few years, we have lost nearly 30,000 jobs in those four industries. Nor does the city have any soft cushion of expanding service industries, because 48 per cent. of the working population are in service industries, against an average of 60 per cent. nationally.

The unemployment rate must be a major factor in deciding the amount of regional aid, but the infrastructure of an area is also a vital component. It will determine the ability of the area to attract new industries. Areas which have not experienced centuries of coal mining cannot understand how much underground dereliction there has been and the additional cost associated with any kind of building work, to guard against subsidence.

If a manufacturer learns that, as has happened in Stoke, a factory has subsided by 21 ft in 60 years or that a new factory has fallen by 12 in in one year and that it costs £60 per square metre to compensate for the possibility of subsidence when building a factory, then, all other things being equal, he is bound to think about going to an area which would not have those problems.

We are fortunate in having been chosen to host the 1986 national garden festival, which will take place on the site of the old steelworks. Without Government assistance that area would not have been reclaimed in this century. Even if the local authority had tried to find the money, I am sure it would have fallen foul of the rates legislation, which seems to change from day to day. Even in the Forest of Dean apparently councils cannot spend their own money on improving their infrastructure.

From the war to the recession, industries have been positively discouraged from coming to Stoke-on-Trent so as to maintain the labour force for the pottery and coal mining industries. That attitude might have been valid at the time but if such decisions are taken in the national interest, then when times are hard the Government have a moral responsibility to do something to help. By all accounts the decision on Stoke's appeal for regional assistance was marginal. I hope that the Government will accept that there is a new situation and that the case put forward by Stoke is beyond dispute.

Apart from the possible social consequences of decay and neglect, it is folly to allow old industrial areas to die a slow death. If the infrastructure is tatty and needs modernising, let us remember that those communities have evolved over the last 300 or 400 years. One cannot recreate on a green field site the qualities of stability of the people, the good sense and skill of the work force, and the commitment of workers and management alike to an area.

It is the Government's job to assist in repairing the damage to the old industrial areas of this city by providing a springboard for the city to advance into the future. We are not seeking charity or a meal ticket for life; we are asking for assistance now so that we can work out our own destiny.

7.9 pm

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): I am delighted to be the first speaker from the north-east to be called in this debate, because no region has seen more clearly than the north-east the failing of regional policy as practised by successive Governments. Year after year, our region has received between 20 per cent. and 30 per cent. of the resources made available in regional aid. Year after year, the decline in employment opportunities and the imbalance in our industrial infrastructure have continued. There has been a continued lack of home-grown entrepreneurship.

I applaud the White Paper and the background paper "Some Economic Issues" for widening the understanding of the failings of previous regional policy, for setting out the enormous costs of subsidising capital projects and for showing the statistical difficulty of calculating the cost of secondary employment lost elsewhere through high taxes and demonstrating the uncertainty that exists about whether the projects that were backed would have been located in those regions anyway.

There is now a recognition of those failings not just among industrialists and academics but among some surprising commentators. My hon. Friend the Minister might be interested to learn that Harry Meed, a commentator for The Northern Echo—by no means a Conservative paper, and usually a fiercely independent critic of the Government—said in an article about the Minister's statement in November headed "Cash move in right direction":

"the Government is surely right in claiming that most of the schemes now receiving grant support, like ICI's new £30m nitric acid plant at Billingham (ten jobs) would go ahead anyway.

Extra jobs for the future are unlikely to be created by the industries now mopping up the scarce Government cash. But most people will ultimately recognise that the Government's shift in policy is not merely correct but long overdue. At £35,000 for every new job created, the industrial-aid bonanza just had to stop."

That leaves the Labour party alone as the defender of the old system. It makes a pretty strange defender of some of the capital projects that have been backed in the past. The defenders of regional policy say only that the decline in our industrial areas might have been faster without the regional aid that has gone into them. In the meantime, the cost of £35,000 per job—the average cost of previous regional policy—to create jobs in some industries is paid for by other industries, including service industries, and other areas.

If my hon. Friends complain that other regions in the United Kingdom subsidise the north-east, I might well reply that Darlington is an intermediate area which in the past has subsidised the special development and development areas elsewhere in the north-east region.

The new policy will benefit my constituents in Darlington, first because the cost to Darlington taxpayers will be reduced, leaving firms in Darlington more to invest in our own area; secondly, because service industries in the north-east are to be included for the first time—that is a significant development in a region like ours which has been dominated by heavy industries — and, thirdly because we have retained our assisted intermediate area status, which will allow us to receive selective assistance of the kind that has benefited us well in the past and will continue to enable us to attract European investment and regional development fund money. I am grateful to the Government for recognising our case.

Criticism of the Government's changes has been ill-judged and, in the case of the chairman of the development committee of Darlington borough council, has been wrong. He was wrong to say that the policy means less aid. For a town like Darlington it will mean more money on the selective side. He was wrong to say that the policy will mean fewer opportunities, because hundreds more companies throughout the north-east in the service sector will become eligible for the first time. He was wrong to say that Darlington will lose to other parts of the north-east. It has always been true that a district such as Darlington has not done as well under these regional subsidies as other parts of the north-east. You, particularly, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will know that other parts of the north-east have been hit much harder by the imbalance in our industrial infrastructure and the recession.

Darlington has a responsibility for Shildon, to name but one area. It is right for more aid to go to where it is needed most. I am surprised that, of all people, a Socialist councillor, such as the chairman of my development committee, does not recognise that fact.

On balance, the Government have got it right. I welcome the switch from automatic to selective assistance —a switch in emphasis at least. I welcome the switch from capital projects to job creation. I congratulate my hon. Friends in the Department on their skill in ensuring that such a large area of the country is still eligible for European help and that that area is larger than it was.

It would be idle to suggest that £300 million, or even £3 billion, will restore the north-east to prosperity. In many ways, the best regional policies are the Government's general economic policies. The best regional policies include the policy of keeping the lid on inflation, and that is worth far more in financial terms to companies, industry and people in the north-east than regional development grants. The best regional policies include the policy of switching support from the loss-making old industries under the Department's budget to the new technology industries and to smaller businesses. That is worth more in financial terms to the north-east than regional development grants.

Our task in the north-east in bringing jobs into the region and in creating more jobs there is simply to make the north-east more attractive than any other region. That is the only reason why companies will come into and grow in the north-east. Instead of spreading doom and gloom about the region, as the series of reports by the North of England County Councils Association does, local authorities should start to guarantee lower rates than elsewhere. When Middlesbrough rates companies at £2·30 in the pound as against Mole Valley's rate of £1·64 in the pound, when Stockton rates companies at £2·13 in the pound as against Slough's rate of £1·52 in the pound and when Darlington imposes the highest rate in the county of Durham at £1·97 in the pound as against Bracknell's rate of £1·52 in the pound, is it any wonder that companies go on locating in the Thames valley and the south-east rather than in the counties of Cleveland and Durham?

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fallon: I am sorry. I shall not give way because I want to keep strictly to the ten-minute limit.

Instead of draining £350 million a year in rates away from business in the north-east it is time local authorities asked themselves why they have the highest proportion of council housing in the country—higher even than in the Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia—at 41 per cent. That is the highest proportion of public housing in England. What is the point of spending all those millions of pounds subsidising council housing and public transport and giving the unemployed cheap rented houses and free passes on the buses but not giving them jobs? Through local authority policies, other constituents in the north-east are becoming trapped in unemployment on huge council estates — away from the jobs to which they wish to move.

Trade unions and management in the north-east must do more to reduce the cost of labour. They must do so not simply by tackling demarcation, excessive overtime and the restrictive practices that have increased the cost of labour and kept other people out of work, but by looking again at the wages they pay. It is no accident that the most heavily unionised region in England has the highest unemployment. Ten years ago, the north-east had the highest average male earnings outside London and the south-east in the United Kingdom, and that remains true today.

If I have one regret about the debate on the White Paper it is that there was not more discussion on the extent to which wage flexibility might be encouraged to restore some of the imbalance in employment opportunities that the rest of the Government's policy seeks to reduce.

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) will understand if I do not comment on his speech.

The Secretary of State, in opening the debate, proved conclusively that he had not the slightest inkling of the real nature of the problem. In view of that, I suppose that we cannot really expect him to come up with a solution. To be fair, it has to be said that his predecessors have not come up with a solution either. The difference is that the Secretary of State is going to make it worse.

The purpose traditionally of regional policy has been to try to iron out the regional imbalances in the level of economic activity. It has to be said that, measured against that objective, regional policy has failed miserably ever since it was introduced. The differential in unemployment levels between the most prosperous and least prosperous areas of Britain is still much the same as it was except, of course, that the totals have enormously increased at each end of the scale. In my constituency, which I quote merely as an example, the unemployment level for at least the last 20 years has been about one and a half times the national average or more. When the national figure was 4 per cent., in Rotherham it was 6 per cent. Now that the national average is about 12 or 13 per cent., in Rotherham it is 21 per cent. Nobody can pretend that our past policies or existing policies have narrowed the gap.

Rotherham has been an assisted area since 1966. I make that point to show that our existing policies have certainly not solved the problem. I accept that the position would have got much worse had we not been an assisted area, and I certainly do not urge the Secretary of State to take away our status. However, I am saying that a policy which is based solely on the idea of giving financial inducements to persuade somebody to build a factory in one place rather than another has manifestly not solved the problem that we are debating. It does not work.

There is therefore, in my view, an obvious need for a complete reappraisal of regional policy now, yet in spite of that the Government do not take this opportunity. All they can suggest as they stand at the bedside of a desperately sick patient is, "Keep taking the tablets but do not take quite as many as you did before and do not take them in the same place."

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): There is rather a restricted list, too.

Mr. Crowther: There is indeed a restricted list, as the hon. Gentleman points out.

There must be no doubt, as my hon. Friends have pointed out, that the sole object of the changes announced on 28 November is not to make the policy more effective, but only to make it cheaper. I cannot understand why the Government should think that it is so desperately important to save £300 million in two or three years' time when that same Government have now been shown on the information which emerged only last week to have lost £4,000 million of the taxpayers' money on the sale of British Telecom. Are they getting their priorities slightly wrong somewhere?

I suggest that there is a need to re-examine not only the operation of regional policy but the philosophy that underlines it. Twenty years ago when the present regime of regional assistance came in, in about 1965, the object was to spread economic prosperity. At that time there were regions of the country which were grossly overheated. That was all right at the time, but today there is precious little prosperity to be spread.

In my view, a new regional policy needs to be developed which is an integral part of a national policy for economic regeneration. I refer to the economy here as meaning the real economy which is based on the production of goods and services and not simply moving money around in the City of London. The new policy needs to be based on bringing back into the service of the nation that great pool of skill and experience which is now lying on the waste heaps of unemployment.

In my own region of Yorkshire and Humberside, 13 or 14 years ago I helped with other people to set up the Yorkshire and Humberside development association. I was the chairman of it for some years before coming into the House. The Government, to their credit, are giving substantial financial help to that association in its efforts to promote the region overseas, as, indeed, they give help to other regional associations in other parts of the country.

The same Government who spend hundreds of thousands of pounds on helping regional associations to try to persuade industrialists in Japan, United States or Scandinavia to come and build their factories in Britain are quite happy to allow billions of pounds worth of capital to be exported from the country every year, creating jobs by the thousands in other parts of the world. I see a total inconsistency in this — in fact, the inconsistency is breathtaking.

For two centuries the Yorkshire and Humberside region made a massive contribution to the wealth of the country through its traditional industries—textiles and clothing, steelmaking, engineering, fishing, coal mining and agriculture—and in every one of those industries there has been a huge drop in the number of job opportunities over the past 10 to 20 years. I will not go through a lot of statistics; I mention only one. In the manufacturing industries in the Yorkshire and Humberside region in 1974 there were 764,000 jobs and by the middle of last year that number had dropped to 514,000—a loss of one third of the jobs in manufacturing. Those have not been replaced, of course, because of the failure of regional policies. That is the problem that we face.

I shall certainly not—and it would not be right for me to do so — go through the arguments that were advanced by my hon. and right hon. Friends in the debate in the House on Tuesday. But it is proper to mention that, if there were a plan for economic recovery in the country based on using the construction industry as the spearhead, which is what we were talking about on Tuesday, there would necessarily be a major regional dimension in such a policy because it happens that many of the areas with the greatest needs for investment in housing and other capital projects are also the areas with the highest levels of unemployment and the greatest potential for development. That is the kind of policy that we now need to be developing.

What I seek is a positive regional policy, not a negative one aimed solely at alleviating the misery. I believe that the Government today should be announcing the establishment of development agencies in the English regions and a massive programme of investment in those regions so that once again areas like my own and many more which are now suffering serious deprivation and unemployment could take their part in making this country once again a great industrial nation.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): If ever there was an example of the positive way in which the Government have responded, in the words of the motion, to a

"closer alignment of the new Assisted Areas map to areas' relative needs for increased employment opportunities",

I would say that my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Department of Trade and Industry need look no further than my constituency and the metropolitan borough of Bury. I want to devote my remarks to the impact of regional policy on my constituency, because I think that what I have to say shows an interesting history and, indeed, that the Government are willing to listen to representations that are made to them.

In the past Bury was eligible for regional assistance, but, for reasons which are beyond me, it was withdrawn some years ago. As a result, the town, its commerce and employment prospects suffered immediately. Bury suffered not just because there was no longer any Government aid for projects, however worthwhile, or because it no longer had access to European funds, but probably because that there was a feeling of fundamental unfairness and injustice.

That feeling of injustice and unfairness stemmed directly from the fact that all the surrounding areas—Manchester, Rochdale and, in particular, Bolton, all constituent parts of Greater Manchester—were eligible for assisted area status in some form. As a result, because Greater Manchester is so closely interlinked with good travel facilities and communications, it became difficult, despite a local authority which pursued a policy of encouraging new business, particularly with its low rating policy, to tempt new business into the area and away from surrounding authorities.

An undoubted wrong therefore needed to be righted. If final proof of that were required, the recent publication of figures that showed an increase to over 17 per cent. in the level of unemployment in the travel-to-work area set the seal on it.

Local business opinion felt strongly that although it was more than content with and confident in its ability to compete with all comers, it was impossible to compete on such unfair terms. The community was outraged at the fact that the town remained an island in a sea of more advantaged areas. Therefore, my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) and I, helped tremendously by the local authority, the local business community and the trade unions, put the case to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I appreciate, following the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland), that this may seem like the Minister's benefit match—I am sorry that he is not here—but I wish to pay tribute to his considerable patience, interest and, above all, understanding of the problems that I have outlined. The fact that he was a former pupil at Bury grammar school may have helped, but he saw the justice of our case.

The decision which was announced in the House on 28 November, which included the restoration of assisted area status for my constituency and the town which is part of it, was good news, because it recognised, after the unfairness that I have mentioned, that the constituency, with its over-dependence upon the paper industry and other traditional manufacturing industries of the north-west, was a classic case for some form of help.

I appreciate that, whenever one area receives assistance and others do not there is bound to be—my remarks have emphasised this—an element of unfairness. It is impossible to remove all inconsistencies, but the Government have tried to do that by their announcement. They have succeeded in many instances, and the fact that they have succeeded in the case of Bury has been received with considerable gratitude and relief in my constituency.

The people whom I represent undoubtedly have the skills, enterprise, energy and, above all, determination to succeed in the job of reviving their community. To adapt Churchill's words, they have now been given some of the tools by my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Department of Trade and Industry. For that reason, I shall have no hesitation in supporting the Government in the Lobbies tonight.

7.37 pm

Mr. Jack Thompson (Wansbeck): I am sorry to see that the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) has left the Chamber, because he and I represent constituencies in the north-east of England. The hon. Gentleman and one of his colleagues have been critical of a document produced by the North of England County Councils Association. He said that nothing happened in the northern region in the time of either the Labour or Tory Governments in the 1960s and 1970s. I know that, like me, he received the document on the morning that he made a press statement about it. He could not have had the opportunity to read it in depth or study its implications.

I shall quote a significant part of the document which is important for the north:

"Regional policy has been highly successful in the past. The Northern Region Strategy Team estimated that over the decade to 1973 Regional Policy generated some 50,000 more jobs in manufacturing industries in the North than might otherwise have been expected."

That shows the significance of the programme that was established in the 1960s and carried through to the early part of the 1970s for the north of England.

During the time that I have been involved in pursuing the interests of the north as a Member of the House, as a representative of my county council, as a member of the executive body of NECCA and for the past six years a member of the Northumbria water authority, one thread has run through all the reaction to Government regional policies. I can define it in one word—"inconsistency". Year by year attempts by industry and local authorities to take advantage of the meagre and reduced support given to the regions suffering long-term decline have been constantly frustrated by significant changes in regional aid. The lack of confidence in regional policy because of that constant tinkering has been reflected in the attitude of potential sources of employment planning to expand, locate or relocate in peripheral areas such as the north-east. Industrialists who have responded to the challenge to locate on a site qualifying for aid and setting up programmes for development and production are faced with a change in the rules which affects their ability to overcome the initial problems of starting or expanding their businesses. That is reflected in the November statement and even more so by the moratorium.

Before my election to the House I was leader of Northumberland county council and I had the opportunity to consult many industrialists in the north of England and not just in my community. Some were long-established in the region and some were enthusiastic newcomers. They generally all expressed the same view—they appreciated the enormous help given by local authorities but there was, and still is, a lack of confidence in long-term planning because of the constant changes in regional assistance which are usually to their detriment. I am sure that after today's announcement about the moratorium they will be sitting again with their calculators, computers and pieces of paper trying to work out what grants will be available from midnight tonight if they catch the last post.

Selected public expenditure figures for the United Kingdom covering regional specific measures were down from £1,065 million in 1978-79 to £715 million in 1984-85. Industrial measures fell from £3,351 million in 1978-79 to £1,886 million in 1984-85. Those years, 1978-79 to 1984-85, reflect a connection between the attitudes of the present Government and what actually occurred.

The reduction coincided with reduced opportunity for local government to increase its contribution to the improved infrastructure, to give direct assistance to job creation and to help with the expansion of the industrial base of their communities because of the penal rate support grant policies pursued since 1979.

I have been directly involved in that aspect as a member of a county council. I have witnessed the deterioration of the infrastructure of my county, and the local authority has been unable to do much about it. I congratulate local authorities on the splendid job they have done, taking account of the dramatic reduction in rate support grant.

My region is the one I know best and, from my experience there, I direct the attention of hon. Members to a fundamental issue which arises because my views conflict strongly with those of the Government. My hon.

Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) mentioned this aspect. During the first industrial revolution, many thousands of people moved about the north of England, taking up work in the expanding industries of coal mining, heavy engineering, shipbuilding and steel making. The Tyne, Wear, Northumberland and Durham became famous for those industries, basically because of the availability of raw materials and the inventive skills of the northerners.

The north of England during that period was a major producer of wealth for Britain. Indeed, it can rightly be claimed that the foundations of the present economic structure of the nation was strongly based on the rich seams of coal and iron ore and the skills in heavy engineering and shipbuilding of that era. My hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham made a similar point relating to Yorkshire and Humberside. What he said did not conflict with what I have said, because the area to which he referred was basically the north.

Since the second world war, the changing face of the economy has created a virtual vacuum in the north, although there is strong evidence that that sad state of affairs need not have arisen had different central Government policies been pursued, including those of former Labour Governments.

The fundamental difference between the situation in the 19th century and first half of the 20th century and now is that today there is less need for workers to move to other areas for jobs. In other words, it is not necessary these days for me to get on my bike. There is more opportunity for jobs to move to people. However, this requires a degree of national planning and regional organisation, and they have been sadly lacking in the Government's policies.

I have time and again quoted an example from my constituency — it is probably the best example of a development anywhere in Britain — of co-operation between Government, private industry, nationalised industries and local authorities. A company known worldwide, Alcan Aluminium, decided in the 1960s to come to Britain. It wanted to establish a smelter in this country. There were extensive discussions between the Labour Government of the day, local authorities and others, and the company decided to establish at a place named Lynemouth in my constituency. That smelter is now one of the most productive units in Alcan's international activities. It sets a standard for the company's other production units.

In no way could Northumberland be associated with the aluminium industry before Alcan came on the scene. All we knew of aluminium was as a component part of pots and pans and as used in parts of aircraft during the last war. Today, aluminium is an important industry in my constituency, employing 1,100 people. The majority of them, working in Alcan's plant, have been retrained from other work, and I am told by the management that the factory supports perhaps 5,000 other jobs in the area.

We want to see more of that type of development in the north. It has happened to a degree, a recent example being Nissan. The local authorities had more influence on Nissan coming to the north-east than any other factor, and I congratulate the North of England County Councils Association. I was involved at the time when the five northern counties—all Labour-controlled, incidentally—got together and decided which two sites to put forward to Nissan. The chosen site was in Sunderland. That type of regional planning should be provided by the region. It is an example of what can be achieved by planning.

I appreciate that we must have change, but some of the changes affecting local authorities are extremely worrying. My local county council has in recent years, because of circumstances, established an employment committee. It has invested in a business centre, supported by the two district councils in the south-east of the county, and the result has been the setting up of the south-east Northumberland enterprise trust, which has been officially opened today.

That reflects not only the efforts being made in Northumberland but those taking place in Durham, Cumbria, Cleveland and Tyne and Wear, though the Tyne and Wear area is likly to disappear, and that, too, will have a serious effect on the north.

I recall being in discussion with a Minister at the Department of Employment some years ago. At that time we in the north were advised to pull ourselves up by our own bootstraps. In those days we did not even have bootstraps. We have them today and we are pulling ourselves up by them. But we need help and support from the Government. We need a democratic regional body and, more especially, we need a Minister responsible specifically for the north.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): It must be right that regions with high rates of unemployment and derelict industries cannot be left to languish. Some attempt must be made to iron out the imbalances in employment and industrial dereliction in those regions.

Some of my hon. Friends claim that regional assistance simply results in the movement of jobs from one constituency to another, but I do not accept that that is necessarily the case. Indeed, even if it were, it is no reason for not having a regional policy. Social consideratiions must play a part and it is particularly important that regions which have suffered a rapid and substantial decline in older and heavier industries should have effective regional assistance such as the Government are proposing in their new policy. That assistance can produce viable economic activity. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) that such activity is, however, dependent on the national economy being in such a state that it can occur.

What is rapid decline and what regions come within that definition? It will help to answer that question if hon. Members consider the circumstances that apply in my constituency. The decline there has been rapid and substantial and to a large extent it undermined the economy of the region. The travel-to-work area of my constituency reflects that process in terms of unemployment and industrial decline. I suggest that the travel-to-work areas must be the building blocks on which our policy is constructed.

This is a happy evening for me, because I am able to thank the Government for converting my constituency into a region with the most beneficial grants available, remembering that we in south Humberside are not in Scotland or Wales. We do not have a tedious lobby taking up the time of the House once a month. We do not have bodies such as the Welsh and Scottish Development Agencies. We do not have the time allocated to those vociferous areas.

[Mr. Richard Hickmet]

At one time Scunthorpe employed more than 20,000 men making steel. It was a boom town. Massive investment took place in the 1970s. But it was a one-industry town. Since then, the steel industry has faced problems of over-capacity both at home and abroad and between 1981 and 1983 11,000 men were put out of work in my constituency. I invite any of my hon. Friends who doubt the need for regional pc cy to drive past the steelworks that was closed. The consequences of that closure for the economic viability of the region, for employment and for the industrial base were severe indeed.

That region needs assistance. When limited resources are available to Ministers, judgments have to be made as to where assistance should go. I am bound to say, no doubt partly because it involves my constituency, that if any part of the country deserves assistance it is the steel closure areas of Scunthorpe, Corby, and so on. I welcome the decision of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to give us development area status. I am also grateful for the assistance given to me and to the deputation that I brought to the Minister, when two authorities of different political persuasions buried the political hatchet and put their case together most effectively. If the regions with development area status are to market themselves successfully they must bury their political differences. They will be far more successful if the political parties co-operate.

In my constituency we now have three enterprises, with all the benefits and incentives that they offer to industrialists. In addition, we are eligible for European regional development fund grants to improve our infrastructure and for non-quota ERDF funds to assist industry, as well as cheap loans from the European coal and steel fund to assist investment. A substantial factory-building programme has been undertaken by English Industrial Estates. I believe that south Humberside is now in a position to broaden its industrial base and gradually to attract investment.

Regional assistance must be cost-effective and I welcome the Government's decision to encourage investment in job-creating enterprises such as the service sector. There must be no more Sullom Voes. My constituency needs jobs. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to bear in mind the effect that some other Departments have on the efforts of his Department and of local agencies to achieve those jobs. We have constant problems with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food over our proposals to develop the Trentside wharves because grade 1 industrial land is involved. We have to persuade the Department of Transport of our eligibility for freight facilities grant. We have to persuade the Department of the Environment that we are eligible for derelict land grant. When all those grants are available for regions such as mine, there is a clear case for some kind of co-ordination.

I have no doubt that there is a bright future for my constituency. Goodness knows, it has waited long enough to see the light at the end of the tunnel. I therefore welcome the Government's decision in terms of general regional policy. Although south Humberside has no Minister in the Cabinet and is not entitled to a day a month of parliamentary time, the needs of the region have at long last been recognised. I am grateful for that and I believe that a bright future awaits us.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): The hon. Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Thompson) was clutching at straws when he referred to the advantages of having a territorial Minister. As a Scot, representing a country which has such a Minister, I should warn the hon. Gentleman off that prospect. When decisions have been taken by the Government, the Scottish Office has proved utterly impotent and ineffective. It certainly has not defended Scotland in any way at all. There are two reasons for that. First, the Secretary of State for Scotland is a minority of one in the Cabinet. He can be, and no doubt was, outvoted with regard to the moratorium announced today. Secondly, the Barnett formula limits growth in the Scottish Office to that of the comparable United Kingdom Department. In other words, it has very little power, so the hon. Gentleman should beware of that solution.

The hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) referred to the "tedious" Scottish and Welsh lobbies. As one who has to feature in them, I find them equally tedious. We should be far better off with our own Government and Parliament, able to take decisions sympathetic to the needs of our nation without having to explain them to people who know nothing and care less about our country. I assure hon. Members that neither forming part of a tedious lobby for the north of England nor having a territorial Minister to whom the tedious representations may be made would bring much advantage.

Strangely enough, in the current cold snap the south of England obtained the additional social security benefits of which the Scots have been deprived in the past. That just about sums up the political decision-making behind the changes in regional policy. The west midlands and one or two other areas, represented in glowing terms by distinguished new Members who came to the House after the last election and who are worried about keeping their seats, have received the benefits. To provide those benefits for the Conservative party, £100 million has been taken from Scotland and £60 million from Wales. Those moneys are to be transferred to the areas that the Government believe will be the cockpits of British policy in the future. In the decaying society of the United Kingdom where money is short, it is made available to those who will benefit politically—that is, the Conservative party.

The Secretary of State rightly referred to the role of multinational companies which sometimes come in where they can obtain the most cash, pocket the money and leave when times get hard. That is very much like the Government's policy. As the United Kingdom's economy goes down the plughole, money becomes short, public expenditure constraints are imposed, and money is taken from the periphery in the hope of sustaining the central core. Those are party political decisions, and they should be recognised as such.

I take exception, too, to the Secretary of State's analysis of regional policy as being social rather than economic, although I accept at once that regional policy is no substitute for relevant economic policy. When the regional aid schemes were developed and refined in the 1960s, part of the objective was to achieve economic regeneration when the national economy and the stop-go policy applied from the centre discouraged activity at the periphery when things were cold. National policies at that time thus benefited the overheated regions but did not affect the north of England, Scotland or Wales.

Unemployment in the small countries of Europe is between 4 and 6 per cent. That is the standard upon which we should set our sights. We should not just complain that unemployment exceeds 13, 14, 15 or even 20 per cent. It is a sign of how bad things have become when we are prepared to accept unemployment rates which none of us would have accepted a few years ago.

During his speech the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said that industrial policy costs money and that, in a few years' time, he will save £300 million. He appears to hold the implicit view that regional policy amounts to no more than a row of nuts—that is social rather than industrial or economic aid.

The Government spend about £17,000 billion on defence. Scotland, however, receives less than 5 per cent. of defence expenditure. Therefore, Scotland loses out. Most of that money is spent upon the betterment of the south and the midlands. Too little attention is paid to defence expenditure in Scotland. Mr. Peter Balfour, the chairman of the Scottish Council (Development and Industry), said:

"Recent events have given the impression that higher education and regional industrial policy do not comprehend the needs of adjusting our industrial and commercial activities to the changing requirements of the market place."

There is deep dissatisfaction in Scotland — in industry, the trade unions and local authorities—about the changes that the Government have made. Scotland has suffered 30 per cent. of the cash cuts. It is not as though Scotland is a net debtor. If Scotland were an independent country, it would receive at least £11,000 million or perhaps £12,000 million in oil revenues. That is an expression of the deep ingratitude that is shown by the present Government towards Scotland. Members of Plaid Cymru have asked me to say that they will develop their own arguments about Wales in the Welsh Grand Committee, but that they take great exception to the huge cuts that will be suffered by Wales. There is controversy about the applicability of European grants to Wales and to Scotland. I hope that the Minister will say something about that matter.

The forecasts are that Scotland could lose up to half a million people during the next 25 years. That is not just the result of a drop in the birth rate; it is the sign of the gross ill health of our economy. Emigration is the surest possible sign that an economy is not doing well. I would point out to the Minister with responsibility for industry in Scotland that his Department has betrayed Scotland and the Scottish economy. It is supposed to protect them, but it does not. One of the slogans during the radical rebellions of 1820 was "Scotland free or a desert." We are reaching the stage where, without a change in Government policy, Scotland will be an industrial and economic desert. That is why the Scottish National party campaigns vigorously for a Scotland that, like other small countries in Europe, will be free and prosperous.

8.4 pm

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Like many Members, I suppose that I ought to be here tonight with a begging bowl because I represent part of a travel-to-work area which has the highest unemployment rate but which is not in receipt of assistance. However, I believe that we have sufficient natural assets in our harbours and coastline and in our proximity to the continent to be able to sort out our own problems and to create the new jobs that the area undoubtedly needs. To that end, the East Kent economic development group, an entirely private body that is backed by the county council, will achieve a great deal. However, we cannot do so with one hand tied behind our backs.

I am not asking for advantage. Equally, we cannot succeed if we are to be disadvantaged. Because of the assistance that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry gave me in a skirmish in the midlands a couple of years ago, he knows that I have always believed that regional aid does not, in the long term, create jobs. It simply moves jobs from A to B. So long as south Wales, Liverpool and the north-east offer attractions which other areas do not offer, companies will move from my constituency, and others like it, to those areas.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) drew attention to the remarks that I made on 28 November. However, he wrongly believed that I was advocating specific projects for my constituency. I was not. I have always advocated sectoral aid. In that debate, my hon. Friend the Minister of State indicated that the salvation of my constituency was tourism and that the proper way to fund tourism was by means of section 4 grant assistance. I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. On that occasion he said that we in Thanet, North could do much to promote tourism. I believe that that is not the only future for Thanet, North. We shall certainly attract new industry too.

However, to take the point made by my hon. Friend, if one looks at grants under section 4, one sees that in the past jobs have been created under regional aid by means of the expenditure of about £30,000 to £35,000 per job. On 28 November, my hon. Friend indicated that the Government wished that figure to be reduced to about £10,000. Under section 4, a new job in the tourist industry is created for expenditure of £4,500. Roughly 50 times as much is spent on regional aid as is spent on section 4 aid. Under section 4, we make available just £8 million for the whole of the tourist industry in this country. We have heard that regional aid is projected to be £400 million and that it is currently more than £400 million. I ask my right hon. Friend to consider reallocating some of the money that is now spent on regional aid to the tourist sector and to reallocate it as sectoral aid under section 4. In terms of job creation, that money would certainly be more effective. I also ask my right hon. Friend to try to cut some of the red tape which surrounds the award of section 4 grant. That would be of enormous assistance.

If emphasis is to be placed upon service industries and upon grants under section 4, will the Government consider making a declaration that section 4 money is aid money? If the Government were to make such a declaration, we should be able to compete on at least equal terms for the European assistance that is so very readily available.

I endorse entirely the measures that have been taken by my right hon. and hon. Friends to reduce the waste in terms of the money that is spent on regional aid. I applaud the cut of £300 million that is to be made in regional aid if that money can be reallocated——

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The prosperous south-east is gloating again.

Mr. Gale: If the hon. Gentleman had been listening earlier, he would have heard that this particular part of the prosperous south-east has the highest unemployment in the country, apart from areas similar to his which are receiving assistance. That cut of £300 million would be well made if the money could be reallocated for a better purpose. I shall endorse that policy, as I shall endorse any policy which redirects money from capital expenditure under the old regional aid programme to sectoral aid and job creation.

8.10 pm

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): I am proud to speak for Birmingham and it will be noted in that city that not one Conservative Member from it is seeking to take part in the debate.

A brief circulated by the Regional Studies Association states:

"Regional disparities do not merely represent a 'social problem'; they involve the national economic interest".

If only the Secretary of State and his colleagues would understand that and stop treating the issue as something on the fringe of charity, how much better things would be.

There can be no proper economic recovery without the rebirth of the manufacturing capacity of Birmingham and the west midlands. The extension of aid to the service industry may help, but Britain has no proper economic future based purely or mainly on the service sector—taking in each other's washing, as the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) so rightly called it the other day. I assert the critical need for the renewal of our manufacturing base to safeguard our future.

Regional aid needs to be seen in a wider context—the spending by local authorities on housing, education, social services, and so on, because either that money creates jobs, or the absence of it destroys jobs. Under the Government less money means fewer jobs and poorer services in return for a doubling of the rates. It also has to be seen in the context of the state of the infrastructure of the region and the need for the repair, renewal and development of that.

In opening the debate the Secretary of State rightly said that we should ask what the policies do for jobs. I will tell him what they do for jobs in Birmingham. Second XI status for Birmingham, which is what we have, will do little or nothing to staunch the continuing loss of jobs in that great city. Unemployment in Birmingham is now one third higher than it was in 1979. In my constituency more than 7,000 people have been out of work for more than a year. Over the whole constituency, unemployment runs at 22 per cent. The Government deny jobs, hope and dignity to those people and to Birmingham in general.

Birmingham argued for development area status for its decaying inner city areas where up to 40 per cent. of people are jobless—areas such as Sparkbrook, Small Heath and Ladywood. The dangerous underlay in those inner city areas is that in many parts of them the ethnic communities make up around 50 per cent. of the population. For black and Asian youngsters in those parts of the city, leaving school almost certainly means immediately joining the dole queue.

During the argument over Birmingham and the west midlands the Government hid behind the new travel-to-work areas—boundaries which the Government revised. The new Birmingham travel-to-work area is a complete farce and brings the danger of sucking jobs out of the inner city areas to greenfield locations on its edges. However, I must say that the miserable assistance offered to Birmingham reduces that danger because it is so inadequate.

In Manchester the travel-to-work area for the purposes of regional aid has been split and there is nothing in the legislation to prevent the Government from treating Birmingham in the same way and to define parts of those inner city areas for full development aid on a local authority ward basis.

The Secretary of State also said that urban aid should be taken into account. Of course it should, but his hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) at the Department of the Environment made it clear a few days ago that under the Government urban aid next year in real terms will be cut by 4 per cent. Therefore, there is no joy in that.

Birmingham has been shabbily treated. Our job loss has been among the highest in the United Kingdom and it is near the top in the Common Market unemployment black list. The dole queue is still growing. That is why the city council, on an all-party basis, Members of Parliament and the Birmingham chamber of industry and commerce, got together to argue the case for better first-class treatment for the inner city area of Birmingham.

Will the Minister give serious consideration to five quick points, which will test how serious the Government are about wanting to assist Birmingham properly to get back into business?

Firstly, given the will, there is nothing to stop the Government deciding to give full development area status to certain inner city wards as defined on the basis of local authority boundaries.

Secondly, they can give some assistance to work of regional importance—the development of a convention centre in Birmingham and the rapid transport system, the upgrading of Birmingham airport, the improvement of the rail link to London and all that that means, and the improvement of roads to east coast ports.

Thirdly, they can establish a high-powered, dedicated, committed, knowledgeable task force for Birmingham to knock heads together, to slice through the red tape and to see that the money that is available is spent in the most effective way.

Fourthly, the Government can increase the urban aid programme fund, and fifthly, they can create a special local authority power related to grant-related expenditure assessment for economic development in the surrounding intermediate area.

Birmingham will judge the seriousness of the Government by their attitude to unemployment and by their response to those and other points which have been made on behalf of the city. I have no real faith in a positive response from the Government because they have demonstrated that they just do not care about people being forced into, and kept in, the dole queues. Already, the Minister's colleagues are trying to cut the throat of the West Midlands county council which fathered the west midlands enterprise board, which has a record of creating real jobs through its activities, not at £10,000 or £50,000 per job but at about £2,600 per job. The tragedy is that such an organisation cannot create enough jobs to make up for the large-scale losses in the manufacturing sector. None the less, the abolition of the West Midlands county council at least puts a question mark over the future activities of that board.

The Government have shown that they prefer to cut and destroy. I urge and plead with them to assist Birmingham to get back into business as a major manufacturing centre. That is what we are good at. We have been knocking metal about for a century and that is what we want and need to do if our battered city is ever to recover.

8.17 pm

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is well aware from correspondence that I have had with him, from debates in the House and from a delegation which I led to see him before the decision was made how I feel about the withdrawal of aid from my consituency.

Whatever objections my delegation might ultimately have had about the final decision, it is right that I should say that it appreciated the way in which it was dealt with. It is one thing to be given a decision which one does not like, but it is something to be given a decision by someone who is clearly on top of the issues with a grasp of the facts. I was told today—I have no knowledge of this myself—that there are Ministers who, when delegations are led to them, do not seem to have a grasp of the facts. That was not the position in this case.

I do not want to detain the House unduly by setting out the reasons why I object to what was done in my constituency. I have made my views on that known and there is no point in taking up time trying to urge the Government completely to change their policies to fit in with my views and predilections. However, the central problem with which we are dealing here, and the essential problem that affects my constituency, is that the principle of regional aid, as we are forced to operate it at the moment, rewards the profligate and, in the end, punishes the industrious. As long as we have a system that works primarily on the basis of unemployment statistics, without looking at why there is unemployment in that area, in the end the industrious areas are bound to suffer. It ill behoves Labour Members to refer to areas as regional deserts when vast amounts of public money have been poured into them through the years. For hon. Members to refer to their areas as regional deserts when in some cases they are nothing better than regional plug holes approaches cheek.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Scroungers, eh?

Mr. Nicholls: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is trying to intervene, but from the way in which he is making interjections it is clear that he has recently come from a place where he finds the company more convivial. If he wishes to make his own speech in due course, I am sure that we shall be delighted to hear him. In the meantime, if he will contain himself and not waste other Members' time, that will be of assistance to us.

Even if my hon. Friend the Minister does not agree with the way in which I have set out the dilemma in which my constituency finds itself, he will agree thus far—it was not Teignbridge's fault. If there was ever an example of an area using regional aid well, effectively and to the benefit of the community, Teignbridge was such an example. In saying that, I pay tribute to the work that the Teignbridge district council has done in putting a range of schemes together.

If my hon. Friend the Minister agrees with that and he agrees that Teignbridge cannot be held at fault for what happened to it, it must be clear that he and I will be united on another point. If anything can be done in the ambit of the policy on which the Government have decided to mitigate the effects that Teignbridge will suffer, that should appeal to my hon. Friend. Therefore, to that extent, and perhaps only to that extent, I can bring him glad tidings from the west country, because there is one obvious way in which Teignbridge and possibly other such constituencies can be assisted.

Transitional plans are available for European funds. The worst vice in the way in which the system works at the moment is that if an area loses national aid, it loses access to European funds as well. The transitional arrangements have two basic ingredients. First, the application has to be made within the next four months, and, secondly, the majority of the expenditure concerned has to be made by 29 November 1985. Politics is the art of the possible. I suggest that to insist that applications should be made by the end of March is going a little too far. However, I concede that in many cases it might be possible to accelerate that application and to bring it within the transitional arrangements.

However, in the practical world in which we live, it is asking too much to insist on a concession that says that the majority of the expenditure has to be made within the year. The consequences of that were extremely well set out in a report prepared by the chief executive of the Devon county council and the property services manager, Mr. Macklin, and Mr. Smy, of the economic committee of the Devon county council. The report pointed out that, if that transitional arrangement is allowed to stand, in the next five years the west country will lose about £18,600,000 of European funds.

I can give one specific example from many possible examples. It concerns the Roadford reservoir. There cannot be one hon. Member who is not aware of the problems in the west country with the drought this summer and in 1976. Because we shall need access to European funds, the chances are that we shall lose about £9 million of European money to which we would otherwise be entitled. Perhaps, with creative accountancy, it would be possible to cobble something together and to say that most of the expenditure could be done by November 29. I do not know, but I doubt it. The position was summed up in the report to which I referred by a paragraph that read:

> "Such an extension would enable many important schemes to be completed and thus provide a basis of infrastructure upon which to attract inward industrial and commercial investment, and therefore job opportunities in the future."

I do not believe that those transitional arrangements were put in as mere window dressing. They were put in for a very good reason—because it was admitted, even within the ambit of the Government's policies, that there had to be transitional arrangements. I do not think that it is too much to say that in this case it may be necessary for the Government to go back to the European authorities and renegotiate that part of the transitional arrangements that says that the majority of the cost has to be carried out by November 1985.

If those proposals are not mere window dressing, if their purpose is to take account of the fact that areas such as Teignbridge suffer through no fault of their own, it is not asking the Government too much to ask them to put the broad framework right, to go back and get another concession.

[Mr. Nicholls]

If there is any way in which I can sum up why that should be done, it comes down to this—it is common justice. I hope that when the Government find that they have to operate a policy that is fundamentally flawed they will at the very least ensure that the transitional arrangements mitigate its effects.

8.25 pm

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): To call this a debate on regional policy is something of a misnomer. It is more a debate on a policy of sorts of one Government Department—the Department of Trade and Industry. The aim of the policy that we are being asked to endorse this evening is not to aid the regions but to help the Chancellor to make further cuts in public expenditure. We are being asked to endorse a reduction of 54 per cent. —from £643 million to £300 million—in expenditure on regional development grants and selective financial assistance between 1983-84 and 1987-88.

Since the mid-1970s, regional aid is one third down in real terms. Areas such as Merseyside require a comprehensive, interdepartmental strategy—the sort of strategy that was outlined for us immediately after the Toxteth riots when the present Secretary of State for Defence, then the Secretary of State for the Environment, came to Merseyside and established a task force. A number of hon. Members—the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson), who intervened in the Secretary of State's speech this afternoon, and my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett)—have asked for a task force. Merseyside's experience of the task force has led to disillusionment. When it was set up the present Secretary of State for Defence determined its role as being to deal with "the overall deployment and effectiveness of public resources in Merseyside."

Under the present Secretary of State for the Environment, we have unco-ordinated, project-by-project overseeing. The task force on Merseyside is no more now than an outreach department of the Department of the Environment.

We do not want a task force such as that in an area with substantial unemployment. Merseyside now has about 50,000 or 60,000 fewer jobs than when the Secretary of State for Defence visited it in the aftermath of the Toxteth riots. We have 140,000 people unemployed and 195,000 supplementary benefit claimants. The deprived parts of Merseyside will now have to suffer a loss under the policies that we are discussing this evening.

It will lose its special development area status, and, in consequence, the regional development grant will be reduced from 22 per cent. to 15 per cent. Although new plant will qualify, replacement plant, which many firms require in order to replenish their resources, will not.

The regional policy that we are being asked to endorse has nothing in it to assist the port of Liverpool or the airport. Although no doubt there will be a few dissident voices from the Back Benches, the Conservative party is in the process of establishing a third London airport at Stansted and, to all intents and purposes, downgrading airports such as Manchester, which is already an established international airport. There is nothing in the Government's policy to help Manchester airport.

Conservative Members may protest that Manchester is to be made an intermediate area. What God taketh away, he giveth back. It was the Conservative party that withdrew assisted area status from Manchester on an earlier occasion.

Liverpool airport has pleaded, month in, month out, for an upgrading of its status. It does not even have a duty-free shop, despite the fact that most of the people using it are about to take international flights. They make their way to Heathrow, Gatwick, and other international airports.

There is nothing in the regional policy to help tourism. The much-maligned Merseyside county council has taken very much on board the need to develop tourism in an area that — as the Government themselves recognise — has some tourism potential. Last year, the international garden festival was established. Merseyside county council has brought the tall ships race to the Mersey, arranged the Mersey river festival and developed the Beatles connection as one of the attractions of Merseyside. The area is close to the Lake District and to north Wales. Tourism is an area in which jobs can be created. If the Government looked more kindly upon those who are trying sincerely to develop tourism on Merseyside, we would do much better.

The policy is a loss to the north-west as a whole. The smaller amounts of aid to be made available for regional policy in the north-west are to be diluted. At the moment, 47 per cent. of the population live in assisted areas. Under the new policy, over 60 per cent. will be included. That is not a plus; it is a minus. In the case of Merseyside, pressure was doubtless brought to bear on the Government by the Tory Wirral borough council. As a result, the Chester travel-to-work area is now included in the Merseyside development area. The effect will be to dilute the capital injected into the inner city and the more deprived areas of the county of Merseyside.

Merseyside did not gain much from regional policy in the immediate past. Even within the more confined boundaries of the special development area, when regional development grants were paid to firms moving into Merseyside, most of the capital went to the more prosperous and peripheral parts of the region.

What Liverpool and Merseyside need is for all Government spending to have a regional dimension. It is no use the Government telling us that we are to have such-and-such a sum in regional development grants when, since 1981, they have denuded Merseyside county council of £76·5 million. That money would have been spent on building up the infrastructure on Merseyside. It would have enabled us to develop the area so as to make it more attractive to business men. Do not say that you are helping Merseyside through all your policies. I do not mean you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am referring to the Government. They say that they offer regional development grants to firms moving into the area, but, on the other hand, they are making the area a cultural desert by attacking art and culture there.

The Philharmonic hall is a place that many people would want to visit and where the executives, whom we hope to attract, might wish to take their recreation. The Philharmonic hall is under threat because the Secretary of State for the Environment is doing the opposite of what the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry tells us that he is trying to do, because he is taking money out of Merseyside.

If we take all the districts in the county into account, we find that between 1981-82 and 1984-85 the districts and the county council have lost £136 million in terms of loss of block grant and penalties demanded by the Department of the Environment. That loss affects social, community and education services.

One cannot develop a comprehensive regional policy in a vacuum. This is a phoney attempt to lull the public into believing that the Government are making a real attempt to solve the problem of jobs. That claim is false.

The Government should not tell Merseyside to look to the private sector. Over the years we have witnessed the collapse of the private sector of manufacturing industry. When the present Secretary of State for Defence visited the city in 1981, he took a celebrated coach tour around Liverpool with some business men. They set up an organisation called Inner City Enterprises. I challenge the Government to tell me of £1 invested by Inner City Enterprises in any inner city. The Government pretend that they can solve the problem of the gap between the rich and the poor in this country by spending less than 1 per cent. of total public expenditure. That is a complete fallacy. Merseysiders know what the Government are about.

8.37 pm

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): It is singularly appropriate that I should speak after the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing), because his constituency and mine are in the Liverpool travel-to-work area. On behalf of the many honourable Conservatives on Wirral council, Sefton council, and West Lancashire council, I say that we in the Merseyside sub-region are sick and tired of hearing the Labour party whingeing on about the bad treatment that Merseyside has had from the Government. The Merseyside sub-region has benefited more from grants and Government investment than any other region in the country.

Furthermore, the hon. Gentleman conveniently forgot to mention the fact that freeport status was recently accorded to part of the dock area of Liverpool. That should certainly help to revitalise an undeveloped and unfortunately rundown part of the city.

I am not suggesting that everything in the garden is rosy, but opportunities have been put in Liverpool's way, perhaps more than in any other region. Labour Members should recognise that. It is regrettable that I must observe that if Labour Members who represent Merseyside were more co-operative with Conservatives who have the interests of Liverpool at heart, it would be a much better place. They merely knock and criticise and fight among themselves. They would do far more for Liverpool if they put over a good, progressive and dynamic image of the city, which will have a great future if we work for it.

Mr. Wareing: How many Tory Members are there in Liverpool? None.

Mr. Hind: There are at least three in the Merseyside region and there are others like me in the Merseyside travel-to-work area. Many of our constituents work in Liverpool. I am a member of the Liverpool chamber of trade and a member of the court of the university of Liverpool, so I have the interests of the city at heart.

I welcome many of the Government's proposals and was a member of the Committee which considered the Co-operative Development Agency and Industrial Development Bill. My hon. Friend the Minister recently visited my constituency. I must tell him that the people of Ormskirk and surrounding parishes, Up Holland and Skelmersdale are grateful for what the Government have done. People in Ormskirk and surrounding parishes are especially glad to have been given regional development status. It is a marvellous opportunity for an area that has had no assistance for many years to enable it to take advantage of manufacturing and service industry grants and those which are offered by the European regional development fund.

The most constructive aspect of these proposals has been ignored today. The area suffers 15 per cent. unemployment. The payment of grant has been divided into two categories. The first is based on selective assistance—the backing of winners. We want companies that will succeed to receive grants. The second takes employment into consideration. Unemployment is a burning issue in this Parliament and in the country. Grant is to be paid according to the number of jobs that will be created. Many people in the north-west will welcome the £10,000 per job limit and the £3,000 special job grant for labour-intensive industries. We must wave a welcome goodbye to the bad old system of automatic grants which created jobs at £35,000 each at 1982 prices. There will be an end to Sullom Voe projects and the like.

Mr. Henderson: We have seen not the end of Sullom Voe projects but the end of taxpayers paying money for them. The projects would have been developed anyway.

Mr. Hind: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Grant is to be available only for the creation of new projects. People in the provinces, and especially in the north-west, are interested in the creation of new jobs. There is an enormous difference between such grants and spending £2 billion on training schemes. Jobs that result from in-service training would probably have come about anyway. We want jobs that would not have been created without grants. The Department of Trade and Industry should examine the recipients of grants and ask whether the company would have expanded without grant. It is no good giving grant to companies that will expand anyway merely because they happen to be in the right place.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): How are jobs to be created without any money?

Mr. Hind: That is one issue on which I agree with the hon. Gentleman. There is deep anxiety about the level of unemployment in west Lancashire, especially in Skelmersdale. I could take Ministers to estates in my constituency where unemployment is as high as 40 per cent. That is devastating. It creates much suffering and hardship. My hon. Friend the Minister should re-examine the money that is being made available for regional development. People want employment.

The House's mind has been concentrated on whether the £1·5 billion that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has mentioned should be spent on infrastructure or in tax relief. Most of those who have pressed for spending on infrastructure believe that that is the best way to create jobs. Like many of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I believe that people north of Watford want jobs. If it comes to making a choice between having a few extra pounds in our pockets and seeing our neighbours and friends in work, we would opt for jobs. The Government might think that giving £1·5 billion back in tax relief is a good way in which to create jobs, but if there is more it should be spent on job creation. An ideal vehicle for that is regional development grant.

Mr. Ashdown: The burden of the hon. Gentleman's speech appears to be that he disagrees fundamentally with the Government cutting regional aid by nearly one half. Is he aware that that is the central issue here? Can he not find the courage to represent his constituents by voting against the Government? If he really believes what he says, he will do that.

Mr. Hind: At this stage I believe that the programme being advanced by the Government is good. The idea is excellent. It removes the bad old system of automatic grants. I am glad to see the back of them. I can support the new system, but I am telling my hon. Friend the Minister——

Mr. Ashdown: That the hon. Gentleman will vote for the Government?

Mr. Hind: —that he should re-examine the amount of money that is being made available. This year's Budget could provide opportunities for job creation. Each Budget should be examined with that in mind. There is to be no cut in regional development grant this year. It stands at £640 million. We still have an opportunity to see whether more money can be made available. But those who criticise this system should bear in mind that it is a much better system than the one it supersedes. It is more likely to create jobs, and is much more understandable to the general public. They will understand that for every £10,000 spent, a job should be created.

Hon. Members may criticise because of the amount of money involved, but they should go into the Lobby to support this good new system of regional grants. They should make it their business if they so wish to write to the Ministers responsible and to the Chancellor of the Exchequer saying that they want more money for more jobs. That is where the pressure should be applied.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I shall not take up the remarks of the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind), who has his own particular brand of Law Society economics, partly because he has not left me much time in which to do so. However, I must say that his desire to grovel before the Government seems to have overcome his economic sense.

The Government's measures demonstrate their brazen callousness. It takes real insensitivity, inhumanity and brutality towards those lesser breeds without the south for a Government who have decimated industry, brought down manufacturing employment by 22 per cent. in five years, put 1.7 million people in manufacturing industry out of work, increased unemployment to a level never before known in this country and who have generated long-term unemployment on a scale three times that which existed before the war, to cut £300 million off the budget for regional aid. That seems to be the entire aim of these measures. On 28 November, the Minister of State said their policy represents "a considerable lightening of the public expenditure burden".

—[Official Report, 28 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 937.]

That is the aim. Just when we need money spent on regional aid, the Government have cut the amount so that they can go ahead with tax cuts. The only consolation offered to the declining areas of this country seems to be that the more they decline, the greater the prospect of a visit from the Under-Secretary of State who is responsible for small businesses. To some areas that is more of a threat than a promise, yet that is the only consolation offered them today.

If this system of regional development and aid was necessary when unemployment stood at between 500,000 and 1 million, it is trebly necessary when unemployment now stands at 3 million. Yet the amount of money spent is being almost halved. Given the industrial disaster that the Government have inflicted on this country, the only logical step was to extend regional policy. If that policy is to be extended to other areas, such as the west midlands, as it should be—due to the damage done to the west midlands—and if the cake is to be cut into more slices, we must have a larger cake. It makes economic sense to spend more on regional policy to help those areas that the Government have brought to their knees through their economic policies. For them to cut back now demonstrates the callous heartlessness that is the economics of irresponsibility.

Mr. Michael McGuire (Makerfield): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Mitchell: I would rather not give way, as I should like to keep to the 10-minute limit, even if it does not apply.

In short, the Government are trying to have it both ways. They claim that they are bringing benefits to new areas. They also claim that areas such as Grimsby, which have their development area status cut, will not suffer any loss. The Government cannot have it both ways. Either there is a loss to areas such as Grimsby, or there is not much of a benefit to those areas such as the west midlands, which are supposed to benefit. The truth is that harm is being done to areas such as mine. As far as Grimsby is concerned, this is a kick in the private enterprise. It has been delivered by a Minister of State who comes from the town. It is a sad reflection that he should be grinning behind the Dispatch Box when he has done that to Grimsby.

Grimsby derived real benefits from development area status. That status was wisely and rightly, justly and fairly given to us by the Labour Government. It brought large sums to firms in regional developments grants for capital projects. It is merely quibbling to say that it has not stopped further decline. In Grimsby, male unemployment has hovered near the one man in five figure over the past few years due to the decline of basic industries such as fishing. In fishing, we are hamstrung because we fall between all possible stools. We do not qualify for help from the Common Market because we are north Britain, or for help from Associated British Ports because it has its own commercial objectives to pursue. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has no money to offer us. We have no inner urban aid to use at discretion. Thus, that basic industry is declining. We have also seen a decline in the primary processing of fish, and large scale redundancies at Laportes at the graving dock and Courtaulds. The town's exporting industries have suffered because of the rise in the value of the pound, and food processing has suffered because of a decline in consumer demand. We have suffered all round, due entirely to the Government's policies.

Regional policy for us has prevented the decline from becoming worse and has prevented yet more unemployment in Grimsby. That might be a negative achievement, but it is still vital for the constituency that I have the honour and privilege to represent. The aid is vital, for all that its impact has been negative. Now we have lost that attraction.

As a result, we shall become vulnerable to the distortions of regional aid, which regional policy is meant to ease. I shall illustrate two of the distortions as they effect Grimsby. We have seen the closure of one of the Findus factories in the area, and the loss of about 1,000 jobs. They were effectively transferred to Longbenton in Newcastle, as the firm could get better regional incentives in a special development area than it could obtain for its existing operation in Grimsby. Thus regional policy in that area was effectively being used to destroy jobs in Grimsby.

When we saw the Minister to complain about that he said, effectively, "Hard fishcakes. That is the way the world is." Now that Grimsby has been demoted to intermediate area status there will still be that gap between us and a development area, and the prospect of losing such jobs is still there. Therefore, we are hurt both ways. Our power of attraction is reduced, and we still have the potential for losing.

The Secretary of State, then the Minister of State, also effectively betrayed us over Nissan because he indicated that he would redress the gap between the aid offered to a development area and that forthcoming for a special development area. More than £20 million was involved. He certainly gave the impression to all at the meeting that the gap would be bridged. I think that all there will confirm that. He held out that implicit promise. As soon as he got Nissan's agreement to come, it did not really matter which part of the country it went to, and he found that he could save money by not offering that aid to Grimsby.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The hon. Gentleman may be confusing me but I think that he is imagining an entirely fictitious meeting and conversation.

Mr. Mitchell: I am sorry; like this Minister of State I was not at the meeting, but all those who were there agree that that promise was held out. The correspondence later bore that out. On the evidence of those who were there, I am right. The promise was held out, and once Nissan had been secured, and the Minister no longer needed to offer an inducement, he dropped it. Again, we suffered through the distortions of regional policy and are still open to suffer again in exactly the same way. The answer is not to eliminate these disparities but to give the areas more flexibility to attract the industries that they wish to attract.

Another problem is the disruption that the change in policy imposes on a place, such as, Grimsby. We need continuity. Just as we are getting going as a development area and getting the system into gear, it is suddenly brought to an end. Industry needs continuity and prospects to make investment decisions. Chopping and changing, as the Government do, inhibits that.

A further problem is that the measures are unjustified. Our problems are more severe than when the Labour Government gave us development area status seven years ago. We need that status to fight against the continuing decline. The Government are diminishing our ability to do so. During that period our unemployment rate has more than doubled. I am angry at the squalid measure and at the vicious demotion of an area that was deriving benefits, and needing more benefits rather than this cut.

It is as though the Minister were saying to a patient on a life-support machine—be it a heart-lung or a dialysis machine—"You have had your seven years and you are no better. We admit that it is our fault that you are worse, but get off the support system." The Government are telling us to make way for Birmingham, Scunthorpe and other areas that they have harmed more than Grimsby. That is not a regional strategy, but industrial homicide. The Minister is saying to us, "Get off the life-support system, the Prime Minister wants you to stand on your own two knees." We shall fight on, but it will be against greater odds. The Government have compounded every economic problem that Grimsby faces.

The measures are appalling. The cuts are appalling, especially their impact on my constituency. What appalls me most is the small-minded petty viciousness of the measures.

9 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West): Before I come to the main part of my speech, may I say how pleased Opposition Members were to see the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry taking part for the first time in a full, three-line Whip debate, and returning to his former strength. I fervently hope for the full recovery of Mrs. Tebbit.

Immediately after the vote, we shall move to the orders, the first of which deals with the new map and qualifying activities. Hon. Members who did not have an opportunity to speak during this debate and who had important constituency-based speeches to make, could make them then. The map, the qualifying activities and the prescribed limits are important issues.

The wording of the motion attains the highest level of the Government's newspeak. John Hurt as Winston Smith in the film of the year could not have done better. We are asked to note

> "with approval that the increased cost-effectiveness of regional assistance will enable the burden upon taxpayers to be substantially reduced."

In plain English that means that the purpose of the package is massively to reduce aid to the poorest region in order to make tax cuts available in the next budget for individuals who are already among the best off.

With the economy slithering out of control, the Government are desperately thrashing around to make any cut, no matter the social cost, and to sell any asset, no matter the commercial loss, to reduce Government expenditure. They have no other economic policy. That was the case with the panic sale of British Aerospace shares two days ago. We have heard today of the panic and the disgraceful moratorium imposed on the payment of development grant and on new applications not posted within the next two hours and 57 minutes. The countdown has already started.

In the 1985 version of newspeak, for "economic policy" read, "cut Government expenditure". The Government have no other policy. Public sector housing has already been hacked to pieces, and it is now the turn of regional policy. There is no question of this being a new more cost-effective regional policy. Whatever the Minister says, he knows that that is not the purpose of the package. He admitted to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), who has been voted trouble-maker of the year — he will be rather pleased that I have mentioned him—that the main purpose of the package was to reduce Government expenditure. The Minister knows as well as I do that there were no new positive ideas in the White Paper. Nor was there one creative contribution from the Government in the debates on the Co-operative Development Agency and Industrial Development Act 1984. All that we have heard tonight —nothing will change when the Minister of State gets to his feet — is a repeat performance, redolent of the staleness of a Government who were self-avowedly devoid of idealism and who are now self-evidently defunct of ideas. Regional policy costs money, so cut it.

In the trenchant words of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), the only answer that the Government have to any problem is to cut, cut, cut. At least they have been consistent in that. They have displayed not so much the smallness of mind that some associate with consistency as a narrowness of vision and an intensity of single-issue focus that have burned out the hearts of regions. Even by this Government's standards, the cuts in regional aid have been unmitigatedly savage. They are matched in their severity by what the Government, out of wilful prejudice, have done to the public sector housing programme. It is an insult to the regions that will never be forgiven by the people who live there that those massive cuts have been made when unemployment in every nation and region is at a record high — yet another unique negative achievement by the Government.

The statistics for the depressed regions speak for themselves. I give the figures in a slightly different form from that in which they were given by some of my hon. Friends, who have made such valuable contributions to the debate, but they are still staggering. In each case, I am comparing the figures for 1979 and 1984 — the period for which the Government bear complete responsibility. In Scotland, unemployment has increased by 166,000, or 104 per cent. It has more than doubled. In Wales, unemployment has increased by 93,000, or 120 per cent. In the north of England, it has increased by 118,000 or 111 per cent. In the north-west, it has increased by 247,000, or 136 per cent. In Yorkshire and Humberside, it has increased by 177,000 or 160 per cent.

In the west midlands, that once-proud powerhouse of our industrial base, we find the most staggering figures. Unemployment has increased by more than 220,000 or almost 200 per cent. What sort of record is that? On what basis could any Government defend that record and excuse or explain those figures?

However, faced with those figures and the stark human tragedy that lies behind them, all that the Government did, perversely, was to make a second, even deeper, cut in regional development grant support. They cut £100 million a year from Scotland, £60 million a year from Wales and £150 million a year from the regions of England. All that they can do is to cut. Their logic was brilliantly exposed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) at the beginning of the debate. The Minister of State said that Government expenditure destroys jobs. Therefore, if we reduce Government expenditure, we can increase jobs. However, he will not follow the logic of his argument and eliminate Government expenditure in the regions. He is not rushing to his feet to give an explanation of the logic of this part of the argument.

I was interested to hear the intervention of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who came to the rescue of his beleaguered Minister. He said that we were forgetting the effect on aggregate employment. What he was really saying was that while they would tail it off as quickly as possible, the Government would continue the aid to the regions but that it should be understood that this would mean job losses in other areas which would not be assisted. If that is what the Goverment think, will the Minister of State have the frankness and honesty to say so? Will he say clearly that they are continuing regional aid for the moment, having cut it by over 60 per cent. since they came to office? They are not doing badly; they are well on their way to ending it.

I see in his place the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind); he is disappointed that the Government have not stopped the provision of aid already. Let me reassure him that they have cut it by over 60 per cent. Of course, they cannot tail it off abruptly because they have certain commitments that they are legally bound to honour. Although they have gone back on commitments that the Minister of State gave repeatedly during the Committee stage on the transitional arrangements, they cannot break their commitment to make payments that are due. The cuts will come through and they will be felt in the regions. Cuts of £300 million will have been made in about two years' time.

Behind the heartrending unemployment figures that I have just given the House lies the devastation of the industrial base of the regions — nowhere more than in the west midlands where, as I know from personal experience because I represent a Coventry constituency, no less than one third of manufacturing capacity has been lost. The Government reply that we will probably hear tonight is that productivity in manufacturing has improved by 15 per cent. since 1979. Of course, if one third of the most threatened manufacturing capacity is eliminated, productivity is bound to go up. It is not much different from eliminating the bottom third of the first division of the football league and comparing its goal difference with that of the top two thirds of the league. That would show a dramatic improvement in the apparent performance of British footballers. By that method of accounting we should be favourites to win the world cup.

Nobody believes the Government's talk of an industrial recovery. The Minister of State shakes his head in surprise as if I were meant to believe it. How can anyone, least of all the regions, believe it when the deficit last year in manufactured goods on a balance of payments basis was £5 billion? How can we believe that we are in a position to compete in manufacturing when even now investment in manufacturing is down 25 per cent. on the level of 1979? How can the regions believe it when, within this overall pattern of decline, the disparities are greater and are intensifying all the time?

It is understandable that the Government have no positive or creative ideas on regional policy since they are completely schizophrenic about it, as we saw earlier in the debate. They do not believe in it, but they do not want to say so. They brought regional aid in as a social policy. Having cut it by 60 per cent. since 1979 they fatuously try to make it appear to be not too bad. They say that the regions will still get some help. No doubt we will hear again from the Minister to the effect that they will extend the aid to service industries. They are hinting that an increase in discretionary aid under section 8 of the Industry Act 1972 will make up for the massive cut of £300 million in regional development grant. By extending the map as widely as they can—we support the Government—they hope to maximise our take-up of the quota of the European regional development fund. That is about all that the Government have to say.

It is clear that, if the ERDF did not exist, we would not have a map or a policy. We would have nothing at all. As we all know, it is the existence of a regional policy that governs the general eligibility of a country to participate in the European regional development fund. We all know that the ERDF can never be a substitute for national policy. The Commission says that the ERDF shall not be a substitute for policy. The ERDF must reinforce strong national policy at a time when the regional disparities within the Community are worsening and when, in the Commission's words, these disparities are the greatest threat to that unity and coherence of the Community to which the Government pay such lip service.

In principle, we welcome each of the Government's policies. The problem is that their practice does not match up to their principle, and the limits unnecessarily imposed by the Government on those policies do not match up to the regional problems. The Minister has made a great deal of the point that the reduction in regional development grant may be made good—he has not said more than that—by discretionary assistance under section 8. That is fine if a company is a rich, strong multinational such as Datsun and does not really need the money. Datsun had the unique privilege of being sneaked in by the back door for regional development grant as well as discretionary aid. As the Labour party predicted at that time, Datsun is now recruiting some of Austin Rover's best production engineers.

For British companies, beleaguered in the most depressive regions previously benefiting from RDG of 22 per cent. — RDG that was automatically available and built into their cost structures—the reduction in RDG to 15 per cent. and the non-eligibility of modernisation and replacement schemes will come as a body blow as they fight to hold their market share and to increase their competitiveness. We know that competitiveness can be achieved mainly through the capital investment that is desperately needed. For those threatened British companies located in the assisted areas, looking for discretionary assistance from the Government will, I fear, be tantamount to pleading for mercy from Dr. Joseph Guillotin.

All the positive creative thinking in the debate has come from the Opposition. I should like to congratulate my right hon. and hon. Friends on their excellent contributions. In many ways, those contributions had different emphases, and I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) would agree with me. My right hon. and hon. Friends all recognised the reality of the regional problem and the Government's responsibility to do something about it. The Opposition are attempting to do something about the problem. Conservative Members, especially those few hon. Members from Northern constituencies who have expressed their doubts about the policy, have shown a willingness to abstain. I note that the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Mudd)——

Mr. John Smith: He is not from the north.

Mr. Robinson: He is not; he represents Cornwall. That area, too, has been devastated by the Government's policies. The hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne is going to abstain. I urge him to vote with us in the Lobby.

Mr. Mudd: I would be willing to do so, were it not for one salient fact. There is massive unemployment in Falmouth. About 1,300 Falmouth shipyard workers were placed on the dole as a consequence of British Shipbuilders' closure plans for Falmouth. Those plans were approved under the Labour Administration.

Mr. Robinson: I am quite sure that the job losses in that area, which are staggering already, will be greatly increased when the Bill to privatise the warship yards goes through and those competing in the commercial market are left to their own devices. We have not seen anything yet, in the words of one of my hon. Friends.

What we have had tonight, as we have had throughout this debate, is creative positive thinking from this side of the House and a simple policy from the Government which has been to say that, because Government expenditure is involved, because Government expenditure is wrong, regional policy must therefore be wrong and let us get rid of it as soon as we can and as soon as we dare.

Mr. Bill Walker: I would like the hon. Gentleman to be aware that other Conservative Members will be abstaining, myself included. The reason why I shall abstain is not that I think that principle behind the policy is wrong; it is just that I have never in my life supported anything that cannot happen. There is a travel-to-work area in my constituency and tonight it would be impossible to travel in that travel-to-work area. That happens not on odd occasions, but every year the roads are blocked and public transport is non-existent, yet it is a travel-to-work area.

Mr. Robinson: I will explain to the hon. Member for Tayside, North the reason for that: it is that so badly has aid to local government, regional aid to local government and transport to local government been cut that they do not have any money to salt the roads. Conservative Members may be amused to know that it is rapidly getting to that point in Surrey where I happen to live. When hon. Members talk of the south-east, they should realise that the south-east under this Government has had the highest rate of unemployment increase second only to the west Midlands. It is a unique achievement of the Government that they have managed to turn virtually the whole of the United Kingdom into a depressed area. There is a strong case to be made out in the context of the European Community for classifying the whole of the United Kingdom with the mezzogiorno of southern Italy.

Mr. Hind: It is significant that the hon. Gentleman who is winding up lives in an area of relative affluence. While we who represent the Midlands and the north are fighting for a better situation, he is living in the soft south-east. Perhaps there is a lesson in that for his constituents.

Mr. Robinson: We could have done without that issue. It lowers the standard and the seriousness of the debate. The debate concerns not where I happen to live but the people of the regions of this country who are suffering from this Government's policies and will suffer even more severely when the cuts come into force. If the hon. Member for Lancashire, West had the courage of his convictions he would vote against the motion on these policies or abstain for the diametrically opposed reason that he does not think that they go far enough. There may be another chance—though I doubt it—to do completely what he wants and that is to cut this altogether. That is what the hon. Member said, as he will see when he checks Hansard. I hope that his constituents in Lancashire, West understand exactly where he stands.

The truth is that not only do the Government not believe in regional development assistance as a tool of economic policy but they do not really believe in social policy either.

With his customary air of nonchalant disinterest, the Minister of State spoke only last December to the industrial editor of The Observer, Mr. Adrian Hamilton. The article stated:

> "'That regional assistance is being conducted at all,' says Lamont with a smile, 'shows that we are evolutionary, not dogmatic. If it works we'll keep it. It if doesn't, then we will have to look at it again."

That is not so much a policy, more a suspended sentence of death. The Opposition accept none of that defeatism. Unemployment in the regions is a social evil and an economic problem.

We must put the same questions to the Government as did the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup in his Sunderland speech. How much longer can we afford to gamble with our social stability? How much longer are parts of Merseyside to be expected to put up with over 6 per cent. of their school leavers going into full employment? How much longer must there be 36 people chasing every job vacancy in the west midlands? How much longer must the north suffer an unemployment rate now approaching 20 per cent.?

As the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne argued, why cannot Devon and Cornwall have policies geared to their problems? How much longer must Scotland and Wales put up with a Government who have turned their backs on their special needs, and who have slashed Government aid to Scotland under the regional policy by £100 million and to Wales by £60 million per annum?

Do not the Government realise that that policy of nihilism is leading us into a dangerous future? Do they not realise that they are storing up for us perhaps unmanageable social problems and that they are storing up for future generations problems the extent of which we cannot yet see and solutions to which the Government have not provided?

Problems in the regions and in the inner city areas caused by these policies are bound to breed despair and to generate violence. The Opposition are committed to the expansion of public expenditure, and to a constructively selective public works programme that will get the regions going again. We believe in the people and skills of the regions. Each has its own distinctive contribution to make to the industrial recovery that the country needs desperately. We intend that regionally based organisations and local government will play their full role in the re-creation of jobs, the rebuilding of our industries and the introduction of new technologies. The regions and nations of the United Kingdom are keen to play their full role in achieving the essential regional objectives that must form part of our overall national economic recovery.

We have heard nothing from the Government tonight that can hold out any hope to the regions. The Government have imposed upon this country the tightest regional policy regime that exists within the Economic Community. They have deliberately reduced RDG to 15 per cent. and the job grant to way below what it could be under EC rules and restricted policy in every conceivable direction. We shall see to it that the regions are given the opportunity to perform their role which is vital and fundamental to the rebuilding of the shambles of a nation that the Government have created.

9.30 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Lamont): I thank the hon. Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson) for speaking so slowly in his peroration when he was in danger of running out of material about four minutes before the end of his speech.

This has really been two debates. On the one hand, we have had a debate between the Front Benches largely about the principles of regional policy and the announcements that I made. On the other, we have had a debate more between the Back Benches about the assisted areas map and how individual constituencies have been affected.

Inevitably, a large part of the debate has been dominated by concern with hon. Members' constituencies, and the reaction to the Government's announcement last November has been rather influenced by the effect it has had on their constituencies. My hon. Friends the Members for Bury, South (Mr. Sumberg), for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) and for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland) have given the Government's policy a warm welcome, and in particular I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucestershire, West for what one might call his baroque welcome with a triumphant coda at the end. Unfortunately, other of my hon. Friends — for example, my hon. Friends the Members for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and for Blackpool, North (Mr. Miscampbell)—might be described as having received it with somewhat modified rapture.

I well understand the disappointment of some areas that have been downgraded or excluded. The Government had difficult choices to make, as my right hon. Friend said. Although one would not believe it from some of the speeches, not every constituency, not every travel-to-work area, can be an assisted area. Inevitably the Government have had some hard and difficult choices to make. We have made them, as far as possible, by objective criteria.

Inevitably, at the margin of the 35 per cent. map—which was the maximum coverage that we could go up to and the maximum that would be acceptable within a European framework—an element of judgment came in. But whatever decisions were made, there was bound to be disappointment among those of my hon. Friends whose areas were excluded. As I say, we could not expect to please everyone.

Mr. Bill Walker: I am not objecting to what the Government are trying to do. Indeed, I support the principle of it. However, in no way can one describe an area as a travel-to-work area when it is impossible to do so. COSLA—the Scottish local authorities—accepts that Blairgowrie is unique in this respect because there is no public transport and the roads are blocked every winter, being highland mountain roads.

Mr. Lamont: I appreciate that my hon. Friend's objection relates to the travel-to-work area, and I shall be coming to that because he was not the only hon. Member to raise that issue.

Some hon. Members—fortunately, not too many—alleged that there had even been some political bias in drawing up the map. [Interruption.] I am glad to note that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) thinks that that is an unworthy accusation, and it is. Of the 32 travel-to-work areas that were formerly assisted and that have now been excluded, those exclusions affected 41 constituencies.

Such was the Machiavellian influence and intervention of Conservative Central Office that 32 of the 41 travel-to-work areas turned out to be Conservative seats that were downgraded, though I do not expect that revelation to be greeted with cheers by my hon. Friends.

While 3 per cent. of the country was excluded by the decisions that were made, 10 per cent. of the working population were brought into the enlarged assisted area map. We were able to make this possible through the extension of the intermediate area status. That means that more areas will qualify for access to the ERDF. Many of my hon. Friends have been disappointed because their local authorities will not have access to the ERDF, but at least, with the decisions we have made, more areas than before will have access to it.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Does my hon. Friend accept that the most serious deprivation is not the lack of access to the ERDF but the fact that those areas can no longer go to the European Investment Bank, which has been of great assistance in the past and for which there is no quota?

Mr. Lamont: That is true, but my observation applies both ways. Some areas will have more access while others have less.

An adjustment to the map was essential because the map was out of date. Some areas have improved relative to others while others have deteriorated in comparison with other parts of the country. Opposition Members have quoted unemployment statistics for their constituencies in absolute terms. But in regional policy we must base our decisions as to which areas should be assisted on the relative position of different parts of the country. The result is a map more closely aligned to the worst black spots. The reduction from three tiers to two allows us to concentrate regional development grants on the worst-hit areas.

Unemployment has been the main criterion, but not the only one. We have also borne long-term unemployment very much in mind. Other criteria such as geographical location and industrial structure were also considered. The average rate of unemployment in the year ended July 1984 for the development and intermediate areas that we have selected was 19·1 per cent. and 15·5 per cent. respectively. Those are average rates and some areas will have been excluded even though they might have qualified on the basis of unemployment statistics because they failed to qualify on other criteria.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): If unemployment rates were the main criteria in updating the map, why were unemployment figures for travel-to-work areas calculated on data four years old? Is the Minister aware that unemployment in my constituency is not 16 per cent., as he claims, but more than 20 per cent.? Will he undertake to review the regional map when the new employment census appears and update it properly?

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman is not quite correct. Unemployment was calculated on the basis of long-term unemployment data, but also on data for the year ended July 1984.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and others criticised the decision to base the map on the building block of the travel-to-work area or the way in which the travel-to-work area chosen affected their constituencies. Travel-to-work areas are the smallest approximation that we can make to self-contained labour markets nationwide. It does not mean that people living at one end travel to work at the other end. It means that 70 per cent. of the people who work in the area also live there. That has always been a basic building block of the system and it provides reasonable confidence that the jobs created there as a result of regional policy will be taken up by local residents.

The hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) referred to the conclusions of the Select Committee. His conclusion was that the whole of Wales ought to be a development area. That is an unrealistic and unjustified suggestion on the basis of the unemployment rates in certain areas of Wales. In the period to August 1984, areas like Aberystwyth had 10 per cent., Brecon 9·1 per cent. and Carmarthen 7·1 per cent. unemployment. Despite that unemployment, 89 per cent. of the population of Wales will still be in assisted areas. I did not have the pleasure of hearing the speech of the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson), but I can guess what he said. I point out to him that Scotland's share in the intermediate areas is unchanged and that Scotland's proportion of development areas has increased.

Mr. Bill Walker rose——

Mr. Lamont: I have many questions to answer and I have already given way three times.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East asked whether the Highlands and Islands Development Board area would continue to qualify for ERDF. The answer is yes.

Mr. Bill Walker: Is my hon. Friend able to give me his assurance that if Scottish local authorities show him that his own criteria do not apply to Blairgowrie he will accept that linking Blairgowrie and the travel-to-work area with Pitlochry and Aberfeldy is nonsense? I am not asking my hon. Friend for more money. I am only asking that there should be an objective and sane basis for what is done and that my constituents should be able to believe in the sanity of the policy.

Mr. Lamont: If what I have said does not achieve what is required, I shall discuss the matter with the Department of Employment which draws up the travel-to-work areas.

Many questions have been asked about the moratorium which was announced by my right hon. Friend. He emphasised that the purpose of the moratorium was not a cut but to get expenditure on regional development grants back to the level that was predicted in 1983. We shall continue to spend the same amount on regional development grants as we predicted in 1983 we should spend upon those grants.

The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) asked, as a result of the overshoot, how much money we were hoping to prevent being part of that overshoot. The answer is £150 million. It is based upon the assumption that the moratorium lasts for 12 months. [Interruption.] Obviously the House is not clear about this. There is a four-month moratorium which means a four-month delay in payments from the approval of RDGs. The figure of £150 million is based upon the assumption that that arrangement will last for 12 months. Since the Government have estimated the cost of their regional policy, it is important that we should be able to hold to it. It is important for public expenditure to be contained. That is absolutely vital to the Government's economic objectives.

Faced with the problems of sterling in the exchange markets, Opposition Members have sought during the past few days to argue that this is the result of a fundamental defect in Government policy, or of some perception abroad of a fundamental defect in Government policy. If, however, there is any fear abroad about Government policy, it is the fear that Government expenditure is shooting ahead of target. That is why it is all the more important for the Government to stick to their targets.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson rose——

Mr. Lamont: I shall give way in a minute.

If only Opposition Members understood that — but they do not understand it in terms of their attitude to public expenditure. During the last few days we have seen in the foreign exchange markets a mere tremor of no confidence compared with the earthquake of no confidence which would take place if the Opposition were to implement their public expenditure policies.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson rose——

Mr. Lamont: No, I shall not give way.

Mr. Robinson rose——

Mr. Lamont: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lamont: I have already given way four or five times, Mr. Speaker, so I shall not give way again.

The changes that have been announced will both improve the internal logic of our regional policy and give far better value for money than did the previous policy. Nearly half the £300 million savings will come from the requirement to link grants to jobs and the exclusion of replacement investment.

Surely the Labour party cannot believe that it was right to go on subsidising without choice or discretion large capital projects such as oil refineries and petrochemical plants—plants with little choice of location. That policy did the regions no good. It disrupted them and the effect was often simply to place large amounts of money in the coffers of the multinational corporations and large companies that Labour Members are so anxious to attack.

Labour Members do not like hearing about Sullom Voe, which in one year took one third of Scotland's regional aid and created jobs at a cost of £130,000 a time. But that was far from being the worst example. There were many large projects. At least Sullom Voe created some jobs. Many large projects subsidised by Governments in the past did not create jobs but reduced them.

We are not saying that for industrial or economic reasons the Government may not legitimately wish to subsidise some capital-intensive projects, but the point that we are making is that the Government should have the choice of whether they wish to subsidise those projects. That should not be done automatically.

Mr. Robert Hughes rose——

Mr. Lamont: As my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) pointed out, that change will be made easier by the change that we have made in the balance between selective and automatic assistance. There we follow a change forecast in the White Paper in that we are placing more of the emphasis on selective assistance.

I was asked how much selective assistance would be increased to compensate for the loss in automatic assistance. By 1987-88 we expect selective assistance to have increased by some 40 per cent., or some £50 million.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson rose——

Mr. Lamont: The single most important change that we have made is to link regional policy and regional development grants to the creation of jobs. Our policy will be that if there are no jobs there will be no grant. As an alternative to capital grant companies will be able to choose a job grant of £3,000 for every new job created. The effect of that will be to encourage those projects which may involve little capital but will create many jobs.

Given that the purpose of regional policy is to iron out the differences in unemployment between different areas, and given that hon. Members on both sides of the House are concerned about the current high levels of unemployment, if we are to continue to spend large sums of money on regional policy, as these are, it must be simple common sense to link that expenditure to the creation of jobs. There is little point in spending money on automatic regional assistance for any other reason.

The Government's decisions announced in November were taken after an intensive period of consultation and a lengthy analysis of the effects of regional policy. After 50 years of regional policy it is surely right to re-examine and reappraise the policy. That inclination does not seem to be shared in any way by the Labour party which seems to think that the effectiveness of regional policy is simply to be judged by the amount of money that is spent on it.

Our White Paper suggested that regional policy had created some 500,000 jobs over 20 years in the assisted areas. That sounds a lot, but it is not such an impressive figure for the expenditure of some £20 billion. Many of those jobs would have come into existence anyway. Some are jobs that have simply moved from one part of the country to another. Many of my hon. Friends from the west midlands would say that regional policy had directed firms away from the prosperous areas and added to the problems of a region already burdened with an ailing motor industry.

Sometimes regional policy has diverted high-risk projects to areas where they would not have chosen to go. The simple result has been persistent loss and early mortality. Above all, jobs have been created at the ridiculous cost of £35,000 per net new job. There have been areas where regional policy has had its successes. Undoubtedly, it has helped with inward investment. It has helped to build up the electronics industry in Scotland and Wales. However, in the country as a whole, it is difficult to say that there have been great changes in the league table of unemployment.

The hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) said that the assisted areas map today is depressingly similar to that of five, 10 or 20 years ago, or even before the war. Given that fact, the answer cannot simply to be throw more money and to continue regardless with the same policy. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) asked how much unemployment would be caused by the cuts in regional policy that we have announced. We do not believe that there will be any rise in unemployment, for these reasons. First, the savings are, to a considerable extent, to be achieved on hitherto wasteful expenditure on large capital projects and on projects that did not create jobs. Secondly, all the calculations about the effects of regional policy on the creation of jobs ignore the adverse effects of regional policy, such as the effects that it has on non-assisted areas. We must be concerned about employment and unemployment on a national scale. Thirdly, if Labour Members think that £300 million savings will destroy jobs, why do they not think that £300 million extra taxes will destroy jobs as well?

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East referred to a speech that I made in Birmingham, and to my observation that taxing or borrowing beyond the country's capacity could destroy jobs and that therefore savings in public expenditure could help to create and preserve jobs. He asked what was the difference between the £300 million that we are saving and the £400 million that we shall continue to spend on regional policy. The difference is that the £300 million that we are saving was being spent inefficiently and ineffectively. It was being wasted on subsidising non-job creating investment and subsidising replacement investment, whereas the £400 million that we shall continue to spend will be spent more cost-effectively.

My hon. Friend the Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson) referred to the fact that many of the jobs that had been created by regional policy were the wrong ones. As he pointed out, regional policy has concentrated on manufacturing, which has been in decline for some 20 years. While regional policy has continued to subsidise manufacturing and move it to the regions, service jobs have not been eligible for regional development grants and have continued to pile up in the south and in the south-east of England.

The hon. Member for Coventry, North-West said that we had not announced anything positive. I thought that he would have welcomed, as it has been welcomed everywhere and by hon. Members on both sides of the House, the fact that we have decided to extend automatic regional development grants to the service sector. That will be of special benefit to the north-east and to areas such as Merseyside that have depended far too heavily on the old traditional industries and on heavy manufacturing. Such areas need more research and development. They need more headquarters activities. The changes that we have announced will make such developments easier.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) suggested that our cost per job limit of £10,000 is too low. He will be aware that that is the cost to Government. It is 15 per cent. of the investment. A cost per job limit of £10,000 would mean a total investment for each job of £65,000. That is double the average capital intensity of British industry. Our aim has been to remove the bias in the system, which has been heavily geared towards capital-intensive industry.

Labour Members — especially those on the Front Bench—have refused today to face questions about the effectiveness of regional policy. The hon. Member for Coventry, North-West said that all the creative thinking had come from the Labour Benches, but the Opposition Benches have not produced a single idea during the whole debate. As my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucestershire, West said, Labour Members' deepest conviction is that money grows on trees. They believe that the more money one spends on regional policy the better, regardless of its cost-effectiveness.

The problems addressed in the White Paper have not always been ignored by the Labour party. In a document published in 1982 entitled "Economic Planning and Industrial Democracy" we find the statement:

> "Although it is important to increase capital investment and productive efficiency in assisted areas, relying on capital subsidies as the major regional policy instrument is an extremely expensive way of creating jobs and is ineffective in tackling the serious differences in unemployment rates between regions and localities."

That was what the Opposition said. "Ineffective" is their word. How right they were. That is why they should welcome our policy, which is targeted much more directly on job creation.

In one of his few sensible utterances, the Leader of the Opposition said:

> "We very much do want value for money, because it is our money."

How right he was. It is the taxpayers' money. Regional policy should attempt to get the maximum value in the form of new jobs, and the maximum value for the money spent.

Although in the past the Labour party has shown some recognition of the ineffectiveness of previous regional policy, its only response has been to suggest an enormous array of boards and controls. At the time of the last election, Labour proposed the creation of tripartite regional planning bodies in every region. That was on top of the sector planning committees reporting to the national planning councils, the agreed development plans, the product research unit, the foreign investment unit, the Energy Commission, the Price Commission, and the tripartite investment monitoring agency. All those bodies were to be overseen by some giant department of economic and industrial planning.

Such a policy would certainly have created jobs. It would have created thousands of jobs for bureaucrats and civil servants. It would also have meant six weeks and 10 committee meetings before a local manager was given permission to buy a packet of paper clips. It would have stifled enterprise and doomed the regions and the country to decline.

The fringe publications of the Labour party and of its militant supporters in the constituencies tell us that they do not wish to repeat the mistakes of the past. What they mean is that they will not learn any of the painful and belated lessons that the Labour party learnt in office. They mean that the Labour party should never again recognise the constraints that it was forced to recognise when it was in office. One of the things that the Labour Government learnt, to their cost, was that increased inflation and increased public expenditure result in increased unemployment. As those who are faced with the task of managing the economy always realise, Government expenditure does far more harm than good if the price is the resurgence of inflation.

We have explained why we think that the new policy is more effective in creating jobs. There is no reason to apologise for its producing savings of £300 million. That also is good for jobs. It is good news for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, for the taxpayer and for everyone inside and outside assisted areas. I urge my hon. Friends to reject the amendment and——

Mr. James Hamilton (Motherwell, North) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, That the amendment be made:—

Question agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of the Government's statement on 28th November announcing changes in regional industrial incentives; welcomes the closer alignment of the new Assisted Areas map to areas' relative needs for increased employment opportunities; agrees that it is right at a time of high unemployment to relate assistance more directly to jobs; and notes with approval that the increased cost-effectiveness of regional assistance will enable the burden upon taxpayers to be substantially reduced.

Assisted Areas

10.25 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Assisted Areas Order 1984 (S.I., 1984, No. 1844), dated 26th November 1984, a copy of which was laid before this House on 29th November, be annulled.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take motion No. 3 on the Order Paper:

That a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Regional Development Grant (Qualifying Activities) Order 1984 (S.I., 1984, No. 1846), dated 26th November 1984, a copy of which was laid before this House on 28th November, be annulled.

Mr. Beith: The Assisted Areas Order concerns the list of places that are eligible for regional aid. The other Order concerns qualifying activities. Most of my attention will be directed to the schedule of places eligible for regional aid. That is where the Government have made their greatest mistakes. I believe that it is useful to take the two orders together so that any hon. Members who wish to refer to qualifying activities can do so.

The widening of the qualifying activities is one of the few parts of the statement that we welcome. The extension to service industries of regional aid is clearly sensible and more accurately deals with the development of an area in which the service industries are an important back-up to manufacturing industry and important providers of jobs. On the whole, we welcome the second order, but, none the less, we feel that it should be debated.

Our greatest reservations concern the map, the schedule, and the list of areas. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House have expressed reservations, many of which are well founded. There are not simply complaints from those whose areas have been excluded from development aid on reasonable objective grounds. There many cases of complaints from those who can point to areas that fulfil in every way the criteria which the Government have set out for inclusion in a development area. The map devised is most at fault.

The criteria that the Government set out and reiterated tonight for determining the places eligible for regional aid included such aspects as high unemployment, high long-term employment, high employment relative to other places, great distances from main markets—which the Government call, in a rather ugly word, "peripherality" —and industrial structure. According to those criteria, a number of places should have been included in the list of places eligible for development aid, but those places were not included.

Several of my hon. Friends have mentioned during debates or raised with me concern about some of these areas. My hon. Friend the Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) has talked about parts of Cornwall which exactly fit those criteria. My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) is concerned about, and, if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will refer to, the area of west Leeds which meets these criteria, including the additional criterion the Government included about the drain from the centre of cities. On many occasions, I have raised with Ministers the problem of Amble in Northumberland which exactly meets the criteria of having high unemployment relative to the places adjoining it, of being at a great distance from the main markets and of suffering from the problems of an old industrial structure — old industries such as the coal industry having been a dominant employer in the area.

In so many of these cases, areas that have been left out of the list meet the criteria more effectively than the areas left in the list. My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West has referred publicly to the contrast between Leeds which is not in a development area and Pudsey which is placed within a development area. On any objective assessment, many parts of Leeds meet the criteria better than places within the development areas. On objective criteria Amble meets the argument far better, for example, than Ponteland which is in the Newcastle travel-to-work area.

The result of this decision is that some of these areas — the most hard hit, the ones upon which the Government claimed that they were going to concentrate their aid—have lost the direct United Kingdom regional aids and their access to EC regional aid, and for many of them that is the most important point. Frankly, they were expecting to get more out of the EC than they were ever hoping to get out of the United Kingdom Government.

But the story does not end there, because they now find themselves facing direct competition from neighbouring areas whose problems are often not as great as theirs. That is a point to which the Minister of State referred when he wound up the earlier debate, the competition between the areas which do have incentives and those which do not. I am sorry to have to tell the Minister that he has picked some of the worst hit areas and left them with precisely that sort of competition, a very unfair competition indeed.

Why should Government and European regional aid be denied to the sort of places that I have described? I think the Minister should get some idea of the sort of places about which I am talking when I refer to Amble, for example. It is a community where one in three adults is already without a job and where only 18 per cent. of pupils stay on into the sixth form. When one compares that with a community like Ponteland, it is interesting to hear what the reaction of one of a Conservative councillor in Ponteland was when he was told that his area was on the map and asked why it was. He said:

"You could not say we are industrial. I am not aware of an unemployment problem though there might be some youngsters out of work."

That was a Conservative member of the Northumberland county council commenting on the inclusion of his area in a development area whereas in Amble 160 youngsters leave the high school in search of their first job every year, and most of them will not find such a job.

The Alnwick district council in presenting its case locally and nationally has drawn attention to some of these youngsters. It picked out one of them, Susan Stewart, who sought to get a job which involved design work, in which she was hoping to specialise and train. The opportunity was there, and what did she find? She read in her newspapers that development aid was going to be lost for Amble. She read in the same newspapers that the firm with which she was going to get a job was moving on to another area where higher development aids were available. It is that competition from neighbouring areas which is now going to be so damaging. Of the 163 school leavers from the local high school last year, 143 are still without a permanent job. It is those sort of circumstances in which the competition from neighbouring areas will be insufferable and unreasonable.

Why is it happening? Why have the Government done such a monstrously callous and heartless thing as to exclude some of the areas that I have described, and others to which the Minister's hon. Friends have referred, from regional aid? Why have they delivered that blow to communities which deserve help under all the guidelines which the Government themselves have set out?

I think that the clue to the answer is given in a letter which was sent to my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West by the West Yorkshire county council. It makes this point and says:

"The Government's insistence that it cannot depart from the principle of defining Assisted Areas on the basis of Travel-to-Work Areas means that economic blackspots within the County have been ignored".

It is the insistence on using travel-to-work areas inflexibly as the boundary. The same point, indeed, was made by the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) when he spoke. Indeed, he made the point that in his constituency Pitlochry, Blairgowne and Aberfeldy were so much set apart by hills that nobody travels between them for work and in no real sense are they a genuine travel-to-work area. So many of these travel-to-work areas conceal pockets of high unemployment. Some of them may well be appropriate for defining regional aid boundaries, but some of them manifestly are not.

The Government should have been readier to recognise that they have alternatives at their disposal if they do not want to use those areas.

In an earlier debate I said that the regional aid map which the Government have produced has been drawn by somebody sitting behind a desk in London who had never been to many of the places affected and did not understand their problems. I got an interesting reply to that point from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary. He quoted what I said, and stated:

"Nothing could be further from the truth, and I shall explain why. The travel-to-work boundaries were first drafted by the Centre for Urban and Regional Development Studies at Newcastle university, which may surprise the hon. Member".

It does not really surprise me—I used to work there. He continued:

"Those sitting behind their desks in London then sought the advice of those with local knowledge, particularly on any recent local developments that could have led to changes in the travel patterns since the census."—[Official Report, 19 December 1984; Vol. 70, c. 410.]

I took the trouble to talk to the people at Newcastle university who had been involved in the process of defining travel-to-work areas. The first point that they were bound to make in their own defence was that they were asked by the Department of Employment to draw up areas which were reasonable units for the collection and reporting of unemployment figures. They were never asked to set out boundaries which might reasonably define where development aid should go. As reputable academic statisticians, they did the job assigned to them according to the proper criteria. They assessed what would be reasonable areas for reporting the figures of unemployment.

That was not the end of the story. As the Minister said, the next job was to seek the advice of local people as to whether other factors should be taken into account. The Minister responsible supposedly did so, but he gave the local authorities a week only in which to respond. That did not deter the local authorities in Northumberland, and I am sure that it did not deter those in areas such as west Yorkshire either. They made their responses and not the slightest bit of notice was taken of them. It was the contrary. The local authorities produced a far more reasonable proposition than we now have before us.

I shall deal more precisely with the case of the Amble and Alnwick area. The Minister may not realise—I am glad that the information is being hastily brought to him—that the statistics produced by the centre at Newcastle university gave travel-to-work areas other than those that he has brought before the House. The travel-to-work area for Amble and Alnwick was not the large area that he has now. It was much smaller and excluded the whole of the western area and confined itself to the area from Alnwick to the coast. That was a much more reasonable unit.

The advice of the local authorities was to link Amble and the area immediately to its south. If the Minister had accepted the first suggestion from Newcastle university's centre he would have had a better map than he has now. If he had accepted the local authorities' advice he would have had a still better map.

None of the advice that he received from Newcastle university, people on the spot, or, I suspect, his regional officials led to the conclusions that he has now reached.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Lamont): I did not draw up the travel-to-work areas. It is done by the Department of Employment for a specific purpose other than regional policy. It is done to measure unemployment over the smallest most meaningful area that unemployment can be measured. Given that that is the purpose, it nevertheless makes sense to use it for regional policy.

Mr. Beith: The Minister has made my point. He did not define those boundaries, and the advice that I and others gave to him was that he should never have thought himself bound by them in the first place. He did not devise them and they were not devised for the purpose that has brought him to the House tonight. They were not devised to determine regional aid boundaries. They were defined by another Department for the reporting of unemployment figures. If I seem, by attacking collective responsibility, to be castigating him personally, that is not what I am doing. I was referring to his colleagues in his Department making such a spirited defence of the figures. I was trying to get to the facts which are that if we look at the original travel-to-work areas produced by the statisticians, they did not produce this crazy map.

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): Is the hon. Gentleman aware of any case similar to that of Ilfracombe in north Devon, where in July the Department of Employment advised me that it was looking at the figures and moving two areas in together—one good and one bad one? We should have smelt the rat which was there to be smelt. A few months later the two areas lost all status at one blow. Has that happened to the hon. Gentleman's knowledge elsewhere, perhaps in his own part of the country?

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman makes a sound point. His case is similar to mine. The advice that the Department of Employment took was not heeded. The Government have patched together a larger area to suit their own convenience. I have read the Adjournment debate that the hon. Gentleman raised on the subject of Ilfracombe. There is a remarkable similarity. The figures were produced by another Government Department. What should Ministers responsible for regional development have done? They should have looked at the map and said that it did not fit their needs; it did not correspond to the reality of high unemployment. They do not have the guts to stand up to their colleagues across the street or across the building in another Department and say, "You did a job for your own purposes; it will not do for ours." They should have devised a map which met their own purpose.

Mr. Norman Lamont: As the purpose they follow is to measure unemployment meaningfully, why is that wrong for regional policy?

Mr. Beith: It does not measure unemployment meaningfully.

Mr. Lamont: That is their objective. If that is their purpose, it is irrelevant for the hon. Gentleman to say that it has nothing to do with regional policy.

Mr. Beith: I have been trying to explain to the Minister why it does not work for that purpose, and he is getting restive about it. A travel-to-work area does not define levels of high unemployment. It is a way of reporting unemployment figures. It does not necessarily indentify unemployment blackspots. Indeed, if one takes the statistical criteria, one can use the whole of the country as a travel-to-work area because 70 per cent. of people come in under both headings; they work and live in it. The size of areas is very much determined by the administrative convenience of the Department of Employment, not to provide reasonable units for the hon. Gentleman to use for his purpose of regional policy.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): It creates lunacies the other way about in that Stratford-on-Avon, Solihull and Sutton Coldfield are included for special development assistance when, by any judgment, they do not need it.

Mr. Beith: I ask the Minister to go to the Darras Hall estate in Ponteland, or to some of those places that got included in the west midlands area, and ask himself whether the exercise of using travel-to-work areas has successfully identified in those instances the places that are most urgently in need of regional aid.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I intervene to illustrate my hon. Friend's point still further. The Bull Ring in inner city, Liverpool, in my constituency, where unemployment is running at 45 per cent., is now included in an area which also includes the constituencies of the hon. Members for City of Chester (Mr. Morrison), of Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt) and of Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker), all of which are represented in this House by Ministers and in all of which the rates of unemployment are only a fraction of that in central Liverpool. Does my hon. Friend think that that has anything to do other than with pork barrel politics?

Mr. Beith: A Pandora's box of places mysteriously included is being opened, but without my hon. Friend's local knowledge I will not begin to speculate on the reasons involved. Suffice it to say that the travel-to-work areas in a number of instances do not successfully identify the areas of greatest need. They embrace areas which do not have the same high needs and they exclude some areas which are in great need.

If the statutory framework within which the Minister was working had given him no choice but to work from the travel-to-work areas, it would have been another matter and we should be demanding that new legislation be introduced. But the House has only recently passed the Co-operative Development Agency and Industrial Development Act 1984, which sets out what the Minister can do. I do not know why the hon. Gentleman did not examine that measure and see the wide range of choices open to him.

The Minister could have made an order under the appropriate section describing a development area by reference towards, travel-to-work areas or "any other area which has been created by or exists or existed for the purposes of any Act or Statutory Instrument, whenever passed or made."

Thus, anything that has ever been defined in a statute as an area he could have used; his choice was limitless.

In one case, in one city, the Minister had the sense to realise that he had to do something different, and that was in Manchester. There, he used local government wards to define the boundary. I am tempted to attribute it to an outbreak of wisdom on his part, but I know that the real reason was other than that. It was that when he and his officials got to Manchester they realised that they were pushing against the barrier of the total percentage that they would be allowed to claim for development assistance under the European development fund. Accordingly, they started somewhat to redefine in Manchester, which was not unreasonable, because had they left Bramhall in the regional development area they would have deserved the same criticisms as I am delivering to them in relation to a number of other places elsewhere in the country.

I do not complain, therefore, at that being done in Manchester. But why in only one place in one part of the United Kingdom did they use the flexibility available to them under the Act? They have handed over their duties to Ministers in other Departments, they have taken hand-me-down areas provided for a wholly different purpose and they have failed to examine whether they met the needs of the case. As my hon. Friends and I have sought to show on many occasions, the Government have made the gravest mistakes in the map by so doing.

The controversial points that have been raised today are deeply felt by Members who sincerely believe that the Government have excluded areas which fulfil all or most of the criteria and genuinely need that kind of help. There is still a chance to remedy the deficiency. The Under-Secretary of State is reported to have said on a visit to the north-east that the map would not be set in concrete but subject to regular review. I ask the Minister to hold out some hope to school leavers in the communities that I have described and to local authority officials desperately trying to attract industry to their areas and to help industry to stay there in the face of competition from nearby areas receiving assistance but often without anything like the same problems.

The map contains errors. There may be members of the present Administration who regard themselves as infallible, but I am sure that the Minister is not one of them. I am sure that he recognises that even the passage of time can change these things, not to mention the original errors.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be useful to know how long the map is intended to remain in operation? I understand that it is intended to operate without further review for five years. Perhaps the Minister will tell us whether that is so and whether he agrees that as the 1979 map became out of date so quickly, regular and far more frequent reviews would be most helpful.

Mr. Beith: I am sure that my hon. Friend is quite right. Moreover, it would be entirely consistent with the Minister's earlier remarks about not hanging on to regional policies that were no longer working if he would guarantee that he will review the boundaries annually and that he will be prepared at any time to consider cases which clearly meet the criteria that he set out but which have so far not been included. I hope that he will give at least that much hope to areas which sincerely feel that he and other Ministers have delivered them blow after blow as they desperately try to fight their way out of difficulty and depression. The areas that I have described are trying desperately to help themselves, but the Government seem intent on hindering them.

As the procedures of the House do not allow us to amend the order, I ask my hon. Friends to vote against it, but I hope that the Minister will offer some hope by saying that he is prepared to reconsider cases which cry out as loudly as those that I have mentioned.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): I, too, wish to refer to an area that I believe has been wrongly deprived of assisted area status—the town of Blackpool, part of which I have the honour to represent. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Blackpool, North (Mr. Miscampbell) mentioned this briefly in the earlier debate and I wish to elaborate on it.

Unemployment in the Blackpool local authority area in December was 20·2 per cent. The average for the whole of 1984 was 17·8 per cent. Those figures are a good deal higher than those for the generality of intermediate areas and for some of the development areas.

I cannot support the Government in the Lobby today because, although they are right to try to reduce the total cost of regional aid and to make the whole policy more job orientated, I believe that they have made a mistake in relation to Blackpool.

What matters more than anything else to Blackpool is the resulting deprivation of European Community assistance because it has already embarked on a number of very important projects and was about to embark on others which would have received assistance from the European investment bank or the European regional development fund.

The definition of travel-to-work areas has been discussed. I, too, have a criticism to make. Blackpool is part of a travel-to-work area that covers the whole of the Fylde. As my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Blackpool, North said, Fylde, just to the south of Blackpool, has relatively little unemployment—about 9 per cent. That totally alters the unemployment picture. Even though Blackpool is by far the largest local government unit in the Fylde area, the figures for the travel-to-work area are fundamentally altered, in a way that has deprived the area as a whole of its assisted status.

But even if one takes the travel-to-work area as a whole, the December 1984 unemployment figures were 16·5 per cent. The average for 1984 as a whole was 14·9 per cent. That figure is higher than the figures for three of the intermediate areas in the north-west — Accrington and Rossendale, Manchester and Oldham. If one takes the main criterion, unemployment, which the Government have been using, and the travel-to-work area of which Blackpool is a part, it is hard to justify the fact that Blackpool and the Fylde do not qualify as a travel-to-work area.

I repeat the point made by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Blackpool, North. The local authority area of Blackpool alone passes all the tests to qualify as a travel-to-work area. It has a potential working population of 60,000. It is larger than two-thirds of the travel to work areas in the north-west.

Relevant also is the speed at which the unemployment figures in Blackpool and the travel-to-work areas have increased. Between 1983 and 1984 they increased in Blackpool by 1·8 per cent., in the travel-to-work area by 1·3 per cent., in Lancashire by 0·7 per cent. and in the United Kingdom as a whole by 0·6 per cent. That is a very worrying trend for those of us who represent Blackpool and the Fylde. I do not know when the Government froze the figures in coming to their decision. If they had taken the figures a little later they might have made a different decision about Blackpool. I do not remember hearing my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State or my right hon. Friend the Minister of State spelling out fully the six criteria that they used. If they did, I apologise for not having grasped them. However, I wonder whether they took account of the trend in the different areas. If they had done so I believe that it would have been very relevant.

Blackpool and the Fylde have been trying to help themselves. They do not believe in relying principally upon handouts from the Government. They have been trying to compete with the Costa Brava by building their own indoor Costa Brava. It is already under construction and will cost £16 million. They still hope that they will be able to complete most of it in time to receive a very substantial grant from the European regional development fund. They have in mind other important projects, which are fundamental to the tourist life of Blackpool—still the most important part of Blackpool's livelihood. They include a road right into the middle of the town for tourist purposes, more car parks and coach parks and a 70 acre industrial site whose infrastructure has just been completed. Ironically, the first sod was turned at just about the same time as the Minister announced the change in policy. Important work has to be done for coastal protection. The storms in the Irish Sea do not take account of whether Blackpool enjoys assisted area status. The Winter Gardens, built about 100 years ago and still, in my view, one of the best conference halls in the country, will need to be modernised to match the modern conference halls being built in other parts of the country. Blackpool airport will need modernisation because the runway is getting old. The town had hoped to have an electrified railway link to Preston and Manchester. All those proposals could have qualified for aid from the EC. Now the prospect of getting that aid has been removed.

If such schemes are carried out most of them would have to be with money from the local authority. What will happen if the local authority does that? What will happen if it spends money repairing the airport runway? It will run into the problem that it will be penalised by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment for overspending. It does not wish to overspend and be penalised. It had expected to receive substantial grants, up to 30 per cent., from the EC, but it may not do so now for some of the projects. Therefore it faces the dilemma of deciding whether to scrap those projects, with all the attendant disadvantages, or to go ahead and risk the penalties that the Secretary of State would inflict.

The Government should think a bit more about their policy for the assistance of tourism. The Government say that tourism is increasingly important in our national scene. It is a great earner and saver of foreign currency. Industrial towns outside the assisted areas have enjoyed certain benefits by way of Government assistance, from urban schemes, and so on. But if a tourist region is outside the assisted areas it receives little help at all and has no recourse to the EC, which has been helpful to the British tourist industry. It can only go to the English Tourist Board if it is in England. The total grant available under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969 is about £8 million, and it is clearly not available for projects of the magnitude that I have been describing. So assistance from the EC would be available to develop tourism or conference facilities in sunny Wolverhampton or beautiful Oldham or Sheffield, but not in Blackpool. The Government really should re-examine that situation.

To sum up, I hope that the Government will bear in mind that Blackpool has all the qualifications for a travel-to-work area on its own. I should like the Minister to say whether, in examining the plans that the Government have announced, allowance was made for the speed of change to which I have referred—the speed of growth in the unemployment figures in different areas and the speed of change of different industries.

If the need to renew the industrial infrastructure was one of the criteria which the Government used, what about the need to renew the infrastructure of tourism? The changes in tourism have been more rapid than the changes in almost any other industry in the past forty years. I hope that when he replies my hon. Friend will say something about the Government's attitude to tourism in the context of the question that I put to him.

I also hope that my hon. Friend will answer the question put to him from the Liberal Benches. How long shall we have to wait for a review of the Government's policy? I hope that it is not true that we shall have to wait five years. That is much too long. It is possible that in some of the areas where unemployment has been increasing fast action will have to be taken much sooner.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I appeal for extreme brevity. The Front Bench is hoping to catch my eye at 11.15.

11 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): The interest that the House has in these orders is comprehensive. My interest is encapsulated in the explanatory note to the order dealing with industrial development in assisted areas. It says:

"The Order revokes all earlier Assisted Area Orders with appropriate saving provisions."

I shall try to be brief. My submission is that we have not given sufficient thought to existing policies before we have found ourselves rushing headlong into a new approach—an approach reflected in the debate earlier today and in the order itself.

I wish to draw to the attention of the Minister, as we consider the problems of travel-to-work areas, infrastructure and accessibility of European funds and the rest, the impact that these policies have on people and particularly upon the people of my region of Strathclyde. It represents half of the population in Scotland and has grave reservations about the policies that the Minister is adopting, which are reflected in the orders.

Strathclyde regional council published an excellent document, which I commend to the Minister, called "Strathclyde economic trends" in January this year. It made a number of interesting points, points that advance the case for increasing regional aid and public expenditure and not reducing them. Among the numerous points that it made, and which I commend to the Minister for his consideration, and to those Tory Members who spoke on the earlier debates, there is the comment that "the Chief Executive's Department has estimated that were it not for the various governmental 'Special Measures', 37,100 more people would be unemployed in Strathclyde in October 1984."

That was the case under existing regional aid policy, so when Tory Members say, as they did today, that public expenditure does not lead to jobs, I suggest that the available evidence shows that that simply is not the case. It is astonishing, in the light of the orders, that the Tory party campaigned in the general election on the issue that our defence policies would cost jobs because of the reduction in defence expenditure. Today, we are being told that the reduction of expenditure in the public sector will not necessarily mean that there are fewer jobs. I do not accept that. I plead, as most people in Strathclyde do, for increased investment at a higher level than that envisaged in the order.

The report revealed that in youth unemployment, the ratio is 246 young people chasing every job. I am concerned about long-term unemployment, and in my constituency, the report shows that in Coatbridge, of those unemployed, 25·5 per cent. have been without a job for two years or more. In Chryston and Kelvin Valley, again in my constituency, the figure is 19 per cent. Surely the whole position calls for more public investment than the Government's figures, representing £100 million less in Scotland, would suggest.

The fact is that the order is a mean-minded order, representing the Government's mean-minded approach. That approach was made clear when the Minister made a statement on 28 November, on the same day that we heard about the abolition of skillcentres in Scotland. The hon. Gentleman said that there would be "a considerable lightening of the public expenditure burden".—[Official Report, 28 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 937.]

That is the point of the order. It is not about finding jobs or correcting regional imbalances—and in any case we have heard this evening about the anomalies that are being created. The Government's concern is to reduce public expenditure, and in reducing regional aid they have found a convenient policy.

In Scotland, the measures have been found to be almost universally unacceptable. The Fraser of Allander Institute, for example, states:

"We can expect no significant reduction of unemployment during the remainder of this decade".

I suggest that unemployment in Scotland, with its frustrations and heartaches, is far too severe to permit us to consider the possibility even of its continuance at the present level, let alone an increase.

I hope that the House will reject the order, because the philosophy underlying it is not only repugnant but divisive. Speeches from the Government Benches have illustrated the arrogance of intellect coupled with the brutality of power. The Government's approach lacks both the sensitivity and the compassion of the Earl of Stockton, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) and the Bishop of Liverpool, among others. Because of that lack of compassion, and because the British and the Scottish people have been misled about the Government's approach, I urge the House to reject both the orders and the Government's policies.

11.7 pm

Mr. Robert Hicks (Cornwall, South-East): I have always believed that the primary purpose of a meaningful regional policy—indeed, its justification—is to help to create a situation in which each region contributes to and shares in the nation's prosperity and advancement. However, the designation of the new assisted areas and the list of qualifyig activities, sadly, will not help us to achieve that objective.

We face a real problem of widening regional disparities. The nation as a whole has a responsibility to try to improve the level of activity in the less prosperous parts of the United Kingdom. Other hon. Members have already referred to the growing problems created by the rapid development of technology, the changing patterns of demand, and the difficulties created when, in certain regions, the industries that once formed the basis of economic activity start to decline. The country as a whole has an obligation to try to reduce the basic disparities that result.

The Government are right periodically to reappraise regional structures but on this occasion public expenditure considerations seem to have dominated, rather than the needs of the regions themselves. That is especially worrying, because we face both high unemployment and, in certain regions, reduced average incomes.
